BERNARD BOSANQUET, in a recent work has said: "As a little child" . . . ; that has been the motto, as of the saints, so of the wisest of mankind. Your mind is a good instrument; only keep it free and sincere; keep away from selfishness, self-conceit, from the vanity of learning, and from the vanity of resentment against learning. Open it to experience, and take that as largely as you can. We know the type of man who on the whole gets nearest to truth. It is not the cleverest. It is, I think, the sincerest." And Dean Inge in his remarkable little book, "Personal Religion and the Life of Devotion," writes: "And surely the light means among other things, the open mind toward all things. We need not be afraid of losing our faith by facing all problems honestly, while our lives are on the right lines. But while our minds are shut we cannot help others in their difficulties. We are more likely to turn them away from Christianity. The shut mind is always ready to bring the Ark of God into the camp when the Philistines threaten, or do like the Chinese, who piled their best crockery on the rails to stop the first locomotive which ran into their country." (Page 75.)

The idea of the open mind in the quest of truth which underlies these two quotations is one seriously to be pondered both by leaders and by the thoughtful rank and file in the Church today. The present state of religious thought is one of extreme fluidity. Perhaps never in the life time of anyone now alive has there been such widespread unsettlement in the world of theology. It is likely that the third decade of the twentieth century will mark an epoch in the development of Christian thought. The age of St. Paul, that of the great Ecumenical Councils and the one which followed the Reformation in the Sixteenth Century were formative periods for Christian theology. We are now entering upon another. The intellectual forms in which we have been accustomed to express our Christian convictions are becoming leaky. The verbal clothing in which we have been wont to dress our doctrines appears in many cases to have been outgrown. Old arguments are losing their force. Time-honored sanctions are being superseded. Men and women are at sea as to what they shall believe, and even more at sea as to how they shall rationally justify that which beyond question they believe.

It is difficult to understand how this state of affairs could fail to impress thoughtful minds. On its intellectual side the Christian religion at this moment is passing through a revolution. The entire rational basis upon which Christianity rests is being reconsidered proposition by proposition. The causes of this unrest flew immediately out of the conditions which confront the modern world. I can only name in bare numerical succession a few of these causes. (1) It has suddenly dawned upon the popular mind that the scientific discoveries of the last century possess far-reaching religious significance. You and I may have thought such matters of evolution, natural law, and Biblical criticism had been faced by thinking Christians long ago; but it is one of the strange phenomena of the present day that the American masses are only just beginning to grapple with these vast issues; (2) the advent of Biblical criticism which has fundamentally altered our conception of the Scriptures; (3) the study of Comparative Religions; (4) the revolt of conscience against a too rigid Calvinism; (5) the rise of Democracy; (6) the progress of the science of Psychology; (7) the birth of numerous religious cults; (8) the cyclonic disturbances of the Great War. There are others, but these are of prime importance.

If then, there actually be a revolution, largely silent but very real, going on in the world of modern religious thought, it is vitally important that those who love the Church and believe in her essential message should assume a proper mental attitude toward the theological disturbances and questionings of our time. None of us can ignore these conditions. We must face them, willingly or unwillingly. In what frame of mind then, shall we face them? The final issue of this revolution, whether good or bad for the Kingdom of God, will depend largely on how you and I, leaders and people in the Church today meet these questionings: in what terms we conceive of them; the intellectual temper in which we seek to answer them. The thesis of this paper is that we can play our part in this crisis only with open minds and in the spirit suggested by the two quotations I began with. It, therefore, becomes the purpose of our argument to explain and if possible justify the open mind in matters of religion.

I.

One of the best definitions of what we mean by the open mind is Frederick W. Robertson's in his great sermon, "The Skepticism of Pilate." "In our search for truth," he said, "we must aim at three things: Independence, Humbleness, Action. First, Independence; we rely blindly on no one, we must make truth our own. Second, Humbleness: avoiding on the one hand captiousness and on the other hopelessness. Third, Action: "If any man will do His will he shall know of the doctrine." The mental attitude which lies back of these is the open mind.

It is a grossly misunderstood phrase. In one of our Church papers recently a book was reviewed in which the author warned his readers against the open mind, on the assumption that it means a mind indiscriminately open to every wind of doctrine and to every cold blast of skeptical speculation. Doubtless we agree that if this is what the open mind involves it is to be avoided. The possession of this sort of open-mindedness would speedily result in intellectual pneumonia. Not long ago in conversation with an intelligent friend on this subject he said to me: "You speak of the necessity for the open mind, but surely there are some truths we should not be open-minded about. Is there nothing fixed, certain, and beyond dispute in the realm of religious truth? Are we forever to keep our minds open to the possibility of our most sacred verities being proved untrue?" In answer to him I might have quoted the tremendous words of Robertson in the sermon just referred to: "There is infallibility nowhere on this earth: not in Rome; not in councils or convocations; not in the Church of England; not in priests; not in ourselves. The soul is thrown in the grandeur of a sublime solitariness on God." (Sermon on Bible Subjects, Everyman's Edition, Page 316.) The necessity for an open mind grows out of our consciousness that infallibility is to be found only in God and in the Risen Christ. The march of man towards the Truth is long, and there can be no absolute finality along the way. Each stop is but a temporary halting place; each stage but the prelude to another. Infallibility, perhaps, will come at the end: it is quite vain to look for it now. There are mirages aplenty in the heat and dust of the desert's sand; but the real oasis lies further on.

"But," objected my friend, "you have not really answered my question: I know there is no infallibility this side of God. That point is not under dispute. I asked if there is nothing substantially certain in the realm of religious truths? Are we to forever keep our minds open to the suspicion that we may be after all mistaken in our fundamental religious convictions? If some one lay down the proposition that Almighty God is the subjective creation of the human ego, am I to hold my mind open to the possible truth of that?" The question is frequently asked, and it voices the apprehensions of many intelligent persons who fear that to preserve an open mind toward religious truths means to harbor thinly veiled doubts as to the reality of those truths. That is emphatically a mistake. The open mind does not necessarily weaken our hold on truth. It does not cast reflections upon the reality of its objects. The truly open mind is built on faith not on doubt. Its function is to build, not destroy. To be an atheist is not to be open minded. The agnostic may be the most dogmatic, unscientific man in his community. When he says: "I do not know," if the real thought of his heart is, "I cannot know," he is not open minded. He has judged the case before all the evidence is in. And it is well frequently to remind ourselves that all the evidence will not be in until the last temporal day sinks to rest. The closed mind is never in order this side of the last sunset. And there is good reason to suspect it will not be in order even then.

To return to our point, and answer my friend's question: There is a vast deal in the realm of religious truth of which the open mind permits us to be certain. To be open-minded towards a proposition does not mean to entertain suspicion of its truth. It rather means to be alive in every direction to the infinite implications of that proposition. To hold one's mind open toward the Divinity of Christ, for example, by no means involves uncertainty as to its truth; but it does involve uncertainty as to our capacity at any given moment of experience fully to appreciate and comprehend all that is bound up in that majestic truth. I am open-minded not because I hesitate to believe, but because I want more light. The man of the open mind loves the truth so dearly that he is ever striving to see it more clearly, and to grasp it more firmly. If I throw open my shutters toward the sun, it is not because I wish to prove the sun does not exist; it is because I want the sun to beam more freely into my house. Perhaps his rays will creep into a few dark nooks where they have never shown before. Let us get clear at the outset that the open mind is not inconsistent with strong religious faith, and that it does not prevent him who holds it from standing loyally by the mighty truths of the Christian Creeds.

To the author of this paper, now that the common misconception of the open mind has been cleared away, it would seem a tragic dis-service to the progress of the Christian Religion for its protagonists to attempt to shield it from the processes of free enquiry. All the light which natural science, philosophy, sociology, historical criticism, and psychology can throw upon the phenomena of religion should be gladly welcomed in every quarter. To do otherwise would be fatal. Investigation must precede discovery. The Church must meet life if it would redeem life. It is intellectual timidity, tokening weakness of faith, which would protect religion from the white light of full, untrammelled investigation. One of our great thinkers has written, "If religious authority is to be true to its own best traditions, its validity must be vindicated, not only by showing its power to inspire and to redeem human life, but also by demonstrating its adequacy in the court of reason and free enquiry: as was done of old, when it succeeded in making of Platonism the instrument of its own theology, and later in converting the revived Aristotlianism of the Middle Ages. In the same spirit its task is now, not only to convert and sanctify souls, as it has always been doing, but to show itself at home in the modern world of science and criticism and sociology." Unless Christian thought can do this the Church will never win the confidence of the present generation, and the very existence of Christianity as a world religion will be threatened. There is a deep-rooted suspicion in men's minds that the Church is obstructive of the progress of human thought and it must be admitted that certain pages of her past would seem to justify that suspicion. The time has come to dispel the slander forever. The present is our golden opportunity. An open-minded theology that does not fear to test its own conclusions, that is not unwilling for other honest thinkers to test them too, and that entertains no secret doubts of its ability successfully to meet any and all comers in the lists of modern thought—such a theology will perform today valiant service for the cause of Christ.

II.

It now becomes our task to amplify certain statements we have just laid down. The definition of the open mind adopted in this paper grows out of a conception of truth which must be made clear before going on with the argument. To say that there is no such thing as infallibility on earth is not the same as saying there is no such thing as truth. There is, we believe, such a thing as Truth, final absolute Truth which exists in the mind and character of God. But we quite legitimately distinguish between God and man's idea of God; between the Truth and human ideas of Truth. The one is perfect and complete, the other temporary and partial. This distinction is vitally necessary to appreciate. Consider, by way of illustration, a great, fixed star, like Arcturus. Arcturus beamed ages ago upon the men of the Old Stone Age, who gazing up at it entertained crude, perhaps superstitious notions concerning it. Centuries and centuries later came the Egyptians and upon them the great star shined, they in turn studying it in the light of the knowledge of their day. Later still came the fathers of modern astronomy, after them the high power telescope, spectrum analysis, and the intricate discoveries of physical science. Yet the star has been shining serenely on while man's knowledge of the star has been growing from age to age. It is so with the truth. Here is one of the mightiest of truths, the Incarnation of the Son of God, shining like a vast, blazing sun in the sky of human experience. It is a supreme fact. We study its manifold aspects, we ponder its meaning, and each time we look we see more. The truth does not change: we change. Philosophy brings its contribution to our study of the Incarnation; Biblical criticism, psychology, revelation, and human experience bring theirs; yet none of them nor all of them can exhaust the full measure of its truth. It calls to us, it leads us, it enfolds us, we lose ourselves in its depths. But there is always more for us to learn. The Incarnation of the Son of God is forever wider, fuller, deeper, than knowledge or apprehension of it can ever grasp. It is true through life that beauty and truth are always beyond our power to exhaust. Our apprehension varies with our capacity and our open-mindedness. I mount a hill top, and behold a sunset, but while I gaze the sunset speaks to me: "Son of man you think me beautiful, you see my glory; but if you were a greater, better man: if your soul had sharper eyes, if your spirit were perfectly in tune with the Spirit that gave me being, I could inspire you a thousand times more than I do today!" Have we as we listened to a noble piece of music never felt, that beautiful though it seems, there are tones of beauty, rich overtones, undertones of sound, our dull, earth-stopped ears can never catch? As we contemplate the sinless Christ, dying for the sins of men, as we seek to vision the love of God which sent forth His Only Son, must not the cry of our inmost souls be for larger capacity, for ever-widening resistive powers, for the grace of a more capacious vessel, lest we lose something of the fulness that waits for our receiving? How many priceless things the Christ has to say that must wait until we are ready, until we are good enough, great enough, open-minded enough to be able to receive them! It must have been as fetters of iron upon His eager soul that He could not impart to the Disciples all He had to say, but must wait for their slow-moving souls, their sluggish intellects, to grow into knowledge of His truth. What a difference there is between the truth there is in Jesus Christ, and man's feeble, perverted notions and appreciations of His love!

In this world nothing is static. All is change. Human life is a development. St. John was thinking of it so when he said, "Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be." We occasionally think of evolution as if it were only a thing of the past; but evolution is a present fact. Human life is evolving, and the more glorious part is yet to be. It is a wondrous process by which the higher forms of life have developed into what they are, but far more wondrous still is that by which they grow from what they are into what they are destined to become. We see this process of becoming everywhere. Man began his existence in a garden, but ever since he left it he has been upon a journey, and every atom of material existence, every ounce of energy that surrounds him is on a journey, too. Modern science has made this clear. Why then should we think it strange that man's apprehension of the truth is also a growing thing? Yonder ahead of us towers the Truth, like the vast bulk of a distant mountain; and as we journey toward it we are constantly changing our angle of vision; but one day we will arrive and find our peace upon its breast. Is not such a view more reasonable, more in accord with life as we find life to be, than that of truth handed to man in a sealed packet, to be treasured, but not to be critically examined?

Jesus was continually representing His truth as a force working like leaven in the world; as something men would have to acquire gradually by the normal process of their thought. I read the other day an illuminating paragraph in this connection. "Though He saw so plainly men's need of authority, though His nearest disciples and friends were so spiritually dull, and though He seemed to have in Himself a fount of spiritual knowledge, yet He very rarely uses the dogmatic method of imparting mysteries. People, including His disciples, are constantly asking Him plain questions, and He so rarely gave them plain answers. Sometimes He replies with another question to make them think. He behaves as one who dreads to dwarf or crush the minds of His disciples by dogmatic words, and strives by every means to stimulate and develop their thinking. This is the point of His teaching by proverbs and parables." And on one occasion He said, "When the Spirit of Truth is come He will guide you into all truth."

It needs constantly to be recalled that man's gradual and slow advance towards the truth comes not alone by intellectual processes. Growth in truth has a distinctly practical side. We must remember that Robertson sets action as one of the means of winning truth. Religion finds its test and proof in living experience. It is not enough to investigate Christianity. It must be lived to be understood. As Dean Inge says, "The true religion for each of us is the most spiritual view of reality that we are able to realize and live by." No man can hope to penetrate to the heart of Christ's Gospel who does not know it from the first as a "way" of life. And it must be realized also that the search has an intensely personal aspect. Truth cannot be bestowed, though others can lead us towards it. There would be no need to speak of the open mind were this not so. Each man must seek the truth for himself, and in his own way. Authority aids, but authority can do no more. Not even in the search for truth can man's personal dignity be violated. It is our individual duty to follow where the argument leads. Even when it leads us astray? Listen to the words of Bishop Gore. "I cannot deny that at the last resort it is a man's duty to follow his conscience and reason even if they lead him (as I think) widely astray. And I believe that as God is good, for such a man the way of reason and conscience sincerely and faithfully followed will be ultimately the way to the light." (Belief in the Holy Spirit and the Church, Page 6.) Fearless, yea, dangerous words these. Yet if they be true, our only answer is an open mind that fears not to follow where ultimately the Holy Spirit leads.

BISHOP ROOTS AND THE BISHOPRIC OF HANKOW

TO My Fellow Workers in the Diocese of Hankow:

Others will report concerning other aspects of the work done at the General Synod in Canton. I write to you especially concerning the action taken in response to the invitation from the National Christian Council which was addressed to the Chairman of the House of Bishops March 7, 1924. This invitation asked that if I could not give full time service I might continue to give part time service as a Secretary of the Council while continuing as Bishop of Hankow, in case this arrangement would secure the approval of our Church. The formal reply is embodied in the following resolutions:

"Resolved that

"This House of Bishops of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui cordially approves the presence of the Bishop of Hankow on the National Christian Council as a representative of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui; but in view of the responsibilities of a Diocesan Bishop towards his clergy and his Diocese, as well as for the good of the whole body of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui, this House is of opinion that the Bishop, while giving every possible assistance to the National Christian Council, should not act as an Executive Secretary of that body but should remain Bishop of the Diocese of Hankow.

That the Secretary communicate the foregoing resolution to the House of Bishops of the American Church, and also to the National Christian Council in replying to the letter addressed by their Executive Committee to the House of Bishops of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui.

"That, the House proceed to decide upon a nomination, under the last clause of the Canon on Assistant Bishops, for the post of Suffragan Bishop of Hankow, such nomination to be submitted to the American House of Bishops, if and when nominations for a Suffragan Bishop of Hankow are called for in that House."

Doctor Gilman was nominated, and the whole question will come up for final action at the next meeting of the American House of Bishops which Bishop Gailor is trying to arrange to take place in May.

These resolutions grant much of what the National Christian Council asked for excepting that I should continue to be one of its Executive Secretaries. This might appear to be only a nominal difference inasmuch as the Bishops invite and indeed urge my cooperation with the National Christian Council to such a considerable extent; but it involves giving up my residence in Shanghai. This will prevent me from sharing fully the privileges and responsibilities of the central office which mean so much to the esprit du corps in the staff, and will also make it difficult for me to take part in even the most important duties of the National Christian Council which require above all that the staff take time at frequent intervals, for deliberate conference on the rapidly changing conditions and the great questions which face the Christian movement as a whole in China.

Furthermore, I do not see how we can expect our declining the invitation of the National Christian Council to be understood by many even among our best friends as anything less than a denial in action of the affirmations which we so often make, protesting our eagerness to advance the cause of Christian Unity. This, I believe, is a very serious thing for the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui. I cannot but think what a help it would have been to good feeling and generous thinking and really Christian action all round had we officially, corporately and whole-heartedly accepted the invitation extended to us by the National Christian Council; and this it is which makes the action of the Bishops at Canton a profound disappointment to me, and the decision to accept their advice the hardest decision I have ever had to make.

My own opinion was that only three courses were open to us:

(1) The acceptance of the National Christian Council's invitation that I become a part time secretary, which would involve the withdrawal of my resignation and the appointment of a Suffragan for Hankow, (2) the acceptance of the Council's invitation that I be a full-time Secretary of the Council, which would involve my resignation as Bishop of Hankow, (3) some course such as that actually followed, though it involved declining the invitation of the National Christian Council. The first course is the one I thought wisest; the second seemed to me far preferable to the third, and I urged it in preference to the third; the third course I accepted only because the Bishops definitely advised me to do so.

However, there are many things to be thankful for in the action at Canton. I could hardly see these at first, but I am now convinced that they mark substantial progress in the life of the Church we love as our own home, and that they may help us to bear our part more effectively than ever before in setting forward the life and work of the Great Church of which we are a small part.

1. Some of the reasons why the Bishops advised me not to remain an executive secretary of the National Christian Council indicate a generosity of spirit which cannot fail to be appreciated and welcomed as it is gradually understood. For example, several of the Bishops told me they wanted me to remain only officially related to the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui just because they want me to have the advantage of that position in our own Church Councils; and similarly that they think this position will enable me to bring from the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui to the National Christian Council a richer contribution than if I were even for part time officially acting in some other capacity than as the Bishop of Hankow.

2. The General Synod, by concurrent resolution of the two Houses, cordially welcomes the formation of the two National Christian Council and commends it to our diocesan authorities in China and to the Mother Churches in the West for their hearty support, moral and financial.

3. The Bishops not only encouraged me in the resolutions above quoted to give "every possible assistance to the National Christian Council," but have gone as far as they can in actually enabling me to give a very considerable amount of time to the Council by also nominating a Suffragan Bishop for Hankow. The Suffragan is intended of course in part to provide the additional episcopal oversight which the diocese has needed for some years and which is still more necessary now in view of the Church Missionary Society work in Hunan for which we have been asked to be responsible; but he is also quite evidently intended to provide what indeed I asked especially for, namely, such help as will make it feasible for me to give the time to the Council which the resolution encourages me to give.

4. Most important of all, I think, may be the deeper sense of the value of our own unity in the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui which seems already to be growing out of the Bishops' action. The resolutions above quoted carry almost unanimous support from the House of Bishops, not, however, because all agree that they are the ideal answer to the invitation from the National Christian Council. Indeed a resolution was actually passed by the Bishops, when the subject first came to a vote, "in favor of the Bishop of Hankow taking up the work of part time secretary of the National Christian Council," but this resolution was unanimously reconsidered later in order to secure as nearly unanimous action as possible in this important matter. The resolutions as passed were substituted for it with the express purpose of preserving our own unity not only by respect for an outward order of Church life, but by that mutual deference which is almost always required when important issues arise in a society sufficiently inclusive to be worthy to call itself a part of the Holy Catholic Church.

I would add one more thing in regard to the meeting in Canton, namely, that in the consideration of this particular question there was manifest a sense of responsibility and a humble sense of dependence upon God, together with a prayerful expectation of His guidance which at the time made us feel that we must be on the right track. I believe we shall find that this confidence will be justified by future developments, however deeply many of us are at the moment disappointed. After all we are seeking one of the most difficult of all things, namely, the unity of God's people, and we must be patient lest by undue urgency we lose the slowly acquired gains which we already enjoy. It is a source of profound satisfaction that we can go forward, so far as the corporate relations between our own Church and the National Christian Council are concerned, with a deeper sense than ever before of the reality and value of the unity which is being wrought out within the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui itself.

In view of the action commented upon above, I expect to resign my office as a Secretary of the National Christian Council at the Annual Meeting in May; and after the summer Mrs. Roots expects to return with me to the Bishop's House in Hankow. I need hardly add that this is one of the brightest sides of the situation in that it restores us to the bosom of the Mission Family.

Many problems still face us in the Diocese as well as outside. It is unalloyed joy to know that we can meet them with a staff so at unity within itself as the past two years have proven us to be. Let me close this letter by quoting from the last paragraph of the Lambeth Encyclical of 1920:

"If it often seems that the message of religion is too general, and its implication to details too difficult, then it is our duty to recall to ourselves that we have to do, not with a theory, but with a Person. God is working His purpose out. If in simplicity we give ourselves to Him, He will work in us beyond our understanding, and we shall have contributed to the fellowship of man, because we have been working in fellowship with God."

Faithfully yours,

L. H. ROOTS.

BOOK REVIEWS

THE INEXCUSABLE LIE. By Harold R. Peat. Barse and Hopkins. Pp. 186.

Bitter medicine but wholesome. The author, who was a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces in the World War, writes with a double purpose. In the first place, he tries to strip away from war all the false glamor of sentimental imagining and to show the stark fact of it in all its insanity of hate and slaughter and degradation. In the second place, he examines the reasons why war, as an institution, is perpetuated from century to century, and finds the answer in the stupid way in which we transmit falsely decorated militaristic traditions and never set ourselves intelligently to educate the rising generation in those generous human sentiments which should counteract the exaggerated nationalism that is the root of war. It is a book thoroughly worth reading, and not the least helpful chapter in it is one entitled, "Jesus the Hero."

UNITED STATES ARMY BASE HOSPITAL NUMBER 45 IN THE GREAT WAR. The William Byrd Press. Richmond, Va. Pp. 352.

Many books have been written which gave the history of individual units in the great war. All of these have poignant interest to the little group of those who were personally concerned in the narrative, but now and then there is a book which also commands the attention of the general reader. Of such is this history of Base Hospital 45. Not only will it be seized upon with avidity by the many men and women who belonged to that unit, and by a great number of those among the people of Richmond, Virginia, with whose life the beginnings of the Hospital were so intimately identified, but it will give also to all persons who want to know what the real meaning of war is, a very vivid conception of one great element in that picture. The book is profusely illustrated with scenes which show the daily life and service of the Base Hospital, and the environment in which it was placed; but, best of all, it has been edited with extraordinary skill. The opening chapter, especially, called "The Unit and Its Career" in General Review," by Major Joseph T. Geisinger, is one of the ablest descriptions of war service which one would be likely to find. In its fair and just, yet searching analysis of the blended grandeur and wretchedness of war, it reminds one of some of the finest passages in the writings of that greatest of war correspondents, Philip Gibbs.

THE ETHICAL TEACHINGS OF JESUS. By Ernest F. Scott. The Macmillan Company. Pp. 133.

Professor Scott, of the Union Theological Seminary, New York, is one of the students and teachers of the New Testament whose conclusions immediately command attention. It is a happy fact that he possesses also the power of clear and compact statement so that in books brief in compass and available not only for the technical student, but for the general reader, he can convey his very illuminating message. A year ago he published his "The New Testament Today," a highly valuable summary of the present-day scholarly conception of the New Testament as a whole, and in the book now under review, he takes up in more detail the particular subject of the ethical teachings of Jesus. With scholarly directness, but always with a constructive purpose, he discusses the teachings of Our Lord with reference to those questions concerning which there is most need for clear understanding, such as "The Religious Basis," "The Apocalyptic Background," "Renunciation," and "Non-Resistance." "I have tried in this book," he says, "to approach the subject with an open mind and with the one aim of discovering on the ground of critical and historical study what Jesus actually taught."

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION. By Robert H. Thouless. The Macmillan Company. Pp. 286.

No thorough student of religious questions in our day can fail to take account of modern psychology. With its analysis of human ideas and emotions, it has raised, and sometimes very aggressively pressed, the question as to whether the most fundamental articles of religious belief actually represent objective reality or only the reflection of interior states to be explained by such-and-such a mental complex. The teachings of psychologists, especially of the School of Freud, sift down into the thought of multitudes of people who have never read their books, and the whole attitude of a generation may be made indifferent to religion because the general notion is abroad that up-to-date psychology has explained it away. The successful interpreter of religion, therefore, must know what these difficulties are which the modern psychology is causing, and must reach that larger interpretation of religious faith which includes all the truth which psychological studies bring and yet can demonstrate that the reality of religion stands sure in the midst of all analysis. This book of Professor Thouless, delivered as lectures to ordination candidates at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, is an able and satisfactory treatment of the whole subject. It contains no dogmatism and no unfair assumption. It deals with the evidence fairly, and from that evidence it arrives at the conclusion that "the facts of the natural world, the historical facts of religions, and the facts of the moral consciousness" combine in "a very impressive argument for the general validity of religious experience."

Creative Protestantism

We are told that Protestantism has shown that it has no cohesion; its divisions are a scandal. May there not be a unity of spirit without uniformity of worship? May not the diversities of gifts under the same Spirit find legitimate expression in varying types of service, and even of Church organization? We acknowledge no such insuperable barriers as those which Catholicism sets up between Catholics and non-Catholics. Barriers there are, which we regret; but we remember that Our Saviour desired that His sheep might be all one flock; He never wished to pen them into one fold. Christ broke down all barriers, except those which separate the sincere, the spiritual, and the loving from the hypocrite, the worldly, and the hard-hearted. He broke them down by ignoring them, and He set up no new barriers in their place.

The Reformation aimed at a return to the Christianity of the Gospels. In this it only partially succeeded; but it stripped off most of the accretions under which we lay smothered, accretions which do not belong to Christianity at all, but to the immemorial superstitions of the Mediterranean races. Protestantism realized that Christ stood in the prophetic, not in the priestly succession, and that His teaching about worship was much the same as that of Micah. "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before Him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? . . . He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to do justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God?"

This moral and spiritual creed, individualistic and universalist, but not sectarian or political, enriched by the Pauline and Johannine Christ-mysticism, is enough for Protestants. It is irreconcilable with Catholicism as it exists in the Roman Church, and concessions are dangerous, for, as Harnack says, how often, when an old doctrine or ritual has been "reinterpreted," but left standing, the old meaning suddenly comes back again. The actual words prove stronger than anything else. Some one has to stand up and say, "The old is done away with"; as St. Paul said, and the Reformers.

Protestantism has no dazzling prospects to offer in politics. It will build no Vaticans, issue no Interdicts, sign no Concordats, win no Kulturkampf. It has no "interests" except the highest welfare of humanity; but in making these renunciations it is following Him Who said, "My Kingdom is not of this world," not him who said, "All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me."

I am very sorry that what I have written on this subject has given offense to Roman Catholics. I respect all sincere convictions; but it is necessary to tell some of our rulers plainly that the majority of Anglicans have no more wish to be "reconciled" with the Pope than with the Grand Lama. In plain language, we won't have it at any price. —Dean Inge in The Review of the Churches.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Editor.

NATIONAL CITY MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The work of City Missionaries is so inextricably bound up with Social Service in all its phases, particularly that in dealing with delinquents, that it is natural that those engaged in this branch of the ministry should wish to attend the National Conference of Social Workers and the preliminary meetings of Church workers that are now held from year to year, under the auspices of Dean Lathrop's Department of Social Service.

About five years ago, an effort was made to form a national organization of City Missionaries. It was rightly felt by those engaged in this kind of work that its problems are so different from those of the average parish clergyman, that it was wise to have the opportunity of getting together for discussion and exchange of views and methods of administration.

Two such meetings were held, the first in New York and the second in Boston, and then began the larger conferences of Social Workers, and the National Association of City Missionaries became a division, so to speak, of that body, but maintains its own organization and officers.

This year at Toronto there were present representatives from more than fifteen city missions, including an area that extended from St. Paul to New Orleans.

The chief topics of discussion were methods of finance and the missionaries' connection with institutions.

In some of the larger cities, like New York and Philadelphia, large institutions are entirely maintained by the City Missions organizations, but in most places these activities are confined to ministrations to the inmates of secular institutions, or those supported by other branches of the Church.

Officers were elected for the coming year as follows:

President, the Rev. E. F. Crary, of St. Paul, Minnesota; Vice-President, the Rev. R. F. Humphries of Baltimore; Secretary and Treasurer, the Rev. R. Cary Montague, Richmond, Va.

A program was planned for next year's meeting, which, as usual, will be a part of the National Conference.

CHRISTIAN STATESMANSHIP.

One of the great distinctions between social progress on the continent and in England, is that in the latter country Christianity and Christian ideals and principles have guided both the individuals and the groups, advocating new methods.

This is strikingly true of England's Labor Prime Minister, Ramsay MacDonald. He spoke the other day at the annual meeting of the Free Church Council of England and Wales, and his address on the subject of "The Social Implications of Christianity," is couched in such lofty language, expressing such high ideals, that it reads more like a sermon, than the speech of a public official. We quote herewith the following extract, which applies as truly to this country as it does to England:

We have to remember that the conscience of Christianity is this, that it is the human quality that alone matters. We are not out for quantities, we are not out for equality, we are out for quality—quality! And the finite can never receive quality except from the infinite, the earthly can never receive quality except from what is not earthly; the temporal can never receive quality except from the eternal. And only in so far as our churches seize upon that—and not churches only, but our politicians as well—seize upon that and bring you back, bring the nation back to those fundamental facts, can you pass what legislation you like, and your legislation will never fructify in the way that we should like to have it. Now there are one or two implications I should like to make from that. There is first of all, that you cannot solve, you cannot approach the solution of your social problems unless you remember that the spiritual must be the predominant. We live by faith not by sight. Few of us would live for twelve hours if the only reason for our life was our past experience; we would commit suicide. Life is not something justified by what has been: life is something justified by what is going to be. Toil, teaching, preaching, working for something: that is not done by us because we look to the past and say it has not only been hopeful but it has been completely satisfactory. Not at all! Not at all!

A man never works with his back to the future and his face to the past: a man can only work with his face to the future and his back to the past. And when we challenge ourselves with the question of Ecclesiastes, "How shall we discover that good for the sons of men which they should do under the Heaven all the days of their life?" you can begin at the beginning and you can go through the histories of all peoples and all nations and all ages, and you will not discover it. If you look five years ahead you do discover it. The good that is going to be a satisfactory good for conduct is in the future, not in the past. It is the promise: we are all Abrahams. None of us have yet got to the Land of Canaan. When we get to the final land of Canaan we shall discover our churchyards there. Therefore, my friends, do not let us make the mistake of assuming that materialism is a theological proposition. I am afraid some of you, from your pulpits preach against materialism, meaning by that a theological conception. Open out your minds! Open out your conceptions! Materialism relates not to belief, but to a conduct, to appreciation of value.

And another thing is this. You know it is very easy to apply Christianity to trifles, to be Christians in small deeds. It is tremendously difficult from the point of view of life the general point of view of life. And what we have got to remember is this—I have said it already and I'm going to repeat it—that what you are suffering from, what I am suffering from, what our generation and what the world is now suffering from, is that we have not got the courage to go right down to the sources of all those evils, and instead of spending our time patching here, patching there, patching elsewhere, to go out and say "why the bother is not in a man's nose, it is not in his brow; it is not in his little impediments here and there: the trouble is in his health, his general health. The trouble is in his mind. The trouble is in his general being, his general personality, his general conception of what is good and what is bad. And it may take us a little bit longer time, and it may require a little more patience."

So long as a man holding such views as these and recognizing the leadership of Our Saviour, is occupying the position, which next to that of the President of the United States, is probably the most powerful political office in the world, we cannot but feel that international affairs will yet right themselves, and move to a higher and safer plane more productive of the peace and happiness of God's children than any that the world has yet seen.

A Prayer.

O God, give me strength to live another day. Let me not turn coward before its difficulties or prove recreant to its duties. Let me not lose faith in my fellowmen. Keep me sweet and sound of heart, in spite of ingratitude, treachery, meanness. Preserve me from minding little stings or giving them. Help me to keep my heart clean, and to live so honestly and fearlessly that no outward failure can dishearten me or take away the joy of conscious integrity. Open wide the eyes of my soul that I may see good in all things. Grant me this day some new vision of Thy truth, inspire me with the spirit of joy and gladness and make me the cup of strength to suffering souls: in the name of the strong Deliverer, Our Only Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.—Phillips Brooks.

"It is quite natural and inevitable that if we spend sixteen hours daily of our working life in thinking about affairs of this world and about five minutes in thinking about God and our souls, this world will seem about two hundred times more real to us than God or our souls. That must be so, however real and important the spiritual world may actually be. The fact that it seems unreal to us is no argument that it is unreal, if we hardly ever think about it. Do not then argue that God is unreal because He seems unreal to you. Ask yourselves whether you have given Him, or rather yourselves, a fair chance." —Dean Inge.

WOMAN'S WORK IN THE CHURCH

Prepared at the Request of the Woman's Auxiliary

By Emily C. Tillotson, Acting Executive Secretary.

WE are living in a time when all that concerns the work of women is claiming the attention of thinking people. There is a growing realization of its importance as a factor in the life of the world and of its significance to society. Questions are continually arising as to the elements which enter into the whole situation; wherein lies the effectiveness and the strength of the contribution made by the work of women, and on the other hand, what are the factors which limit, retard or frustrate its complete accomplishment. Questions such as these have inevitably led to much discussion and beyond to the scientific study and careful research so familiar to-day. It is significant to find that the Church, as well as agencies regarded as "secular," recognizing the importance of the principle involved, has entered the field of research and has made an attempt to study the conditions which govern the work of women representing the Church in the mission fields at home and abroad as well as in diocese and parish. A Survey of the training requirements, conditions of work and salary standards for women workers in the Episcopal Church has lately been completed. This study was undertaken under the direction of the Woman's Auxiliary. It is of deep interest and profound significance.

The Executive Board of the Woman's Auxiliary, wishing to put before the Church a statement in regard to this Survey, has requested that a paper be prepared in which there shall be outlined the conditions which led to the making of the Survey, its aim and purpose and something of the details revealed by the questionnaire sent out.

The members of the Executive Board desire at the same time to express their deep appreciation of the work which has been and is now being done by our women workers in the mission field, both at home and abroad and to register their conviction that whatever of development in the work the future may bring will be made possible by the sure foundations laid by the devoted service of the women missionaries whose contribution to the establishment of the Kingdom of Christ throughout the world is beyond measure.

The Reason for the Survey.

The impulse which gave rise to this undertaking may be traced back to the Triennial of the Woman's Auxiliary held in St. Louis in 1916, when the Board of Missions invited the Auxiliary to "counsel and advise with the Board as regards the appointment of those who are supported by the United Thank Offering."

A committee, of which Miss Elizabeth Ray Delafield was chairman, was appointed to consider this matter, and at the next Triennial, held in Detroit in 1919, certain definite suggestions in regard to salary and training of the United Thank Offering workers were presented and adopted.

In addition to the direct responsibility resting upon the Woman's Auxiliary toward those missionaries supported by the United Thank Offering, there are certain other factors which should be mentioned as providing a reason for so important an undertaking as the making of a Survey. Many women appeal to the Auxiliary to assist them in their effort to find work under the Church. The Auxiliary is frequently asked to assist in securing women workers to fill vacant positions and is consulted about the qualifications of many applicants. This is a great responsibility and one which should be intelligently met. The Auxiliary, therefore, faced by such a situation, decided through its Executive Board that it was necessary to secure more exact information as to the kind of work the Church is now doing, and, in view of the expanding opportunities of the Church, the kind of work which should be done, especially the contribution which women workers have made and are making and the possibilities which lie before them for greater usefulness in the future.

It was realized that the need was not for a list of vacant positions, but for an analysis of types of work, based on the reports of representative groups of workers in the various fields of Church work.

The Making of the Survey.

The necessary information and a careful analysis of it could be obtained only by means of a Survey conducted according to the thoroughly scientific methods which make the modern survey valuable. The Auxiliary was fortunate in securing for this undertaking the services of Mrs. Graham R. Taylor, who was formerly engaged in publicity, research and investigations for the National Child Labor Committee and also made some studies of opportunities for women for the Chicago Collegiate Bureau of Occupations. Mrs. Taylor brought to her task not alone technical skill, but a sympathetic understanding of conditions prevailing in Church work, and a realization of the values which are paramount in any spiritual undertaking.

The Survey is looked upon by experts as an exceptionally brilliant piece of work, and the Auxiliary is glad to record its gratitude to Mrs. Taylor and a deep appreciation of the contribution which she has made.

It was recognized that any analysis of types of work would show (1) whether the workers feel that the Church offers opportunities for service which are unique; (2), whether the work is sufficiently distinct from all other fields of work to be regarded as a separate vocation; (3), whether standards of work compare favorably with other vocations for women; (4), whether special training is required; (5), whether Church work provides a living for a woman who must be self-supporting and offers opportunities for advancement or salary increase.

It is evident that the Church must compete with other fields of work open to women in securing candidates capable of doing the best work, and to do so successfully it is necessary to convince them that the Church has work of exceptional importance and special interest to offer which, while furnishing the opportunity for the fullest measure of self-giving, at the same time provides a living under working conditions that compares favorably with the other occupations.

Some Conditions Revealed by the Survey.

The reports received from the five hundred and twenty-three workers have been classified under nine fields of work, among the subjects covered being the following: Educational background of the workers, the method by which they secured their positions, and the Standards of work maintained. Under the last, the main points upon which information was sought included conditions such as hours of work and length of vacations, salaries, method of salary increase and the requirements of the work in regard to the age, education, training and experience of the workers, also whether or not there is opportunity for properly prepared workers to advance to positions of greater responsibility if they prove their fitness, etc. The replies are of the greatest value as giving a cross-section, as it were, of conditions which govern the life and work of the women, who, in this country, are engaged in various capacities in work for the Church. The returns are considered to be representative of the various fields of work in the Church and of different sections of the country.

Training Requirements.

It is interesting to learn from the report that except in education and hospital work and some social service work, there has been little demand for the technically trained worker. These three types of work come in competition with similar work in the secular field, where training is required, and this makes it necessary for the Church to establish similar standards.

Hours.

In the secular world the subject of proper hours of work is rightly considered of the utmost importance. The result upon the work and the worker of too long a working day is sufficiently serious to call for careful consideration. It is disquieting, therefore, to find that far too many of our women workers have no definite hours of work with proportionate hours of rest and recreation. In most cases this is due to a sense of service so fine that the idea of a seven or eight hour day does not enter in. It is, nevertheless, unfortunate both from the point of view of the welfare of the worker and the effectiveness of the work.

Salaries and Standards of Work.

The Survey seems to reveal also that there are no definite standards of work and that the salaries of workers are below those in other occupations for like service. Out of the five hundred and twenty-three reporting, only forty-four workers reported a salary of $1,800 a year and over, twenty-nine of these without living; while one hundred and sixty-three workers were receiving less than $900, fifty-four of these without living.

Contrary to experience in secular callings, the salaries of the workers apparently have not increased with their experience. A study of secular social work shows that the salary increases very materially as the years of experience increase, whereas according to the Survey, the Church worker who has had a long term of service has no corresponding advantage.

Conclusions.

"The Church at large has not yet realized the necessity for expert work. Consequently there are more potential than actual opportunities for women who are capable of promoting the activities of the Church, but who will not undertake to do so until the need for trained workers has been recognized and salary standards adjusted.

"To do its work properly the Church requires women whose spiritual background will make for the more permanent solution of the community and world problems, and whose training in the various professions will bring technical skill to the Church's work.

"What the Church needs is to be able to present its work as supremely worth while. To do so it must have well organized work with high standards, requiring training as well as devotion to maintain. In addition to which salaries must be provided which should be adequate to put trained Church workers on the same footing as trained workers in other fields."

It is difficult to see how conclusions such as these can be gainsaid.

Throughout the pages of the Survey one fact beyond all others stands revealed—the absolute devotion and entire consecration of the women who have devoted their lives to the service of the Church. Too often without proper equipment, with meager salaries and lacking the training which would have so greatly helped them, these women have been sent by the Church to accomplish difficult and important tasks, and these tasks have been done with a courage and self-effacement which are beyond all praise. The Survey recognizes and repeatedly affirms the fact well known to all who are familiar with the work done in the mission field, that nothing short of that same invincible spirit of entire consecration will suffice for the women who today must carry on the work in which such traditions have been established. But it affirms with equal force the necessity for a preparation and equipment commensurate with the difficulties and opportunities of the time in which we live.

If the Church is to be a growing force in the world today, touching not alone segments of life, but the whole of life, back of all the work done by those sent out must lie certain great principles, sacrificial devotion to human welfare, which has its roots in the great fact of the Incarnation, and that deep understanding of social forces which is developed by proper education and training. Without such background, service for the Church falls short of its full fruition. The Church seldom looks in vain among its women workers for the first. Will it require and then make possible the second? This study of the work of women in the Episcopal Church is a challenging and an arresting document with far-reaching implications. If it can be instrumental in pointing the way toward a deeper realization by the Church of the wonderful possibilities in the service of its women workers, with the acceptance of the consequent responsibility for the necessary readjustments called for, the purpose which prompted the undertaking will be abundantly realized.

Church Intelligence

The Church Mission of Help.

The Church Mission of Help, an instrument of the Episcopal Church in the hands of the clergy and social case workers, for dealing with the difficult personal problems of youth, was well represented at the recent Conference in Toronto of Social Service Workers of the Protestant Episcopal Church and of the Church of England in Canada. Twenty-five members of the Church Mission of Help came from various sections of the United States. A conference was held at a sectional meeting, where Church Mission of Help activities, national, diocesan and parochial were presented. Following these papers the Canadian Social Workers, who were presented. Following these papers the Canadian Social Workers who were present were called upon to present the work being done in this specialized field in Canada. It was of real fact and to this contributions were made benefit to discuss these common problems with our Canadian friends over the border.

At a joint meeting of the Church Mission of Help, Girls' Friendly Society, and Brotherhood of St. Andrew, mutually helpful suggestions were offered by the speakers representing these three organizations as to how the Church can assist parents in meeting troublesome present-day problems of the home.

At a group luncheon publicity methods were discussed. The special speakers, Mr. Warfield Hobbs, the well-known editor of the "Spirit of Missions," and Mrs. Clara S. Capp, of the New York Church Mission of Help, emphasized the importance of carefully planned publicity.

The Church Mission of Help is at work in fourteen dioceses of the Episcopal Church. Its method is accepted slowly, but its faith lies in the belief that Church people are back of this movement to reach young people who are in need of adjustment.

An Educational Experiment.

In a folder prepared for visitors to Vassar College we read the following, "An educational experiment of extraordinary import was undertaken, at Poughkeepsie, New York, in 1821." Again an educational experiment of, we trust, extraordinary import was undertaken at Vassar College in 1924, when, from June 14 to 21, one hundred and seventy women, representing nineteen states, eleven nations, numerous religious and educational bodies and civic and philanthropic organizations, met to study "A Christian Basis of World Relations."

It was a big subject but interesting because of its bigness, and the method adopted in its study added to that interest.

The Institute, as a whole, decided on three main divisions: Racial Economic and Political, as barriers to world cooperation. It then divided itself into four groups, which met each morning for an hour and a half, during which time the popular "discussion method" was followed. At the close of the period the group leaders met to study the results of the discussions and the conclusions arrived at were presented to the body as a whole later in the day.

A certain number of experts had been secured to be ready when needed and the selection of speakers was determined by the need expressed by the Institute.

Of course, more light was desired on various phases of the main subject and to this contribution were made by Vassar, Columbia, New York City College, Swarthmore, Howard, Foreign Policy Association, Institute of International Education, and experts from China, Japan, and Latin-America. Mr. Will Irwin, author of The Next War, was present the entire week, and his impressions will be interesting to read when they appear in the fall.

At the last two sessions the groups met as representing organizations and the final session of the Institute was devoted to the presentation of practical suggestions as to what was to be the next step.

A summary of the week will be sent to the Educational Department of the Woman's Auxiliary with a brief Bibliography on International Relations, and Church women will do well to familiarize themselves with it before making plans for fall programs.

As the members of the Institute said good-bye to one another and looked again with admiring eyes on the dignified buildings and beautiful campus, they felt that "The Founder," Matthew Vassar, would have welcomed this latest use of the college that bears his name.

Ninth Annual Session of Virginia Summer School for the Four Virginia Dioceses and Washington.

This year's two weeks' session of the Conference for Workers in the State of Virginia, West Virginia, and the Diocese of Washington, was more successful than ever. Held in its new quarters at Sweet Briar College, the registration reached three hundred and twenty-five, representing five dioceses. Five Bishops were present at different times throughout the sessions, and delivered addresses at the evening services in the chapel.

Sweet Briar College is an ideal situation for this kind of school. Its buildings are large and commodious, affording ample accommodations for the students, and plenty of class rooms for the lectures. It is situated on a high hill, with beautiful grounds, equipped with tennis courts, and a lovely little lake within five minutes' walk, offers rowing and swimming.

The faculty this year consisted of the Rev. E. R. Carter, D. D., Dean; the Rev. Messrs. J. C. Wagner, C. E. McAllister, T. N. Coley, D. D., K. M. Block, D. D., R. Cary Montague; Mrs. W. L. Wishart, Mrs. C. N. Davidson, Mrs. John Loman, Mrs. Walter Ruan, Miss Nellie Steward.

The courses covered every phase of church work, including young people's activities, social service and special lectures on the mission field.

It is most gratifying to note that the time has passed when such gatherings are made up of middle-aged ladies and clergymen. The young people were really in the majority and a good many boys and young men attended and took courses in the Bible and social service, as well as in their own special lines.

A new feature of this conference were classes in Child Psychology, taught by the Rev. J. C. Wagner. They were particularly helpful to the Sunday-school teachers, and also many parents found them useful, in helping them to a better understanding of the whims and moods of their own children.

BETHLEHEM

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Coadjutor.

Anniversaries.

From June 15 to 19, St. James' Church, Pittston, celebrated its Seventy-fifth Anniversary. Dr. George A. Foley, of the Philadelphia Divinity School, started the celebration by preaching at both Morning and Evening Prayer on Sunday. Dr. Foley was one of the rectors more than fifty years ago. He was delighted to find that a few of his former parishioners were as yet alive and active in the church.

The Convocation of Scranton met in St. James during this week. This brought practically all the clergy of the Convocation to the celebration. Both the Bishops attended and made addresses as did also the Archdeacon, who built the present church in 1904.

Preparatory to the glad occasion the church was renovated, a new organ was installed; a beautiful reredos was put in, new carpet, kneelers for the pews, some fine pictures in the basement. The Rev. Mr. Neikirk deserves and received many and hearty congratulations.

On June 19, 1924, was celebrated the One Hundredth Anniversary of the consecration of St. Matthew's Church, Stevensville. This event brought a large concourse of people from the surrounding country, some coming from Wilkes-Barre and Scranton more than sixty miles away. The early records show that Bishop White visited this church several times. Jackson Kemper, for a time, was the missionary in this region before he was made a Bishop.

Since the death of the Rev. George Hopkins in 1902 the services in the church were very intermittent and finally the church was closed. In 1921 the Archdeacon visited the place and held a mission. This revived the hopes of the few faithful communicants remaining and since that time services have been held by the Rev. Ralph Weatherly, rector of St. Paul's Church, Montrose. He renders very acceptable service as a labor of love.

Bishop Talbot preached two inspiring sermons and confirmed a class of four. In the afternoon short addresses were made by the following clergy: the Rev. Messrs. Weatherhold of Philadelphia, McKinley of White Haven, Frear of State College, Weir of Sayre, and the Archdeacon. Letters of regret that they could not attend were read from the Rev. Messrs. Hinks of Susquehanna, Pa., Wagner of Diocese of New Jersey, Brinckenhoff of Central New York, Archdeacon Radcliffe of Erie, Archdeacon Cox of Bethlehem. Those who spoke and those who sent letters were in charge for a time of the church.

Bethlehem Summer School.

The School was held from June 23-28 at Bishopthorpe Manor. The enrollment was a few over one hundred. Those who have attended most of the summer schools in the diocese, declare that this was the best. A splendid spirit prevailed all through the sessions; the faculty was excellent; the evening entertainment added much to the vision and enjoyment. The Rev. P. Lindel Tsen, of China, spoke most interestingly and enthusiastically about the Church in China; Bishop Carson gave a most gripping description of his work in Haiti; Mr. W. H. Danner, the American Secretary of the Mission to Lepers, gave an illustrated lecture on leper work in all the world. This was truly a revelation to the school. Friday night was "Stunt Night," put on by the members of the G. F. S. and the E. Y. P. S. Everybody voted to have a school next year.

An Advance Step.

The Bishop and Council on the recommendation of the Department of Religious Education, voted to put an Educational Secretary in the field who should spend his or her whole time in visiting and helping the Church Schools of the Diocese. Miss Zattan Gordon, one of the members of the faculty, was offered the appointment and has accepted it.

Our Bishops.

Bishop Sterrett, during the commencement period, received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from his Alma Mater, the Philadelphia Divinity School, of Doctor of Laws from Hobart College. He and his family have gone to their cottage in the mountains near Wilkes-Barre, where they will spend the summer.

Bishop Talbot sailed on June 5 on the Carmania, a Cunarder, accompanied by his daughter, who is now his secretary, since the marriage of his former secretary, Miss Bessie R. Jeter, to the Rev. Mr. Haskill, of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.

Bishop Talbot has been invited to take part in the consecration of the Cathedral in Liverpool, England. He also has invitations to visit the Bishop of London and the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Presiding Bishop and his secretary will also make a short visit to France, but will spend most of the time in England, expecting to return the first week in October.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Sisters of St. John Baptist.

The last week in June brought the fiftieth anniversary of the American organization of the Community of the Sisters of St. John Baptist, affiliated with the Mother House at Clewer, established in 1851. The Mother House in this country is now at Ralston with the Convent and Schools, in the Diocese of Newark, while work goes on in New York City, at Mamaroneck, in St. Helen's School, Portland, Oregon, and in other places: A considerable number of friends came together on St. John Baptist Day, and, on the twenty-sixth of June at Ralston, Representatives of several other Communities were present and many friends and young women who had been in the schools, came back for the notable anniversary. On the twenty-sixth, at the morning service, the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Johnson, of Boston, and in the afternoon at a brief service, an address was made by Bishop Lines. The day was a beautiful one for an out-of-door gathering and it would be hard to find a more beautiful country than that in which the Convent and Schools are placed.

The Preparatory School of the Sisterhood stands apart from the Convent, within which the girls of St. Anna's School live, while St. Marguerite's School for the younger children, is in a separate building. In these schools nearly one hundred girls, many from broken up homes, are taught and trained and happier groups of girls will be nowhere found. The Rev. James F. Aitkins is now warden and chaplain of the Sisterhood, and the Bishop of Newark is the Visitor.

Conference at Eagle's Nest Farm.

About fifty of the clergy were present at the Summer Conference at Eagle's Nest Farm in the last week of June. Bishop Stearly, Bishop Tucker, the Rev. Dr. Hatch and Diocesan clergy were among the lecturers. July and August are filled with appointments of various groups of young people, the Brotherhood Conference, the Girls' Friendly Society, choirs, etc. The plans for the building at Eagle's Nest Farm of the Holiday House of the Girls' Friendly Society are being made, and also plans for the collection of the needed money. This farm of one hundred and eighty acres came to the Diocese through the generosity of Mrs. Sarah E. Albertson and Miss Ellen M. Cummins and is beautifully situated upon the Delaware river, and the hills rising above it, about eight miles below the Delaware Water Gap.

The Rev. Gabriel Farrell, Jr., after five years of very useful service as Canon Missioner of the Diocese for Religious Education, has resigned to accept a call to the rectorship of the church at Rhinebeck, New York. He will be greatly missed in the Diocese, where he has done much to stir up an interest in the Church Schools and to foster the Young People's Fellowship.

The Thirtieth Anniversary of St. Mark's Church, Paterson, was observed on June 15. A determined effort will be made this year to diminish or remove the burdensome debt caused by the erection of the new church, after the great fire in Paterson in 1902.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. J. E. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. A. Penick, D. D., Coadjutor.
Rt. Rev. H. E. Delaney, D. D., Suffragan.

Mission for the Deaf.

The Church of the Holy Comforter, Burlington, the Rev. Thos. F. Opie, rector, has lately added to its activities a mission for the deaf of the community under the Rev. R. C. Fortune, a deaf minister of Durham, who now makes regular visits to the city. On Sunday, June 22, Mr. Fortune held service and about fifty deaf mutes attended. On the night before, a lawn party for the deaf was held and there-were deaf mutes present from Raleigh, Greensboro, High Point, Durham and elsewhere. It was an occasion much enjoyed. Mr. Fortune is one of the leaders among the deaf of North Carolina, and possibly no man in the State has a wider influence with the deaf, nor does more for their spiritual and general welfare. His mission work in Burlington was made possible by the Holt Missionary Fund. A weekly Bible class is held under the auspices of the Church, led by one of the men of the deaf colony. During the summer months Mr. Worth Wicker, a Virginia Seminary student from this parish, will assist the rector, devoting his time especially to the work in the county.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, D. D., Coadjutor.

Trinity Church, Mobile, the Rev. V. C. McMaster, rector, has recently been presented with a handsome brass Litany Desk, by Mr. James H. Caldwell, senior warden of St. John's Church, Troy, N. Y., in memory of his only son, John C. Caldwell.

St. John's Church, Ensley, the Rev. Edmonds Bennett, rector, has nearly doubled its quota for Japan, and more contributions are expected. The Woodmen had their annual service at St. John's this year.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Conference For Young People.

A diocesan conference for young people, the first held in the Diocese of East Carolina, which met with St. Paul's, Greenville, on June 24, 25 and 26, was a great success from every standpoint. An effort was made to have three hundred young people attend, and the number present was only slightly under that figure.

The Rev. Gordon M. Reese, Canon of the Cathedral in St. Louis, was the conference leader, and was assisted by Mrs. H. G. Walker, diocesan secretary for Young People's Work, and other leaders in East Carolina. The conference and mass meetings were held in the Greenville High School class rooms and auditoriums, and the devotional services in St. Paul's Church.

The need for some parochial organizations through which the young people can advance the cause of the Church and express their own desire for service was stressed. Sample programs of the Young People's Service League were given. As a result of the conferences and discussion, it was decided to perfect a diocesan organization. A committee of the young people was appointed to nominate the diocesan organization. It was decided to petition the Executive Council of the Diocese to employ a whole-time secretary to promote this work.

The devotional services of the conference were a splendid feature. There was an early celebration of the Holy Communion each morning in St. Paul's, to which practically all of the delegates went. Mr. Reese conducted services of preparation on the evening preceding. On the second day of the conference, the Rt. Rev. T. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, made an inspirational address to the young people.

The recreational features of the conference added greatly to the pleasure of the delegates. The whole afternoon of the second day was given over to recreation, beginning with a barbecue dinner at the Country Club. Under the leadership of Mr. Reese, many games and "stunts" revealed the possibilities of fun at a conference of this sort. The rector of St. Paul's, the Rev. James E. W. Cook, and his people, worked untiringly for the success of the conference.

Interesting Services at Old Christ Church.

The semi-annual all-day meeting at Old Christ Church was held on St. Peter's Day (second Sunday after Trinity), June 29. At 10:30 the Bishop of the Diocese celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Louis L. Williams, of Delmar.

The intense heat, and threatening storm kept many away, but at the 2:30 P. M. service the large church was filled, and many were not able to get seats. The sermon was by the Bishop, from 2 Corinthians 3:4 and 5, and was a call for permanent, rather than spasmodic, religion.

Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. W. A. Darbie, of Seaford, and the Rev. Louis L. Williams. The present Christ Church, the cornerstone of which was laid in 1771, was built as a Chapel of Ease to Stepney Parish in Maryland, now in the Diocese of Easton, and many Churchmen of that Diocese are still interested in the semi-annual meetings held in the early summer and late fall.

Work in Logan County.

The Rev. W. H. Cumpston, rector of the Church in Lundale, Logan County, conducted services at the Aracoma Hotel in Logan Courthouse on Sunday, June 22. This was the first service of the church for some years in Logan Courthouse. Much enthusiasm was shown by the twenty-five Episcopalians present and hope was expressed that a permanent organization may be established. Arrangements were made to conduct services in the afternoon of the first and third Sundays of the month. Mr. Cumpston is the only Episcopal minister in Logan County and his work is primarily with the Logan County Coal Corporation at Lundale, ministering to all Protestants and having supervision of all the welfare work at the workings.

Cornerstone Laid of a New Parish House.

On Tuesday afternoon, June 24, the Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., laid the cornerstone of the handsome new Parish House of Trinity Church, Huntington, the Rev. S. Roger Tyler, rector. The service was a very impressive one with addresses by representatives of the Huntington Chamber of Commerce, the Church Building Committee, the Local Ministerial Association, and the Bishop of the Diocese. The parish house when complete will cost $85,000 and will be modern in every respect. The Church in Huntington has enjoyed an unusual growth in recent years.

Golden Anniversary of Grace Church, Paducah.

The Golden Jubilee celebration of Grace Church, Paducah, the Rev. Custis Fletcher, rector, began on Friday evening, June 20, with a banquet of the Men's Club of the parish. The Very Rev. R. L. McCready, Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville, was the speaker. Taking for his subject, "Opportunity," Dean McCready spoke of the opportunity of the Church to wield an influence toward bringing about world peace, and urged the congregation to take their part in carrying on the two great purposes for which America stands in the world today, first the dissemination of the democratic ideal of government and the freeing of the world of the curse of war.

The services on Sunday included celebrations of the Holy Communion at 7:30 and 9:30, with Morning Prayer, and sermon by the Rt. Rev. Charles ... Woodcock, D. D., Louisville, Bishop of the Diocese, at 10:45; and Evening Prayer at 8:00 with sermon by the Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Texas, and a former rector of Grace Church.

Among the gifts to the Church, which were dedicated during the celebration, were memorial windows, chancel lights, lantern lights, Book of Remembrance, and the handsome tiling in the chancel.

In addition to Bishops Woodcock and Quin, the visiting clergy present were Dean McCready and Canon Hardy of Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville, the Rev. James L. Martin of Henderson, and the Rev. George C. Abbott, of Grace Church, Hopkinsville.

The beginning of Grace Church history was the organization of a band of faithful few in the early "forties," prior to the year 1848, which is the date of the first authentic Church records. The earliest records of the Church show the baptism of infants by the Rev. Caleb Dow, missionary in charge, from February 3, 1848, to October 7, 1851.

The parish was organized in the home of Adam Rankin in the city of Paducah by the Rev. William Cowgill, and shortly thereafter a modest little church building was erected on Market Street, now Second Street, between Washington and Clark Streets.

The history of Grace Church is a history of a people led forward by a vision of better things to come, of great faith and consecrated devotion. It is a record of noble effort, self-sacrifice, and splendid triumphs; a story of small beginnings and great attainment.

"Homecoming Sunday" at Christ Church Parish.

Sunday, June 29, was "Home-coming Sunday" at Christ Church ("King Carter's") Christ Church Parish, Lancaster County. Between three and four hundred persons were present, many coming from a distance.

The first service was held at eleven o'clock, conducted by the Rt. Rev. William Cabell Brown, D. D., assisted by the Rev. L. R. Combs, rector. Several persons were confirmed, and Holy Communion was celebrated.

At one-thirty lunch was served in the church yard, and every one was made to feel most welcome.

At three o'clock, the Bishop again addressed a still larger congregation. The services were most impressive, and greatly enjoyed by all present.

Christ Church was built in 1735 by Col. Robert Carter, and is the only church in Virginia built by one man and preserved exactly as it was when it came from the hands of the builders.

There has recently been consecrated to the Glory of God and in memory of Mrs. Mary Bush, a handsomely carved quartered oak altar rail in St. Paul's Church, Waco, the Rev. W. P. Witsell, rector. This fitting memorial was presented by the children of the late Mrs. Bush, who was a daughter and widow of clergymen, and a sister of three clergymen, and herself a long-time devoted to the Church.

St. Paul's House has just been rebuilt through the interest and generosity of Mrs. William W. Cameron. By this enlargement, the House has been doubled in capacity for service. Already fulfilling a splendid ministry to the Cotton Mill District of Waco, it will now be enabled to increase both the extent and efficiency of that service. These things have been so thoroughly recognized by observers of the work that the Miller Cotton Mill has donated $1,000 toward erecting a cottage on the grounds as a dwelling place for the matron and her family, and has made a pledge for $35 a month toward the sustaining fund of the work, thus releasing the whole of St. Paul's House for service. The Twine Mill, another institution in the same section, contributes regularly to the current fund of the work. As an appreciation of the service rendered, its broad-minded and public-spirited president, Mr. J. Bayliss Earle, raised a generous fund for furnishing the settlement house more adequately. These evidences of cooperation are tremendously valuable, far beyond any financial estimate, for they are substantial testimonies to the value of the work that St. Paul's Church is doing through this institution.

Dedication Service at Madison Heights.

On the evening of July 1 an interesting service was held in Emmanuel Church, Madison Heights; the occasion being the dedication of three handsome windows, each a memorial to two persons, these being, respectively: the Rev. J. H. Williams, founder of the church and the Rev. Thomas Howell, a former rector; William Butler and Rachael Butler, Rachael Elizabeth Bantom and Robert Sidney Loving. The Rev. Thomas M. Browne, rector of St. John's Church, Lynchburg, assisted by the Rev. Carleton Barnwell, rector of Grace Church, Lynchburg, conducted the service. Colonel William King, Jr., on behalf of the vestry and congregation, accepted the memorials from the donors, and Bishop Jett dedicated the memorials and made the address. The choir was assisted by the choir of St. John's Church. There was a large congregation, and the service was unusually impressive.

Miss Matsu wore the Japanese costume, and, after a short talk, gave some interesting demonstrations of Japanese manners and customs. Iced tea and cake were served by the ladies of the Auxiliary. Miss Matsu has just graduated from Goucher College, and expects to return to Japan July 1, where she will teach in St. Agnes' School.

Martin's Brandon Parish.

Almost within one month's time we have suffered two tremendous losses in our work here.

On May 17 God called into His more immediate keeping the spirit of the widely known and well-beloved patriot and senior warden of Old Merchant's Hope Church, William Henry Harrison. For the last two years or more Mr. Harrison's health had been rapidly failing. Only infrequently had he been able to attend the services in the old church on whose vestry he had served loyally for nearly fifty years. He was one of the last three or four survivors of the Prince George Cavalry, into whose ranks he went as a mere boy and among whom he was known as "Baby Harrison." He was born January 29, 1844. Died suddenly of heart trouble on May 17, 1924. He is survived by his wife, Annie Emily; one daughter, Mrs. J. V. Simmons, of Disputanta, Va.; and six sons, Charles Edward, of Goochland County; Henry Robert, of Philadelphia; William Hart, Herbert Heath, Edward Valentine, and William Hugh, of Prince George County.

On June 21, after an illness of three days, William Benjamin Figg, Senior Warden of Brandon Church and a member of the Board of Supervisors of Prince George County from Brandon District, was called to join the spirits of those who have departed this life in the faith of Jesus Christ. He was a consecrated, earnest, and loyal member of Brandon Church and served on its vestry for nearly twenty years. He was born August 31, 1853. Died of heart trouble on June 21, 1924. He is survived by his wife, Evelyn Clarke; two daughters, Mrs. W. H. Marks and Mrs. T. F. Clary; four sons, the Rev. Alfred Figg, of Christiansburg, Va., William Henry, Dewitt Clinton, and Kenneth Leslie of Prince George; one brother, Charles C., and one sister, Susie F. Figg.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D.

The Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, new rector of Epiphany Church, preached his first sermons there on Sunday, July 6, at the morning and evening services. The services were in the nature of special celebrations, marking not only the first Sunday of the new rector's rectorate, but also the eightieth anniversary of the first service in Epiphany Church. Dr. Phillips will leave the city for a much-needed rest, after his active work in Philadelphia and will assume full charge of the parish in September.

The Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, was the preacher at the eleven o'clock service at Trinity Diocesan Church on Sunday, July 6, and at the open-air Cathedral service in the afternoon of the same day. Bishop Cook was formerly rector of St. Michael's and All Angels Church, Baltimore, and is well known to many of the Washington people.

Rev. John Rigg, rector of St. Thomas' Church, at Croome, Md., has been appointed provincial leader of the Society of the Nazarene for the Province of Washington. The next national convention of the Society will be held in Washington and the Rev. Mr. Rigg is already making plans for the meeting. The convention will be held in Trinity Diocesan Church from September 14 to September 19. On each day there will be a session in the morning with address and in the evening a mission service. The Society of the Nazarene is an organization of clergy and laity whose endeavor is to revive the practice of Christian healing.

The National Education Association, which brought to Washington in convention more than twenty thousand people interested in the cause of education, opened their meetings with a service on the capitol steps in the afternoon of Sunday, June 29, and in the evening of the same day, held a meeting at the stadium of Central High School, the subject of which was "Religious and Moral Education in the Public Schools." Five speakers, presenting the subject from different view points, drove home very forcibly the need of such education, because of the appalling percentage of homes where children are unchurched and completely out of touch with any religious atmosphere whatsoever.

The many interesting and helpful sessions of the convention, throughout the week were terminated on Independence Day by Patriotic Pilgrimages in and around Washington to shrines and places of meaning in the history of the country and of these one was a pilgrimage to Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, where lies the remains of Woodrow Wilson. A large number of people gathered around the Peace Cross and listened to an address by Dr. Joyner, a native of North Carolina, a personal friend of the late War President, and a former President of the National Education Association. After this, all quietly went to the Bethlehem Chapel and standing in reverent silence, placed a wreath in the niche marked with the name of Woodrow Wilson, doing this in the name of the Association and in honor of Woodrow Wilson and the ideals for which his name will ever stand.

O God, the Protector of all that trust in Thee, without Whom nothing is strong, nothing is holy; Increase and multiply upon us Thy mercy; that, Thou being Our Ruler and Guide, we may so pass through things temporal, that we finally lose not the things eternal. Grant this, O Heavenly Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, Our Lord. Amen.

A Morning Prayer.

"Ye are.... an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices."

Here at the mercy-seat, O Lord, I wait
To hear Thy voice and heed Thy blest commands;

What errands wilt Thou send my feet upon?
What priestly service hast Thou for my hands?

Anoint me here for all the day may bring,
Whatever sacrifice Thou shalt require;

Ah, they are all so small when made for Thee,
Though I should lay my best upon the fire.

Clothe me with that fair, seamless garment clean;
My righteousness from Thee alone must spring.

And may the golden bells upon its hem
All day the music of Thy praises ring.

And grant, as on my humble tasks I go,
In blue and scarlet decked—Thy love and grace—

That I may bear about me all the day
The lingering incense of the holy place.

I Am the Ministry.

The Rev. Thos. F. Opie, D. D.

The work of the ministry.—Ephes. 4:12.

I am the ministry. I am your servant. I am your spiritual adviser and counselor. I am your friend-in-God—your brother-in-Christ. "In his duty prompt at every call, he watched and wept and felt and prayed for all."

I keep the Church open. I remind you of eternal verities and of God. I baptize your children and marry your young men and your young women. I pray over the wayward and weep with you in your sorrow and laugh with you in your joys. I am the friend of man. I am God's ambassador. I am the sacred ministry.

I keep aflame the altars of faith and hope and love. I extend to you the sacraments and the services of God's sanctuary. I am he who "negotiates between God and man, as God's ambassador, the grand concerns of judgment and of mercy."

I am the ministry. I stand for sacrifice and for service; for brotherhood and for friendship. I am not always brotherly, nor always friendly—for I am of human stuff, as you are, but I represent brotherhood and friendship at their best. I stand for the Church, for God, and for eternal truth.

I stand against oppression, dishonesty and injustice. I stand against sin, satan and selfishness. I stand against the enemies of God, because they are the enemies of man. I stand against the enemies of man, because they are the enemies of God. I stand against the traducers of youth and the exploiters of childhood.

I am the sacred Ministry. I reach back to Luther and to Savanorola. I go back to Paul and to Peter—and to the blessed Christ, Himself, my pattern and my Chief Captain. I go back to Isaiah and to Hezekiah—to Moses and to Elijah. I number among my membership noble seers and mighty prophets and fearless advocates of righteousness.

I reach out to man and up to God. I point men to truth, to goodness and to beauty. I point men to the personification of these in the Christ. To me strong men disclose their weaknesses and pour out their heart's bitternesses. Mothers weep with me over their wayward children and children come to me seeking the Saviour.

I am the sacred Ministry. God keep me pure and clean, God keep me loving, brave and true; God keep me honest, helpful, loyal; God make me worthy of my high calling; God keep down my false accusers, my destructive critics and my foul foes; God give me souls; God give me character; God give me ideals for my hire; God give me strong men, pure women and sweet and lovely children for my recompense of reward. God give me the support, the help the loyal love and the loving loyalty of many strong hearts and hands and many ready wills to help me in my great task of world-betterment.

I am the Ministry—but little can I do without that other ministry—the great ministry of every soul and servant called of God, O give me the ready hearts and heads and hands of good men and noble women! Give me the useful lives of the rich and the great, the sacred lives of the poor and the humble, the loving and consecrated help of children! Give me faithful choir singers and devoted guild leaders; give me sacrificing officials, willing directors and glad and enthusiastic helpers. God give me the pew, the home, the shop; give me the men and women who build business. Without these I can do nothing. God give them me!

I am the Ministry. Never forsake me; never despise me. Never belittle me; ever advise me. Never refuse me; never abuse me—but ever use me. You and I—we are the larger ministry! Together we may remove mountains. Together we may create a new world order. We may usher in sweet Heaven and eternal peace. Together we may smooth out rough places and straighten out crooked places. We may make the earth blossom like the rose and cause the Spirit of God to cover the land as the waters cover the seas. We are the sacred Ministry! God make us and ever keep us worthy of our high calling.

Are All the Children In?

"Are all the children in?" Across the years

I hear that question of parental love,
I see the storm clouds gather in the sky;
The sun go out; the forest, pale and still,
Await its struggle with the tempest's blast;
The reapers hastening home across the fields;
The lurid lightning's gleam, the thunder crash,
The wind-swept dust—and then 'tis Father's voice,
So clear and strong: "Are all the children in?"

"Are all the children in?" The night is past.

A new day dawning calls men forth to meet

They know not what of duty, joy, or trial.

A rising household feels its need of God
And round the family altar comes to pray.

Thanks for past mercies! Grace to meet new needs!

The Sacred Word to light the daily path!
And God's own hand to lead the whole day through!

And from the open Bible on his knee
The priest and father lifts his eyes and asks

Before he reads: "Are all the children in?"

'Tis evening now:

The sunlight slowly fades above the trees,

And, one by one, the stars are coming out,

And, one by one, into the shadowy porch
Come those who form the household, resting there

To breathe the fragrant air, to watch the stars,

To dream of days gone by, of days to come,

While tinkling bells in twilight meadows blend

Their music with the cricket's call of peace.

And Mother comes—the last to leave her task—

And gently asks: "Are all the children in?"

Thank God for tender memories like these,
For words that ring across the fleeting years;

For homes where days begin, pass, end with God!

Far, far away and weary many times
With longing for the joy and peace of home,

I hear again: "Are all the children in?"
And know that to the Mercy Seat I'm borne

In arms of love and faith and constant prayer

By Father and by Mother who each day
Bring all their children in.

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

The Day of Rest.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

We have filled a manuscript volume with events of Tuesday in Holy Week. Wednesday was as long, but there were no events. It is an inference that Our Lord rested in Bethany, and spent much of the day talking with Mary His mother, but it is a safe inference. So far as quiet preparation, as careful forewarning, as fathomless love could soften the agony of bereavement for her, it was softened. This, too, is inference; and yet how certain! He took a day off from His work and spent it with His mother.

No one has painted a picture of mother and Son, on the crest of the ridge above Bethany, watching the sunset. In the clouds of the horizon she sees dim pictures of the Annunciation, the Nativity, the Presentation, the Visit of the Magi, and the unrecorded events of His life. Before them, black against a lurid storm-cloud, is the Crucifixion. But beyond, dimmed in the light that never was on sea or land, is the Resurrection; and beyond that, the Ascension and the immeasurable glory of the ages to come. The angels who had charge lest He so much as dash His foot against a stone—even they must have withdrawn a little from that interview. The adversary was there, of course; but very far withdrawn, into the shadow. Yet he was triumphant, not downcast. A little more and he would grasp his prey.

A Kingdom Not of This World.

Those were immortal words which our Lord spoke to the representative of Caesar's kingdom when He said: "My kingdom is not of this world." These words should be kept ringing in the ears of the Church throughout all times. It is a message the Church very much needs to take to heart in our day and generation.

As always, the Church's danger is worldliness—conformity to the world's thoughts, its beliefs, its spirit, its methods. In the early Christian centuries the Church was tempted to link arms with heathenism in its higher cultural form, and was in large measure conformed to its thought and spirit. In later centuries it became wedded to worldly power and magnificence, and conformed its methods of administration with it. Today the Church is being enticed into the vast and attractive domain of the social, intellectual and cultural life of the world and is imitating its spirit and method.

Worldliness is world-likeness. It is the foe to Christlikeness. It is the mixing up of things spiritual with things temporal in such manner as to rob the spiritual of its regenerating and transforming power. It breeds indifference to the faith of the Gospel and conforms it to the thinking of the world. It breeds indifference to the Church's real mission, and introduces into the Church's activities a spirit and a method which are out of tune with the spirit and method of Christ. It breeds indifference to the type of spiritual life and piety which Christ so highly exalted. In short, it robs the Christian life of that higher, finer quality which makes it a copy of the life of Christ. They who are Christ's connect the hopes and aspiration of the other world with their work and interests in this present world, and put its stamp upon their life and character. The Kingdom of God is within them, and it partakes of the life and character of Christ's spiritual kingdom, which is not of this world.—The Lutheran.

The Old Pensioner's Gift.

The minister of an English village sat in his vestry receiving gifts of thanksgiving from the members of his church and congregation.—His ministry had been searching and sound, it had awoken in his people the right spirit of consecration.

The fund was mounting steadily when one of the most prosperous men of the community—a wealthy merchant—entered the vestry. After shaking hands the merchant drew his check book somewhat ostentatiously from his pocket and proceeded to write a check for fifty pounds. The minister just glimpsed the figure as he was turning to speak to a newcomer, an old-age pensioner, wrinkled and bent with four-score years of hard toil. The minister greeted him cordially. Laboriously the old man fumbled in his waistcoat pocket and coin by coin put ten shillings down on the table.

"I really ought not to take this from you, my dear friend," said the minister. "You cannot afford it."

But you must!" replied the old man in excited quavering tones. "You must, sir; I've been saving this up all the year, and I don't want to give to God what costs me nothing."

So the minister accepted the old man's gift and wrote a receipt for him. When he had finished he glanced round for his wealthy friend. But the man had vanished. The minister wondered whether the attention that he had given to the old pensioner had offended the merchant prince. He took an affectionate farewell of his aged friend and, in his heart thanked God for such noble self-sacrifice.

Late that afternoon his wealthy visitor of the morning burst into the vestry. He shook hands with the minister and placed a check face downwards upon the table. "Did you see the amount of the check that I wrote this morning?" he asked.

"Why, yes," replied the minister; "I could not help seeing that it was for fifty pounds."

"And you remember that old pensioner's gift?" the man continued.

"I do indeed," said the minister.

"Well, look at this," and the man turned the check face upwards; it was for two hundred and fifty pounds. "I felt ashamed of myself beside that brave old boy," said the merchant. "All the afternoon I've been fighting my love of money, and at last I too have decided that I must not give God what costs me nothing."

Later that day the minister sought out his old pensioner friend and said to him: "John, do you know how much you gave to our fund today?"

"Yes, sir," replied the old fellow, "ten shillings."

"Not a bit of it," replied the minister; "your gift amounted exactly to two hundred pounds plus ten shillings," and he told him the story.

To Keep Children Happy in Hot Weather.

"Oh, look, dear, see that lovely baby oriole!" exclaimed Betty's aunt.

"Scuse me, Aunt, but it isn't an oriole, it's a redstart," returned Betty after a momentary glance upward. Betty was, at that time, only a trifle over four years old.

I have repeated my little girl's remark merely to illustrate what I have tried to do for my little folks during the summer months, namely, to teach them to know and love God's wonderful out-of-doors.

Nature study with one's children is the most delightful, healthful and helpful of summer pastimes. In order to get the most joy out of it, one should go to the woods often; two or three outings a week are none too many. However, one can study birds in one's own yard, if necessary. In our yard, with its many trees, we frequently have as many as six or seven varieties of birds nesting in a single season. We have a feeding table for them, which the children keep supplied with crumbs, suet, corn and other bird delicacies. There is also a drinking and bathing pedestal. The cardinals, bluebirds, orioles, phoebes, woodpeckers, catbirds, thrushes and chipping sparrows visit this bathtub daily, and the children never tire of watching them.

Occasionally an unknown visitor arrives. Then for the bird guide! "Oh, Mother, I've found out what it is! See here, the picture of it is on page . . ." Betty will exclaim, delightedly. Sometimes a flock of cedar waxwings stop with us for a day, meanwhile helping themselves to our neighbor's cherries. Once, early in the summer, an orchard oriole happened our way, and another time a flock of goldfinches. Each event was hailed with delight by the children.

Wild flower study, necessarily, must be conducted in the woods or fields or along the country roads. Frequently when the father of our family has finished the day's work, we all pile into the car, and, with a simple lunch, speed away from town. The children are never happier than when some flower, new to them, is discovered, and must be hunted up in the flower guide. They also love to keep track of the birds they see on each trip, and are fairly ecstatic if they are treated to a song by an indigo bunting or brown thrasher. They vie with each other in the length of their lists of quails, bobolinks, and scarlet tanagers, as well as numerous other birds they never see in town.

The summer months go all too fast for the family interested in nature study. Needless to say, however, it may be continued throughout the year. For the wee ones, "The Burgess Bird Book for Children," published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston, is a delight. Betty loves the stories which Jenny Wren told to Peter Rabbit, better even than fairy tales.

In order to make my children comfortable in hot weather, I dress them simply, bathe them frequently and encourage them to nap during the hottest part of the day, allowing them to remain up later in the evening when it is cool. Proper clothing in summer makes a world of difference in children's dispositions. I find that my little folks are happiest when clothed in "coveralls," boys and girls alike. Arrayed in these simple garments, they can get the most out of their life in the open. I sometimes think that they do three-fourths of their growing during the summer.—Ethel C. Bickel.

"That love is purest and most true Which leans upon its Saviour's breast,
And thinks with pleasure ever new How in all things to please Him best:

"Which in all things, not great alone,
On serving Him is fully bent,
And knowingly will not to one,
No, not the smallest sin consent.

"Begin, then, first with little things:
The smallest sin avoid and hate,
Obedience to love adds wings
And little faith will grow to great."

Be Strong.

Alice B. Joynes.

Be strong, be strong in the Lord;
Be strong in the power of His might.
Put on the whole armor of God
And bravely go forth to the fight.

Fight against evil and sin,
Powerful and fierce is the foe.
If you surely the battle would win,
The strength of the Lord you must know.

Put on the girdle of truth,
Take faith in your God as a shield.
However the battle may rage,
Stand firm! to the foe never yield.

You need a sharp sword in your hand,
The best in the world is God's word
Against the powers of evil to stand,
Take this sword that was used by your Lord.

With this armor you need never fear
Against any evil to fight.
The hosts of the Lord will be near;
You are strong in the power of His might.

Charity's Way.

Eugenie du Maurier.

"I don't see why I could not have been rich," said Nan. She was holding a basket for blossoms her mother was snipping off to take to a sick friend. "I'd like to give a lot of money to a hospital. It must be nice to do great big things."

"Indeed it is," said Mrs. Monroe cheerfully. But it is nice, too, to do little things."

"I think I'm different from other girls," said Nan thoughtfully; "Cousin Charity said the other day if she had a million dollars she'd have ice cream twice a day."

Nan's mother laughed outright. "I'm afraid that even ice cream would become monotonous at that rate just as my sponge cake did."

"You never told me about your sponge cake," Nan said interestedly.

"When I was a little girl I was very fond of sponge cake," Mrs. Monroe said, as, the basket filled, she turned toward the house. "Mother used to make six at a time and when they were taken out of the fancy tin molds, the sponge cakes were carried with great care to the cellar where they were placed in stone jars. It is the custom nowadays to eat sponge cake as soon as made, but now they are made with baking powder, whereas in mother's day they were raised with plenty of eggs and steady beating, and a sponge cake was not thought ready to be eaten until it was at least a week old. I always wanted my sponge cake when it came hot out of the oven. So mother made me a sample, but that was never enough. I used to say that when I was old enough to have a home of my own that I would make and eat hot sponge cake twice a day."

"Did you?" Nan asked.

"Yes, I really did—for about three days, then I tired of it," Mrs. Monroe answered with a quiet smile.

Nan frowned a little to show how serious her mood was.

"I don't believe you know just what I mean," she said. "When Charity thinks of having a lot of money, she always plans for something to eat, and lovely clothes and an automobile. I don't feel that way a bit. I long to be rich so that I can give money to hospitals, and send sick folks to the seaside, instead of taking them a few flowers out of our own garden." Nan was so earnest that she did not hear footsteps behind her till a merry voice said gaily: "Nannie, dear, I've come to take you to see Lucy. It is a whole week since you were there and she is longing to see you."

"It's too hot to go today, Charity," objected Nan.

"We can walk very slowly," Charity persisted. "Poor Lucy gets so lonely. She says the girls used to come real often at first, but that now they only come once in a while. You know it's true, too. Get your hat and come along. A little sunshine won't hurt you."

Nan did not move.

"I don't feel like going today," she said. "To tell the truth, Charity, she talks about herself all the time, and I get awfully tired of it."

"No wonder she does when we don't go oftener," declared Charity. "She doesn't have anything to think about but sickness. We can help her by telling her about school and other interesting things like that. Come, Nan."

"I've got to write a letter this afternoon, I really have, Charity," Nan said. "Give my love to Lucy and tell her I hope she'll be better soon."

She watched Charity's erect little figure trudging down the sunny road. She made no move to go to write the letter of which she had spoken.

"Whatever Charity may say," said Nan's mother, "I'm sure if she had money she would not use it foolishly and selfishly. She would use it as she uses her leisure, and her bright wit and her cheerful face, to relieve suffering, to help and comfort those who need such aid. It would not surprise me if some day God trusted Charity with money, for she makes such wise use of the other gifts He has entrusted to her."

And Nan turned away not quite sure what her mother meant by that.

Why Walter Was Glad.

"Oh, mother," exclaimed Walter Wentley, as he hustled breathlessly into the kitchen where his mother was preparing the noon meal, "may I go to the circus?"

"I'm sorry, dear," replied the mother, "but I haven't time to take you, and your father won't be home before night."

"But I can go with the Benson boys," insisted Walter. "They said I could."

The Benson boys were several years older than Walter, but Mother Wentley knew they were not very dependable, and she wouldn't feel easy to trust her seven-year-old son in their care.

"It isn't that I don't want you to go," returned mother, "but there will be such a crowd that it won't be safe for children to go unattended by a grown-up person."

Walter felt too big to cry, but he also felt a big jump coming into his throat. It was the first time in his young life that a real circus had come to his town, and never had he had an opportunity to see one.

Suddenly the blare of the clown's trumpet and a brass band announced the approaching parade.

"You may run down to the corner and watch the parade go by, Walter," his mother said cheerfully, "but be sure not to go off the pavement, and come back as soon as the parade is gone. Remember, mother trusts you."

Instantly Walter was off like a streak, reaching the corner just in time to see the first wonderful gilded chariot come into view, then came the elephants.

"Come on, let's follow the parade," said one of the Benson boys to Walter.

"No," said Walter, "mother doesn't want me to go."

"Aw, your mother's foolish! Come along; we're going to follow 'em to the tents and watch them feed the animals."

It seemed to Walter that never in his life did he want to do anything so much. What fun it would be to watch the elephants eat! But his mother's words were still in his ears, "Remember, mother trusts you." When finally the clown and last band wagon had passed by, Walter went slowly back to the house.

"Come in to lunch, Walter," called his mother.

But somehow, Walter wasn't hungry—a very unusual thing for a little boy—and he lingered on the front steps.

Suddenly there was a whoop behind him, and then a familiar voice said, "Cheer up, old fellow; there's better things ahead!"

Turning quickly, Walter gave a little cry of surprise, for standing in the doorway was his beloved Uncle Dick. "Oh, Uncle Dick," he exclaimed, "I wasn't expecting to see you."

"I know you were not, but the unexpected usually happens," laughed Uncle Dick. "I just happened to have an opportunity to run out here for a little visit—came in my new flannel, too. So, hustle and get yourself cleaned up for lunch. I have just succeeded in persuading your mother to take time off, and we're all going to take a little spin, and then take in the circus. A little fun now and then is good for all of us."

"Wh-o-o-pee-hur-rah!" exclaimed Walter, joyously, as he went bounding into the house.

That night, when Walter put his arms about his mother's neck for a good-night kiss, he told her how he had been tempted to disobey her. "And, mamma," he finished, "I'm so glad that I obeyed you."

"Obedience is always best, dear," answered mother, sweetly, "and my little son has made a splendid start for success and happiness in life by overcoming temptation."—"Our Little Folks."

The Kite That Went to Sunday School.

This kite was just like any other kite. One would never have thought, to look at its neat frame made by grandfather, the newspaper pasted on the frame by Bruce, and the tail made by Little Sister, that it was going to have such a great adventure. But the adventure started with the kite's tail, and all because Bruce let Little Sister make it. She was able to find small bits of paper to tie into the string, but she was not old enough to weigh the tail properly.

When the two took the kite out to the top of the hill one windy day and Bruce held it high to catch the wind, off it sailed. But what did the kite do but tangle its tail in a tree? There it was, tied fast by its tail to a branch, which was too high for Bruce to reach.

"Never mind," he said to Little Sister. "Tomorrow is the Sunday when you are going with me for the first time to Sunday School. You will have colored crayons and sand and a nice time singing."

The kite stayed there in the tree until Tom came along. Tom was taller than Bruce and lived on the other side of the hill. When he saw the kite as he climbed part the way up the tree and untied it carefully. As he brought it down he looked at the tail and then seemed surprised.

"All right, I will!" Tom said out loud, just as if the kite had spoken to him, which of course it had not.

Then Tom raised the kite high and was going to fly it, but the kite had plans of its own. It tugged itself out of Tom's hand and went over the hill and down toward town.

The kite flew on and on, until it came to the corner of Main Street, where Andy sold newspapers. The kite stopped on the top of the lamp-post beside Andy's paper stand and trailed its long tail down over the newspapers. Andy looked at it; then he stood up on a box and took it down.

"I think I can. I'd like to anyway," he exclaimed, just as if the kite had said something to him.

Then, because he so seldom had time for play, Andy ran a little way up Main Street flying the kite. But the kite still had other plans. It pulled itself out of Andy's hands and flew on and on toward the park.

The kite flew on and on, until it came to where Pauline was feeding the squirrels in the park. Pauline was a new girl in the town and did not know Bruce or Little Sister or Tom or Andy. The kite stopped in a bush beside her, and she was so glad to see it. She took it carefully out of the bush and looked at its nice, long tail.

"I will, dear kite!" she said, just as if the kite had said something to her, which, of course, it had not. "And, until then, will you stay with me and play a little while?"

Pauline took the kite's string in her hand and ran up and down the path in the park with it, but a gust of wind took the kite away from her. This time it was only a speck in the sky and did not come low enough for any one to catch it all the rest of the day.

The next morning Bruce took Little Sister to Sunday School. At the door of the Sunday-school room were several new pupils whom no one knew. They were Tom and Andy and Pauline.

Just before the last bell rang something happened. The church sexton brought in a very torn and muddy kite, which he had just taken off the church yard wall. He was going to throw it away, but Little Sister held out her hands.

"That is our kite!" she said.

Tom and Andy and Pauline also exclaimed, when they saw it, "That's the kite with the Sunday-school tail!"

This was very, very odd! They all looked at the poor, dragged kite, and then they saw that Little Sister, not being able to read, had tied her Sunday-school invitation to the very end of the kite's tail. It was a colored card with a picture of a child on his way to Sunday School. Under the picture it said:

"We want you, too. Won't you come with me?"

Tom had read this, Andy had read it and Pauline had read it. Each had thought that it was a Sunday-school kite flying to invite them to attend. And as none of them were enrolled they had decided to come to Sunday School.

It was a joke! But it was splendid to have Little Sister and Tom and Andy and Pauline as new members. The kite was put away in the Sunday-school treasure box with honor, because of what it had done.—Little Learners' Paper.

I'll Try.

Two robin redbreasts, in their nest,
Had little robins three;
The mother bird sat still at home,
Her mate sang merrily.
And all the little robins said:
"Wee, wee, wee, wee, wee, wee."

One day the sun was warm and bright,
All shining in the sky;
The mother said: "My little ones,
'Tis time you learn to fly."
And all the little robins said:
"I'll try, I'll try, I'll try."

I know some little children dear,
(And oft it makes me sigh)
Who, when they're told "Do this," or "that,"

Will say, "What for?" or "Why?"
Oh, how much better if they'd say,
"I'll try, I'll try, I'll try."

Two Kinds of Courage.

John's tooth was aching "something fierce," as he expressed it. He had been suffering all night long, and mother had been up the greater part of the night trying to do something to ease the pain. Nothing had helped, however, and morning found John so tired out and fretful that nothing any one could do or suggest was met with favor.

"It's no use, I tell you," he objected, as mother came to his side with a hot application. "Nothing helps it! I wish you wouldn't bother me with those old things! Nobody knows how it hurts," he moaned. "I just can't stand much more, and that's all there is to it!"

Of course, a visit to the dentist was inevitable, and when John was informed that the tooth must be extracted at once he strenuously objected. "I have suffered enough as it is, without having to stand something worse," he declared determinedly, "and I just can't do it."

"Oh, yes, you can," said the dentist, confidently. "Why, I hear you are the most courageous boy on the football team. Where is all that courage now, boy?"

It was true John was considered an unusually brave boy; nothing was too hazardous for him to attempt; and he was never known to show fear, even in very real danger. Where, indeed, was his courage now?

"I don't know," he answered the dentist; "but—but I guess it must take another kind of courage to have a tooth pulled—or bear any kind of hard pain. I must have it about me somewhere, though," he added, "if I can only find it!"

John found the other kind of courage all right, and maintained his reputation for bravery. "I only wish," he said to the dentist, when the tooth was out, "I had found this kind of courage last night when I was making mother so much trouble!"

John was right in deciding there are two kinds of courage, or rather, two ways of demonstrating courage. This quality, so dear to the heart of every boy, is never more admirable and respect-compelling than when exercised in real suffering. The bravery that inspires one to refrain from useless complaints and demands upon others, to bear pain patiently and manfully, is courage of the very highest order.—J. P. H., in Presbyterian of South.

A Little Girl's Lightning Bugs.

M. L. G., Jr., age 7.

Once there was a little lightning bug, that was very big and brave and strong. He wanted to fly to Heaven, so he tried to do it once and he couldn't do it; and then he tried again, and this time he just did reach Heaven. And when he came down he found a little girl named Jane. And she had a jar packed full of lightning bugs. And you know some little girls don't like lightning bugs to land on their noses; and this little girl didn't.

The brave lightning bug that had flown to Heaven landed on her nose, and she dropped the jar and ran. And he crawled right in and told them everything he saw in Heaven; and how he tried to get to Heaven and couldn't, and then he tried again and just reached Heaven.

Then he lighted his light and led them out of the jar; and once more they had a happy life.

Hilda-Who-Slept-In-the-Kitchen.

Hilda was a three-weeks-old kid—the cunningest little silky white goat you can imagine. She had long, shaky legs and tiny nubbins of horns, and her hair was as thick and warm as the fur of the little white neckpiece and muff which Margaret, Hilda's mistress, wore when the weather was cold.

Margaret was delighted with the baby kid, for her Uncle John had brought it to her, knowing how fond she was of pets.

"See, Margaret," he pointed out, as he took the little animal from the back seat of his car when he first brought it, "see what a silly little face Hilda has. She looks as if she were smiling all the time to herself over nothing; but that is just her natural expression, and you mustn't think she is laughing at you."

There was a great discussion where the baby goat was to live, and it was finally decided that for a little while, at least, she could reside in the empty dog kennel at the rear of the house.

Margaret was only four years old, and she liked to go inside the fence which kept Hilda from leaving the premises, and sometimes the little girl would chase her around and almost catch the kid. But just at that point Hilda was sure to give another jump, and Margaret's fingers would slide along the little kid's silky-soft back.

Margaret was especially interested in watching her pet get her meals. Hilda was so small that she had to take her milk out of a bottle which was furnished with a rubber nipple. Hilda's mother was a big, brown goat who had been sold and taken to another place.

Her purchaser did not want the little kid, so that was how Uncle John came to get her.

Margaret's mother took good care of Hilda, for Mrs. Aldrich didn't like to think of anything or anybody being uncomfortable, and, of course, Margaret thought it a great treat to see her mother go out, catch Hilda, sit down on a box in the little yard, take the kid up on her lap, and put her arms around the little kid so that it couldn't wiggle out; and then it always made Margaret chuckle with glee to see her mother take Hilda's chin in her left hand, and with a finger and a thumb open the funny little mouth on each side and put the black nipple right into Hilda's mouth.

Hilda would chew and sputter and try to get away for a few minutes, but when she felt the nice, warm milk running down her throat, and got a taste of it, she seemed to remember what she ought to do.

One day when Hilda had not been there very long, Margaret and her mother took the bottle out for the kid's breakfast. The sun wasn't up very high, and Hilda's little shingled house stood in the shade where it was quite cool. Hilda was shivering, and she wouldn't eat. Margaret's mother said:

"Dear me, I wonder if Hilda has a pain just as you did the other night! We'll take her in by the fire and see how she feels then."

So Mrs. Aldrich picked Hilda up and wrapped her apron about her and took her into the warm kitchen. She had Margaret sit down on the floor and hold the kid while a bed was made for her.

So Margaret sat down and put her arms tight around the little white cat, and it seemed to Margaret as if the smile was all gone and there was a pleading look in its place, as if Hilda said: "Please help me!"

Mrs. Aldrich brought in a nice, clean wood box and put it on two chairs right by the kitchen stove. She laid an old blanket in the bottom of it. Then she and Margaret put Hilda into the box and covered her up with something warm. They even put a nice hot-water bottle right in beside her, and then Margaret's mother fixed up some soda and warm water and held Hilda's mouth open and made her swallow it.

Margaret and her mother had some things to attend to, for Margaret helped with the dusting and picked up the papers every morning. Every little while, however, Margaret would keep running back to the kitchen to look at Hilda. All of a sudden she called out: "Mother, mother! Come quick! Hilda's on the table!"

Sure enough, Hilda's warm, snug nap had cured her of the shivers, and, like all baby kids, she never lost a chance to jump up on something higher. There she was on the table looking around and smiling as if she were quite enjoying herself.

Margaret's mother exclaimed, "Why, that'll never do!" and she made a quick grab and caught Hilda just before the little animal decided which way to jump.

"I think you are well enough now to go out into your own house, Miss Hilda," said Margaret's mother. "But I will take the box along, for maybe the ground floor in the bottom of the dog kennel is too damp for you."

So they took Hilda out and put her down on the ground, where she gave a funny little jump, and went frisking around as if to say, "I'm all right now, and ready for my breakfast, if you please!"—The Christian Guardian.

Afraid? Of What?

By George Lee Burton.

Afraid? Of what? The dark of night?
The boisterous wind? The tossing waves?

Dost doubt His love? Dost doubt His might?

Where is thy faith in Him Who saves?
Hast thou so soon forgot the bread
He brake, and hungry thousands fed?

Hast thou forgot His healing touch—
The lame that walk, the blind that see,
The dead that live? Forgot how much
Through all the years He's done for thee?

Forgot the birds and flowers, His care
Of all things, here and everywhere?

O soul of mine, thy God of love
Hath built foundations for thy faith;
If thou wilt dwell on them and prove
The blessed truth of what He said saith,
No doubt, no care, can e'er affright:
He'll bring thee joyous through the night!

What Mother Brought Home.

The children's mother was away at a big Sunday-school convention, and, as she went up and down the long halls outside of the room where the meetings were held, she kept seeing people who gave her things to take home—picture cards, fans, bookmarks, Sunday-school buttons, little books—until her suitcase was full.

She knew that the children would be glad to have all these treasures, but she kept wondering what else she could take that would be different from anything that they had ever had, and, one day, when she was talking to a missionary woman, she found the very gift that she wanted. It was something that she could not see and could not touch. What do you suppose it was? It was a little boy whose name was Kenneth, and who lived across the great ocean.

Kenneth's father and mother were missionary teachers. All around them were people who had never heard of Jesus, so they worked and taught for such a very little bit of money that it was hard to buy clothes and shoes for Kenneth. When this American mother heard about Kenneth she said that he should be the adopted brother of her own boys and girls. He would live with his own father and mother, but when her children bought clothes for winter or summer, they would buy clothes for Kenneth, too.

The children were delighted with the gifts that their mother brought home, but, most of all, with the adopted brother. Soon his picture came, and he became a real member of the family. Such fun as they have planning gifts and writing letters to the brother they have never seen! And how happy Kenneth and his father and mother are to have these kind, loyal friends in America!—Sunbeam.

The Story Mother Read.

"Please read to me, mother," begged Herbert, as his mother settled herself in the hammock on the porch with a magazine open to a story she was reading.

"Why, no, Herbert, not now," said mother. "I read you a nice, long story just a few minutes ago. I want to read a grown-up story now."

"Oh, I don't care if it is a grown-up story," insisted Herbert. "I'll like it just the same; only please read out loud."

"But do you think, Herbert, that is quite fair?" asked mother. "It is hard work to read aloud. Mother is tired and wants to rest. By and by I'll have time, perhaps, to read a story out loud, but not now, dear. Run and play—that's a good boy."

But Herbert had no intention of being a good boy. He wanted his mother to read, and, like many naughty little boys, he kept teasing to have her do it. Again and again mother said "No," but finally she grew tired of refusing to no purpose.

"Well, Herbert," she said, turning a page of her magazine, "if you must be read to, sit down and listen to this story."

Herbert, very much overjoyed, snuggled up to his mother in the hammock, eyes and ears wide open for the promised story. And this is what his mother read:

"What to do with naughty little boys who tease.

"A little boy who teases is a naughty little boy.

"Every little boy should know that when his mother says 'no' to him she means 'no,' and it will do no good to tease.

"A good plan for a mother to follow, when her little boy is a teasing little boy, is never to give him what he teases for.

"Sometimes it is necessary to send a little boy who teases to bed without his supper; or sometimes he should be made to sit in a chair in a room all by himself; or sometimes—"

But mother didn't have a chance to read any more. Herbert had been growing more and more restless as his mother read. His face began to burn with a feeling of shame. He wriggled out from under his mother's arm and started for the steps.

"I guess you don't need to read any more," he called to his mother as he started in the direction of his kiddie kar. "I'm going to ride."

"All right," called mother, turning back to the page which she had been reading. "When you want to hear the rest of the story just come back and ask mother and she'll read it to you."

"All right," Herbert answered, rather slowly.

But, strange to say, Herbert never asked for mother to finish the story, and, what is more, he never teased her again to read to him.

And he is still wondering how it happened that his mother's magazine contained a story written about him.—"Sunshine for Little People."

God suffers vehemence. How daring was Abraham's faith! With what audacity stepped into the breach and urged the cause of Israel! With what passion Paul pleaded for his Kinsmen according to the flesh! This is a great mystery, and our supreme privilege. We may take the cases and causes of others to God. The greatest blessings we bring to others come through the ministry of intercession.—S. WALKER: Died, on June 21, 1924, at Alexandria, Va., MRS. ELIZABETH G. P. WALKER, widow of the Rev. W. Woodson Walker and daughter of the late Leroy Peachy Williams, of Clarke county, Va., in the eighty-ninth year of her age. Interment in Ivy Hill cemetery, near Alexandria.

Molly's Mistake.

Molly was such a little girl that she didn't seem big enough to have a party all her own with truly ice-cream in it. But she had asked for one so many times that at last Mother decided to give her one. And the party was to be a surprise to Molly herself.

Early that afternoon Molly wanted to go for a little visit to Miss Eleanor. Miss Eleanor lived up Molly's street, in a white house with apple-green blinds. Molly often went all alone.

Miss Eleanor was always so sunny and full of songs and stories and games that Molly loved her next best to Father and Mother and Baby.

"You may go, dear," said Mother, "if you will come home exactly at three o'clock."

"You always say exactly three o'clock, Mother," said Molly.

"Well, five minutes after three, then," laughed Mother. "And, Molly, so that you won't forget this time, all the way to Miss Eleanor's say over and over 'Five minutes after three.' Then, just as soon as you get there, say the words quickly to Miss Eleanor, 'Five minutes after three.'"

"Five minutes after three," said Molly. "I can remember that."

"That will give me plenty of time to get ready for the party," thought Mother.

Up the street with her white parasol flew Molly. "Five minutes after three," she said over and over in a whisper until she began to sing it. "Five minutes after three," she sang until she stopped for a moment on the bridge to see some boys fishing. Just about there, a big dog who was a friend of Molly's ran out to say, "Good afternoon."

"Oh, Fritzie," cried Molly, "I'm going to Miss Eleanor's to make her a visit. Want to come?"

But Fritz had the house to look after. So Molly gave him a hug and ran along.

"Three minutes after five," sang Molly; "three minutes after five," over and over until she ran into Miss Eleanor's sunny little sitting-room.

"Three minutes after five," cried Molly; "that's how long I can stay. Won't that be nice!"

"Why, it's little Molly!" cried Miss Eleanor. "I'm all alone and so glad to have company! We'll hear the clock strike five. Then, if you put on your wraps, you'll be all ready to start home at three minutes past."

It seemed a very, very short time to Molly before the little clock struck five. "There, deary," said Miss Eleanor. "Put on your things and hurry right along!"

Molly put on her hat and coat. Then she kissed Miss Eleanor and hurried down the street.

When she reached the corner, she saw that the parlor at home was all lighted. And out of it came such a hubbub of little voices all laughing and talking that Molly ran faster than ever.

At the door she met Mother.

"Oh, Molly, where have you been?" cried Mother. "I couldn't go after you because I couldn't leave Baby. And I couldn't take him."

Molly scarcely heard. "Oh, Mother, Mother," she cried, "it looks like a party. And it sounds like one. Is it a party, Mother?"

"Yes," said Mother, "your own little party, Molly. And you're the only one who is late. How could you forget?"

"But I didn't forget, Mother," cried Molly, hurrying out of her coat, "truly I didn't. Every step of the way I said it, and I said it to Miss Eleanor the very first thing."

"What did you say?" asked Mother. "Three minutes after five," said Molly.

Mother laughed. "Why, Molly dear, you got the hour and minutes turned round. I said five minutes after three. Well, never mind. Run along just as you are. It's a lovely party, dear, with truly ice-cream in it."—St. Nicholas.

Discovery of X-Rays.

It is seldom given to a man to live to see his name incorporated in the name of an important division of science, but this was true of Wilhelm Konrad Roentgen, who died some time ago—the man to whom the world owes its knowledge of Roentgenology.

One day in the year 1895 while Professor Roentgen was experimenting with a vacuum (Crookes) tube in his laboratory in the physics department of a German university, there lay on the table under a book a box containing an ordinary photographic plate. Later, when the plate was developed, it showed the outline of the bones of the professor's hand, and also a metal book-mark placed in the volume that had covered the plate on that day in his laboratory.

The spirit of scientific inquiry led the physicist carefully to retrace the steps he had taken that day, repeating the experiment and noting every detail, and thus he discovered the X-Ray—that, is the "unknown" ray.

The value of the discovery for the practice of medicine and surgery was immediately recognized and its application has wrought a revolution in these branches of science, though not without the sacrifices that have often been made in the interest of scientific knowledge—for two able men, Dr. Walter Dodd and Dr. Infort, lost their lives in trying to use the newly discovered power while it was not yet sufficiently understood to be controlled.

Today, however, both operator and patient are safeguarded and the X-Ray machine is part of the equipment of every hospital. The surgeon is not obliged to operate on a blind chance of finding the cause of trouble, he sees the trouble first. And all this is due to an accident which happened to a man with the genius to see its value and the patience and persistence to discover the process by which the final results had come about.—Selected.

rial service, assisted by the Rev. Thos. L. Parker, rector of the parish. Mr. Mendenhall was ordained priest by the late Bishop Gillespie, and had a remarkable record of twenty-seven years of service as chaplain of the Michigan State Reformatory at Ionia. For several years he also acted as assistant minister at St. John's, Ionia. He is survived by two sons, Messrs. Cyrus W. and Arthur R. Mendenhall.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. Alexander Mann, D. D., Bishop.

The Board of the Trustees for the Diocese has lately purchased an Episcopal Residence, in the Squirrel Hill District, which is one of the most attractive residential sections of the city.

St. John's Church, Pittsburgh, has received a gift of $1,000 from the American Church Building Association, the final payment on the commodious parish house erected about two years ago. This building is becoming more a centre for community interests, and is a valuable acquisition to that neighborhood.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Three Church Schools in the Diocese held commencement exercises in June: St. Paul's Church, Augusta; St. John's Church, and Christ Church, Savannah, when certificates were awarded, and promotions made for the fall session. The two Savannah Schools, with St. Paul's Church, additional, will continue to hold a Sunday session during the summer, though attendance will not be compulsory. An inter-parochial birthday thank offering service was held in Christ Church, Savannah, on Whitsunday, for the four parish schools.

The superintendent of Christ Church School, Mrs. T. P. Waring, who has served in this capacity for five years, and who has advanced the curriculum of this school in line with the suggestions and plans of the National Department of Religious Education, has been promoted to the office of "Superintendent of Religious Education in the Parish," and in addition to having supervision of the parish school, will also organize and supervise the educational work of the parochial mission of the House of Prayer located in the southwestern part of the city. The plans for the fall call for a complete organization of activities which will give the mission a program of social service to include work for members of the parish. The rector, the Rev. David Cady Wright, is taking an active part in supervising the plans.

At the Church of the Atonement, (the Rev. Jackson H. Harris, rector) Augusta, which calls itself "The Little Church on the Corner," the congregation had as guests on Sunday evening, May 25, the members of Georgia Commandery, No. 1, Knights Templars. The church was crowded and the rector preached an appropriate sermon. Several weeks previous to this service, prominent business men of August have addressed the Sunday morning Bible Class, and this has proved an interesting innovation. The plan will continue through July.

On Ascension Day, at St. Thomas' Church, Isle of Hope, Chatham County, Ga., the Vicar, the Rev. F. North-Tum-mon, dedicated a Communion Service given by the children and grandchildren of Major Charles S. Hardee and the late Mrs. Martha Gaillardet Hardee, his wife, to commemorate their twenty-five years of work in the Episcopal Church at the Isle of Hope, Major Hardee, who is over ninety years of age was present, as well as members of his family.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Arthur D. Appleton resigned his charge, St. Paul's Church, Minersville, Pa., on July 1, and goes to Philadelphia.

The Rev. E. N. MacConomy, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Charleston, W. Va., has accepted a call to the rectorship of Trinity Church, Moundsville, W. Va.

The Rev. Robert A. Lambert resigned as rector of Good Shepherd, Milford, Pa., to take effect on August 1. He becomes the assistant in Calvary Church, Pittsburgh.

ORDINATIONS.

On June 17, 1924, in Trinity Church, West Pittston, Pa., Mr. Willie J. Parker was made a deacon. Mr. Parker is a graduate of Lehigh University and of the General Seminary. For the present he will assist the Archdeacon with the Leonard Hall Missions and serve as chaplain to the Presiding Bishop. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Neikirk, the editor of the Bethlehem Churchman. He also presented the candidate. Bishop Talbot officiated.

One June 28, 1924, in Leonard Hall, Bethlehem, Pa., Mr. Joseph Henry Benner, of the Church of the Mediator, Allentown, was made a Deacon. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Carhardt, of Grace Church, Allentown, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Merriman, his rector.

Mr. Benner studied for the ministry some years ago, but instead became an actor on the stage. However, the call persisted and for a number of years he has been studying privately and now is a Deacon. He was put in charge of St. Paul's Church, Minersville, for the present.

"An Easy Way to Backslide."

We are not giving these easy ways in order to encourage people in the practice of this habit, but to warn them of the subtle manner in which one may lose ground religiously.

Move away from the "dear old home church," but leave your membership there.

Why leave it? Because the little church is so weak it needs all that I have to give, which is freely admitted as being very small. Now maybe the little church has grown some since you got away. Maybe they were not as dependent upon you as you thought. Maybe it was a blessing to the little church when you left for it may have given them a good chance to put some new blood into the official life of the church.

I have been the pastor of "the dear little church back home" and seldom came there a check from the distant members.

Many pastors have doubtless frequently heard the officials say, "I wish people when they move so far away would move their membership, too."

The average church counts on the people at home who attend the services and keep in touch with the activities of the church to foot all the bills and look after the upkeep of the church generally.

Kinfolks are buried there. Now, if we are to be the guardian angels about their dust, why did we ever leave at all? How cruel it would seem for one to deliberately move away, but you moved. Why hold on to the distant church and grow disinterested in the kingdom generally?

The town or city church seems so different. People never seem to wish to appear "old fashioned or countrified" in anything except their religion. They enter into the ways of the town or city in every other respect. Religion is as modern as the very last element of truth that flashed forth from the divine mind. Religion is as up-to-date as the sun that shines with new glory upon a new world each new day, and yet it is as old as the eternal God Who is its Author.

Religion is sense and not sentiment. God said, "Come now and let us reason together," not feel together. Reason with God for awhile and the unfolding of the divine mind will give to your cold heart a strange warmth and a heavenly glow.

How easy to slide back into a life of indifference when we are not in immediate touch with a real church home! How avoid this easy way of backsliding. Get a preacher to write home for your church certificate. When it is put into a church you "put it," too, and show your religious "raising" by being loyal to the teachings received in the "dear old home church" and the Lord will make your life count both at home and in the new field. "There are 10,000 Methodists in Atlanta whose membership is somewhere else," said a preacher to me some time ago. What a sad fact!

Let us help each other to get in touch with our absent members so that they may be saved to the life of real religious usefulness.—Ex.

Hobart College for generations has been known for the unvarying soundness of its instruction, the success of its graduates and a peculiar quality of attraction felt by all who approach it.

Only love of their profession, innate wisdom and great personal force on the part of its teachers could have brought to Hobart a reputation for these characteristics.

The long and successful teaching experience of the departmental heads at Hobart is a guarantee of the highest grade of instruction, combined with an especial surety of touch in dealing with the innumerable problems which arise in the daily life of college students.

A Mother Prays.

Gene Hinman,

Oh, little Lad of long ago, with grave and childlike eyes

What did You know of future woe, of bitter sacrifice?

Perhaps You played beneath a tree with giant arms flung wide,

And did You see a bloody cross upon a stark hill side?

O, did You hear the tramp of feet, the clash of Roman spears,

Or know the mob, the long dark night, or Mary's bitter tears?

Once like a little lad of now, so many years apart,

You rested on a mother's breast, you knew a mother's heart.

Oh, little Lad of long ago, who trod that sorry way,

Look down upon this child of mine and keep him safe, I pray.

Deeper than the need for men, deeper far than the need for money—aye, deep down at the bottom of our spiritual life is the need for the forgotten secret of prevailing worldwide prayer.—Robert E. Speer.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

What science says is man's best guess.

That man will be remembered who forgets himself for the sake of others.

The truthful are youthful, though their cheeks be withered with age

If the yoke you are wearing is not easy get out of it; it is not Christ's.

There can be no true politeness without the practice of self-forgetfulness.

"We hope in Thee, O God!

The day wears on to night;

Thick shadows lie across our world,
In Thee alone is light."

What though cloud and storm o'ertake thee in the night?

He'll not leave thee nor forsake thee,
He is Light!

How may we keep young? By sympathy and association with the young; by looking for what is hopeful in our environments, by the exercise of our constructive rather than our critical faculties, and by welcoming tasks that require initiative—thus we may preserve the spirit of youth.—C. C. Albertson.

Faith is the mark of those who seek and keep on seeking, who ask and keep on asking, who knock and keep on knocking, until the door is opened. The passive weak-kneed taking of everything on trust which is often represented as faith, is a travesty of its truth. True faith is the most active, positive and powerful of all virtues.

"Thou wast forsaken that we might never be forsaken; Thou didst tread the wine-press alone that each poor timid child of Thine in all future ages might be able to sing the words of undying comfort: 'I will fear no evil: for Thou art with me'."

There is nothing for which the world clamors more than a religion for every day. Jesus answers, "The simplest, first prayer I ever gave was that." And you say it in your grandest worship, and your child lips it as you teach his sleepy little lips to repeat it, "Give us this day our daily bread." It is just this which makes it a prayer for each and all. The cross is daily, but the faith and the food are daily too.—Dr. J. H. Eccleston.

MIRACLE

The primary mystery is life. No man has yet been found brave enough to attempt a definition of life. At best all that can be offered is a partial description of this unfathomable energy. It can be figured, we are told, as an impetus whose origin is unknown, but which consists in a need of creation. "It cannot create absolutely because it is confronted by matter—that is to say, with a movement that is inverse to itself, but it seizes upon matter and strives to introduce into it the largest amount of indetermination and liberty." Whatever else Evolution may have brought to light, this much at least is clear: that there is in the universe a creative energy, that so far from being satisfied with perpetuating types, is forever struggling to break new channels through matter, and find an outlet into the universe. Whenever this channel becomes blocked, the form is fixed and species appears, but apparently the aim of the impetus is transformation not the perpetuation of type. This impetus to create is so marked that no two things in nature are alike. When we study the play of life upon the highly organized physical structure of man we come into a world of individual creations indefinite in variety. The highest exercise of the vital impetus is not however the change of form, but giving new functioning power to an old form, which in turn is developed by the very process of functioning into new form. This process of development is not merely the multiplication of channels of energy, but of facility in coordinating the forces themselves. Given a human being which in its physical structure offered a perfect medium upon which the impetus of life could play, we could expect the full perfection of manhood, and at the same time the one particular human being in which the meaning of life itself could be studied.

This is just what Christianity claims in the case of its founder. Jesus claimed for Himself and His immediate Disciples claimed for Him, that He was the full manifestation of the creative energy we call life. "I am the Way, the Truth, the Life," and "In Him was Life and the Life was the light of men," are only statements that there was fulfilled in Him what Science declares would be fulfilled if vital energy should infuse a perfectly adapted physical structure. Christianity also affirms that the same creative energy which was infused into the life of the Son of Mary, did so act upon the Virgin of Nazareth that for the first time in the history of the race the one perfect physical human being was born. We remember some words of a great physicist heard in class thirty years ago. He was lecturing on the laws of expansion in gases. He blew a smoke ring and after giving the laws governing expansion, declared: "If we could only find a perfectly elastic gas and could blow a ring of it, then omnipotence could not destroy it nor eternity efface it." In Christ the impetus of life has given to the world the one rounded character, the perfect man because He is the fulness of the manifestation of the primal source of life, and like the professor we can say with full assurance: "Omnipotence could not destroy nor eternity efface," for physical energy could find no hold for its destroying grasp and eternity belongs to it.

The highest exercise of the creative vital impulse is when it breaks through matter and hovers above the things that are, in what we call thought; or in the affections strives to share the fulness of itself with another in terms which do not of necessity have material symbols at all. The vital impulse is still creative and we should expect the perfect life to consist in sharing the fulness of its knowledge and in creating after its kind—which is merely to say that the perfect Life must manifest itself as Teacher and Saviour.

THE RULES OF THE GAME

Some years ago we were talking to the head of a large corporation whom we chanced to meet on the train. As has been a frequent experience with us, we listened to the familiar apologetic of the man of affairs as he told of how many people his business gave a livelihood to, of how many charities he felt called upon to aid, of how much time he gave to certain voluntary organizations that had as their aim the material prosperity of the city in which he lived. He then volunteered the information that he never attended church, as the services did not interest him and the discussions were about matters that seemed to him trivial compared to the weighty affairs of his crowded life. He declared that he was a business man, and played the game according to the rules; and that all the talk he had heard about sin in the days when he had attended church seemed to him now but shadow fighting. His advice to a young man, starting out into life, was to choose carefully the game he wanted to play, keep the rules, but put every ounce of brain and muscle behind the play; and he would not only be a success but a good citizen as well. We had learned early in life that it is useless to make a frontal attack on any man's apologetic; and so we did not attempt to argue the value and duty of membership in the Church of God, but asked him if he really played the game according to the rules, and added that the word sin was only a convenient term to describe any man's failure to play clean ball, no matter where the game was played. We quoted the saying of Kant that there was but one sin, and that was "to treat a person as a thing."

Two years later we were again fellow-travelers. As he took his seat, he said: "What you said to me the last time we met has affected the lives of a good many hundred people and will probably affect a great many more. I had thought up to that day we met that I was a pretty good employer, but I got to chewing on what you said, and came to the conclusion that my employees meant no more to me than the separate parts of my motor car. When a part wore out or went bad, I replaced it in one case, as in the other. I suddenly realized that no human relationship existed between me and any one of the hundreds of men I used for my own ends. It got on my nerves. I believe now that I am more interested in the people in my employment than in the business itself, and where I used to use the axe, I find that I can pull a dislocated joint back into place and save a man and make a friend. I am no nearer being a Christian than I was, but I have learned the difference between a thing and a person." "Some of these days," we replied, "you will find out what it means to be a person; and when you do, you will be startled to find out at the same time that you have become a Christian."

JAMESTOWN

We would direct the attention of our readers to the account of the services held at Jamestown on the third Sunday after Trinity, and to the plan of the Rev. E. Ruffin Jones, rector of Bruton Parish, to link the unattached members of Christ's Church in our land to what we believe to be the highest mood of English loyalty to God and native land that England has perhaps ever known.

It cannot be emphasized too often or too strongly that Jamestown was a great missionary as well as a great national undertaking which was to build a Christian empire in America. Those who came were the appointed representatives of the Church as well as the State, and they came to share the best in England with the Indians of America.

Once when Alexander the Great was telling Aristotle, his teacher, of his dreams of conquest, Aristotle said to him: "Your dreams are idle ones. You cannot treat the Barbarians as if they were Greeks." Alexander replied: "I do not intend to treat them as Greeks. I shall share with them all that the Greeks have, and then they will be as Greeks." This was the dream that the first voyagers brought to Jamestown.

That the above statements are not mere vaporings, we offer as part of the proof a few paragraphs of the prayer, "duly said morning and evening by the Captain of the Watch" at Jamestown. This prayer was written by the Rev. William Crashaw, preacher at the Temple, and father of Richard Crashaw, the poet.

THE JAMESTOWN PRAYER

A part of a Prayer duly said Morning and Evening upon the Court of guard, either by the Captain of the Watch himselfe, or by some one of his principall officers.

MERCIFUL Father and Lord of heaven and earth, seeing Thou hast honoured vs, to choose vs out to beare Thy name to the Gentiles, we therefore beseech Thee to bless vs, and this ovr plantation, which we and ovr nation have begvn in Thy feare and to Thy glory. We know, O Lord, we haue the diuel and al the gates of hell against vs; but if Thou, O Lord be on our side, we care not who be against vs. O therefore vouchsafe to be ovr God, and let vs be a part and portion of Thy people; and confirm Thy couenant of grace and mercy with vs, which Thou hast made to Thy Chvrch in Christ, Iesvs. And seeing, Lord, the highest end of ovr plantation here is to set vp the standard, and display the banner of Iesvs Christ, euen here where Satan's throne is, Lord, let ovr labovr be blessed in laboring the conuersion of the heathen. And because Thov vset not to work with svch mighty works by vnholly means. Lord, sanctifie ovr spirits, and giue vs holy harts, that so we may be Thy instruments in this most gloriovs work. Lord, inspire ovr souls with Thy grace, kindle in vs zeal of Thy glory; fill ovr hearts with Thy feare, and ovr tongues with Thy praise; fvrnish vs all, from the highest to the lowest, with all gifts and graces needful not onley for ovr saluation, but for the discharge of ovr dvties in ovr seuerall places; adorn vs with the garments of iustice, mercy, loue, pitle, faithfulness; hvmility, and all vertues; and teach vs to abhor al uice, that ovr lights may so shine before these heathen; that they may see ovr good works, and so be brought to glorifie Thee, ovr heauenly Father. And seeing, Lord, we profess ovselves Thy seruants, and are about Thy worke, Lord, blesse vs; arme vs against difficulties, strength vs against against al base thoughts and temptations that may make vs looke backe againe. And, seeing by Thy motion and work in ovr harts, we haue left ovr warme nests at home, and pvt ovr liues into ovr hands, principally to honovr Thy name, and aduance the kingdome of Thy Son, Lord giue vs leaue to commit ovr liues into Thy hands; let Thy angels be about vs, and let vs be as angels of God sent to these people. And so bless vs, Lord, and so prosper all ovr proceedings, that the heathen may neuer say vnto vs, Where is now yovr God? Their idols are not so good as silver and gold, but lead and copper and the works of their own hands. But Thou, Jehouah, art ovr God, and we are the works of Thy hands. O then let Dagon fall before Thy arke, let Satan be confounded at Thy presence; and let the heathen see it, and be ashamed, that they may seeke Thy face, for their God is not as ovr God, themselves being iudges. Arise, therefore, O Lord, and let Thime enemies be scattered, and let them that hate Thee, flie before Thee. As the smoke vanisheth, so let Satan and his delvsions come to naught; and, as wax melteth before the fire, so let wickedness, superstition, ignorance, and idolatrie, perish in the presence of Thee, our God. And, whereas we haue by vndertaking this plantation vndergone the reproofs of the base world, insomvch as many of ovr own brethern laugh vs to scorne. O Lord, we pray Thee fortifie vs against this temptation: let Sanballat and Tobias, Papist and players, and svch other Amonites and Horonits, the scvm and dregs of the earth, let them mocke svch as helpe to bviid up the wals of Jerusalem; and they that be filthy, let them be filthy still; and let svch swine still wallow in their mire, but let not the rod of the wicked fall vpon the lot of the righteous; let them not pvt forth their hands to svch vanity, but let them that feare Thee reioice and be glad in Thee, and let them that know that it is Thou, O Lord, that rainest in England, and vnto the ends of the world. And seeing this work mvst needs expose vs to many miseries and dangers of soule and bodie, by land and sea, O Lord, we earnestly beseech Thee to receive vs into Thy fauor and protection, defend vs from the delysions of the diuel, the malice of the heathen, the invasions of ovr enemies, and mytinies and dissentions of ovr own people; knit ovr hearts altogether in faith and feare of Thee, and loue one to another; giue us patience, wisdom, and constancy to goe on through all difficulities and temptations, till this blessed work be accomplished, for the honovr of Thy name, and the glory of the Gospel of Jesvs Christ. That when the heathen do know Thee to be their God, and Jesus Christ to be their saluation, they may say, Blessed be the King and Prince of England, and blessed be the English nation, and blessed for euer be the most high God, possessor of heauen and earth, that sent them amongst vs. And here, O Lord, we do vpon the knees of ovr harts offer Thee the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiuing, for that Thou hast moved ovr harts to vndertake the performance of this blessed work with the hazard of ovr person and the hearts of so many of ovr nation to assist it with meanes and prouisions, and with their holy praiers: Lord look mercifully vpon them all, and for that portion of their svbstance which they willingly offer for Thy honovr and seruice in this actibn; recompence it to them and theirs, and reward it sevenfold into their bosomes with better blessings; Lord bless England ovr sweet natie cowntry, saue it from Popery, this land from heathenisme, and both from Atheisme. And, Lord, heare their praiers for vs, and vs for them, and Christ Jesvs ovr gloriouvs Mediator for vs all. Amen.

CONSERVATISM AND PROGRESS

By the Reverend E. H. Ward, D. D.

TWO correspondents this week express gratification at the declaration of Mr. Minor that he interprets the Creed now just as he did seventy-two years ago. Is he using the word interpret in its usual sense signifying to expound the meaning or significance of a thing? Or does he mean that he holds the great underlying truths of the Creed as really as he did when a child? That is clearly what Mr. Green means.

Surely Mr. Minor does not mean that when ten years old, his thought of God, and man, and human life were the same as when he had reached his three score years. Says St. Paul, "When I was a child I thought as a child, but when I became a man I put away childish things"; that is, he interpreted things differently. If we "grow in grace and in the knowledge of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," then our interpretation of religious truth must change to correspond with our enlarged experience. Upon this point I am quite sure that Bishop Lawrence and Mr. Minor would be agreed if they understood each other.

The same is true of the opposition called forth by the Dallas pastoral letter. The confusion of thought in the use of the words "facts" and "truths" is quite inexcusable in such a document, where we have a right to expect reasonable clarity of expression. Fact is static, something done, as the etymology of the word indicates. Truth is progressive and "the thoughts of men are widened by the process of the suns."

Back of every article of the Creed there is a great underlying truth, but there is no fact, as the compilers of the Creed believed, so far as at least five articles are concerned. Not even Bishop Hall or Bishop Matthews would interpret the articles, "He descended into Hell," "He ascended into Heaven and sitteth on the right hand of God," as the compilers of the Creed interpreted them, and as Christians generally for more than a thousand years understood them.

Bishop Gore, who is regarded as one of our most conservative scholars, as well as a champion of orthodoxy, has said that our Creeds and formularies from time to time need restatement and reinterpretation. Surely there is such a thing as progress everywhere else, and is the religious world the only exception? The ideas of sovereignty and fatherhood have undergone the most tremendous changes in our own life-time. Until the time of the Stuarts in England and the Bourbons in France, the Sovereign was generally an autocrat, and like Nebuchadnezzar, "whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive; whom he would he set up and whom he put down." This idea of sovereignty was transferred to God, and Calvinism set up an infinite Nebuchadnezzar as its God. When in the Declaration of Independence it was declared that kings and emperors did not rule by divine right, but that rulers derived all just authority from the consent of the governed, a new idea entered the political world which was destined to work great changes in the religious world as well.

Silently that idea has permeated the thought of the Christian world and Calvinism has disappeared, or at least has passed into innocuous desuetude. At a club meeting attended by fifteen of the most intellectual men in America, I made this statement: "The greatest change which has ever taken place in Christian thought has come during my own ministry. At its beginning the idea of God's Fatherhood was completely swallowed up in the idea of His sovereignty. To doubt that He would consign to the flames of everlasting torment all dying impenitent would no doubt have held up my ordination. To doubt the eternity of punishment was thought to be sufficient reason why I should be made to endure it."

Every one present said the statement would stand, and among those present was a philosopher and theologian of international reputation. Man's idea of God is by far the most important that can ever engage his attention. The questions which are now disturbing the peace of the Church are trivial when compared with man's thought of the moral character of God; and yet the greatest change, which has ever taken place in the nineteen centuries of Church history, did not call forth as much opposition as the statement that the Virgin Birth of Jesus was not a matter of vital importance. Surely all will agree that a worthy idea of God is of supreme importance; then why make any other idea in theology static?

Life in this world is known to us under only two conditions, viz., evolution or degeneration, growth or decay. Evolution always means more life and fuller life; degeneration less and less life and final death. There is nothing static, and every doctrine which is not capable of expansion and growth is doomed. The mass of so-called fundamentalists and modernists would find they are agreed on every important truth if they could only understand each other. Each gets the heart of the truth, but each gets it in a different way. Both conservatism and progress are needed, in order to reach the truth, and brethren should be patient and tolerant of each other.

"O backward looking son of Time
The new is old and the old is new,
The current of a change sublime ?
Still sweeping through."

"Take heart the waster builds again,
Old goodness hath a charmed life,
The tares may perish, but the grain
Is not for death.

"For life shall on and upward go,
The step of progress ever beats
To that great anthem, calm and slow,
Which God repeats.

"God works in all things, all obey
His first propulsion from the night,
Wake thou and watch, the world is gray
With morning light."

If the Church is to make real, permanent advancement, Conservatism and Progress must go hand in hand. The great law of continuity cannot be broken without disastrous results. The Church must keep her feet planted upon the Rock of Ages, the great body of Catholic Truth, but her Face must ever be turned to the dawn.

THE OPEN MIND IN RELIGION

An Address Before the Alumni of the Theological Seminary in Virginia

PART 2.

III.

IT is the spirit of free inquiry, then, that is needed in the Church. But there are numerous and serious obstacles in the way of the growth of such a spirit. Many good men and women long for the voice of authority to speak and relieve them of all necessity for worry as to what they should believe. The Roman position for those who can accept it must be a source of abiding comfort and peace. For the Roman Catholic no searching for truth is called for, only an obedient, thankful mind to accept as true that which the Church decrees. The great fallacy in such a position is that it is too comforting, too mathematically perfect. It is folly to say things are so because people wish they were. It is related of Horace Greenley that he had in his desk a pigeon-hole labeled "Important if True." Some theologies belong in that pigeon-hole. The teaching of Jesus would seem to be that the search for truth is a stern and up-hill business. I can find in the Gospels no evidence that He contemplated a system authorized to hand out guaranteed packages of truth as a storekeeper hands out goods. The Christian quest for Christ Himself was not easy; and the disciple is not above his Lord. We long for certainty but it never comes. Forever testing, discarding, doubting, qualifying, mankind must struggle for the truth. We may wish it were not so, but we can not change the fact. When the cloudy pillar moves onward we can but strike our tents and follow, however comfortable our present camping ground. Truth is for the man who has the faith to follow its gleam, "O'er moor and fen, O'er crag and torrent, till the night is gone."

Our minds are wont to follow the line of least resistance. Just as the subconscious self employs all sorts of devices to save wear and tear, so our intellectual processes tend to shun the more difficult way. The lure of partisanship is very strong, bidding us join a group and allow that group to do our thinking for us. In a social age, like our own, this temptation may become all but irresistible. Where one thinker will maintain his independence in a time of controversy there are hundreds who pin a party label upon their hearts and espouse the standpoint of a group. There is a grave danger in so doing. Partisanship and the open mind are enemies. If we must ally ourselves with parties at least let us do so without sacrificing our intellectual freedom. The more unbalanced and blatant members may become its spokesmen and their utterances grossly misrepresent the views of the more cautious members. Parties have a tendency, also, to swing into extreme positions which without qualification cannot be justified. Conservatism tends to grow reactionary and liberalism iconoclastic. Individualism may end in the chaos of anarchy, socialism in the tyranny of oligarchy. Whoever belongs to a party, religious or political, needs to be on his guard lest the party drift sweep him into deeps he never dreamed of. I say this while recognizing that within certain limits and under certain conditions, group investigation and effort are both desirable. Only the open mind, the dauntless spirit of intellectual freedom, can counteract the dangers of party affiliation.

Partisanship may present alternatives to our minds which are not true alternatives. The blind partisan is apt to believe strongly in dilemmas, which are among the most dangerous of logical devices. To confront a man with a pitiless "either . . . or" is very rarely a fair procedure. Dilemmas are easily forced. "Either . . . or" cannot always accurately picture a situation. "Both . . . and" is always broader and on the whole safer. For example, consider the so-called antagonism between religion and science. "Do you hold the religious or scientific view of nature?" a devout, female parishioner once asked me. And when, steadfastly refusing to be gored on either horn of her dilemma, I answered quite truthfully that I held both views of nature, she affirmed that I had evaded her question. Those who would create the popular impression that religion and science are mutually antagonistic in my judgment are hurting the cause of truth. There is no necessary antagonism between religion and science. Each is true and each casts light upon the positions of the other. It is highly possible for a man to be both an ardent scientist and a devout Christian. Nothing but confusion and loss can come from the attempt to separate the two. Is the truth such a small and simple thing that a single point of view can command the whole of it? The religious world sometimes makes sport of the Anglican Communion for claiming to be Catholic and Protestant; and yet, beyond doubt the Anglican was the only open-minded view of history taken by any group at the Reformation. It is possible that the temple of Christian Truth is spacious enough to have Protestant inscribed over one portal and Catholic over another. This seems to be the Anglican position at any rate, and those who would prove the Church only Catholic, as well as those who would have it only Protestant, are demonstrating that their minds are less inclusive than the mind of the Church.

A serious obstacle to the growth of the spirit of free thought is always the danger that inheres in it. Let it be frankly recognized that the open mind has its perilous aspects. So has eating, or breathing, or crossing the street. Freedom of inquiry may at times lead us astray; but the suspicion in the popular mind that the Church fears and disapproves of critical examination of her position is far more apt to lead men astray. Many a man if told he must not think, forcibly breaks away and goes too far; but if gladly and freely allowed to exercise his intellectual powers his reason is satisfied and he comes to earth nearer home. To deny freedom of speech is to make men radicals and revolutionists. To clamp the lid hastens the explosion. It is high time we found this out. Permit people to think freely and that very liberty becomes a break upon their radicalism.

Many Christians shrink from the demands of the open mind because of the actual loss entailed. Old views of truth are precious, old convictions become hallowed through long employment, and it requires considerable fortitude to give them up. It is far less disturbing to one's temper, intellectual and otherwise, to sit calmly on the bank than to battle with the eddy and swirl of midstream. If the old faith was good enough for our fathers it is good enough for us. Such an attitude is creditable and we feel genuine sympathy with those who hold it. It is a question of enriching, not abandoning, the faith of our fathers, and to this end we can but press on toward the goal, knowing that progress means change. Every advance carries a loss. Who does not regret the passing of the leisured stage-coach, the white-winged sailing vessel, the fireside spinning wheel? To lose these means to lose something of the poetry and romance of life. Yet silently they have slipped away, we understand, and we would not have it otherwise. So do our ideas about religion, as about all else, melt into the misty pass, new ones are born into their places, and thus the Holy Spirit leads us as the Dear Master said He would.

But, some one objects, is it not our duty to "stand by" the truth? Yes, if we mean by that being true to our convictions. But assuredly truth is in no danger from the possible results of human thought. Oliver Wendell Holmes once wrote an imaginary dialogue between himself and a theological student. "I am afraid, he said, you express yourself a little too freely on a most important subject. Is there not danger in introducing discussions or allusions relating to matters of religion into common discourse?" "Danger to what?" I asked. "Danger to truth," he replied after a slight pause. "I didn't know truth was such an invalid," I said. "How long is it since she could only take the air in a closed carriage with a gentleman in a black suit on the box? . . . Truth is tough. It will not break like a bubble at a touch; nay, you may kick it around all day like a football, and it will be round and full at evening. Does not Mr. Bryan say that Truth will get well if she is run over by a locomotive, while Error dies of lockjaw if she scratches a finger? . . . I think generally that fear of open discussion implies feebleness of inward conviction, and great sensitiveness to the expression of individual opinion is the mark of weakness." (The Professor At the Breakfast Table, Everyman's Edition, Pages 102 and 103.) We, of course, admit that crude, unscholarly thought may do harm. That only means that good things may be abused. But from reverent, scholarly, open-minded study of the Christian Religion only good can finally be the outcome. Let us not fear to exercise the mental freedom which is rightly ours because obstacles lie prone across our pathway.

IV.

Up to this thought we have considered the open mind in religion through the lens of more or less abstract thought. From now on we must be more specific. I should now like to describe how the open-minded approach can aid us in facing certain critical objections to the validity of the Christian religion. In this section I shall quote freely from Bishop Gore, who more conspicuously than any other first-rank, Anglican thinker has sought to reconstruct Christian belief from a standpoint that is at the same time modern and open-minded. It is essential to our argument also, to repeat that free thought does not necessarily turn us away from the time-honored convictions of our faith. On the contrary it has power to lead us back with strengthened faith and firmer trust. The unequivocal words of Bishop Gore are reassuring. "I (have) endeavored to pursue a purely critical method. I (have) sought to construct the fabric of belief which has seemed to me the most probable on the evidence. In result it (has) appeared that the intellectual construction which (has) best satisfied the requirements of reason and criticism was (has been) substantially the traditional faith of Christendom." (Belief in the Holy Spirit and the Church, Page v.) Lest any should think this quotation evidence of a closed, not open, mind let him recall that it was written at the end, not the beginning of the investigation.

It is hard to avoid the suspicion that a great deal of modern critical thought is based on a priori assumption which color the evidence and pervert the conclusion. The destructive school of German criticism started in a purpose to banish the supernatural from the domain of thoughtful religion. Today there are theological writers and speakers who seem to assume from the outset that the miraculous and supernatural are irrational. Others work on the too-hasty hypothesis that no objective reality can be postulated of the items of Christian conviction. This procedure is unscientific and utterly out of place in a free investigation. Theological inquiry is never justified to prove a point assumed and preconceived. One investigator has no more right to assume that miracles cannot happen than another has to assume the opposite. Although it is impossible to entirely submerge prejudice and eliminate the personal equation, yet it must be our honest purpose so to do. That man is an unsafe guide and an incompetent thinker who allows his preconceived belief that God is not a person, but only a "value judgment" to color and warp his freedom of thought. The value of Bishop Gore's recent work is that he strived, I think, on the whole successfully, to divest himself of unproved assumptions and to study the evidence with the personal detachment of a scientist. Those who believe that Bishop Gore succeeds in being open-minded will derive untold help from his three volumes on the Reconstruction of Belief.

Man's belief in God is of course the tap root of religion. Cut that and the tree dies. Is it true that the progress of modern thought has made it impossible to believe in a God who is anything more than an idea? Has our right to believe in a personal, living, Heavenly Father been snatched away from us? Has science disproved God? This is a serious matter, and it troubles many a mind today. What shall we do about it? There are but two courses of action open: either to ignore these mutterings, or fearlessly to study them. Suppose we ignore them. Will not the impression at once be created that we are intellectually afraid; and will not the world be confirmed in its suspicion that we are opposed to the growth of knowledge? And besides, will there not always lurk within ourselves a faint and far-off voice of distrust, whispering that our faith is a hot-house, exotic thing, that needs to be shielded from the cold of doubt and the winds of criticism, lest it get its tendrils nipped? Is it not much better to face all these questionings and draw the conclusion which the evidence suggests? This is precisely what Bishop Gore has done in Belief in God. He endeavors to assume nothing, he fairly considers all the evidence, Biblical criticism, modern science, and comparative religion, and this is his conclusion: "We (have) found no justification for dismissing as irrational the idea that God after whom reason gropes, and whom it dimly discovers, should be such a being as can meet the aspirations of reason by positive self-disclosure from His own side. And when we studied the record of the prophets and of Jesus, we found the conviction became irresistible that here we really have, as nowhere else in the world the word of God." (Belief in the Holy Spirit and the Church, Page 338.) Thus does the open mind lead us back to the God of our fathers.

Another point at which we must either stop our ears to what modern critics are saying, or else frankly meet them on the common ground of free inquiry concerns the doctrine of Jesus Christ. Is the traditional interpretation of Him substantially correct or has modern thought rendered it untenable? In Jesus do we really meet God, become incarnate? Was He just a man in whom God dwelled? Did His existence begin when He was born of Mary? Is He in truth the Saviour of the world? Was He indeed such a person as the New Testament writers and the traditions of the Church represent Him to have been? Thoughtful moderns demand an adequate answer to these questions, and refusal to examine our foundations in the light of that demand will in the end, as we have said, render the world uncertain of the Church, and the Church uncertain of herself. Again Bishop Gore comes to the rescue in an extraordinarily frank and open-minded volume entitled Belief in Christ. This volume is an attempt to take a critical estimate of all the evidence which concerns the Person of Christ, and to show that the belief about Him which really grows out of the evidence taken all together, and which best accounts for all the facts, is just the traditional belief in the Incarnation of the Eternal Son of God. I seem to see the intellectuals of my generation, and the generations below me, as for the most part the victims of a delusion. What is called "free thought" is really thought enslaved to a negative dogma, which is not really valid; viz., that the sort of redemptive action of a personal God, which the Bible professes to record, cannot really have occurred. If the inhibition of this negative dogma is removed, if the inquirer is again really open-minded, then I believe, that free enquiry will be found to establish what is substantially the traditional belief." (Belief in Christ, Pages v.vi.) And again, "The traditional faith has been at times associated with uncritical history, and with an impossible theory of the effect of inspiration, and with estimates of Christ's Godhead which tends to efface His real manhood, and with doctrines of redemption against which our moral nature rebels. But we (have) sought to purge the idea of the Incarnate Person and His work of all such associations, and to maintain a doctrine of His Person and work which is fully in accord with the historical evidence, which is in no respect an offense to our reason or conscience and which in its whole substance is just the faith of the New Testament and the Church, which has been verified in an almost world-wide experience." (Belief in the Holy Spirit and the Church, Pages 340, 341.) In such fashion does the open mind help us to discover the Christ of history.

A third question which is being asked today, and which must be met like the others, concerns the Christian Church. The critical world is enquiring with a new insistency. What is the Church, and what is the authority of its credentials? Did Jesus Christ found it? What truth is there in the view that the Christian Church is based upon a perverted version of the person and teachings of Jesus; first set upon its feet through political forces; and containing at the heart of its system a group of pagan survivals? Has the Church really a just claim to be the divinely appointed agent of God in saving man? And again be it noted that whatever answers we give must be drawn from an unbiased examination of the evidence. The world will be suspicious of any other sort of answer. Evasion and refusal to answer are interpreted as signs of a weak case. In his third volume, Belief in the Holy Spirit and the Church, Bishop Gore faces these questions without prejudice, and faithfully sifts the evidence. I have space only to quote his brief conclusion: "It is true we saw (have seen) that Our Lord did not found a new Church; but all the evidence converges that He refounded the old Church on a new basis, and reequipped it with officers in the persons of the Twelve Apostles, and with certain sacramental rites of fellowship." (Page 341.) Once more the open mind proves its value by vindicating the central position of the Christian Church.

That the Christian consciousness is richer after such a bold and careful investigation scarcely needs to be pointed out. Men see that religion can meet criticism and come forth vindicated, and that by the common tests our faith proves its mettle. While learning much from modern thought we do not need to surrender our essential position. Ours need be no longer a cloistered peace. Ours that deeper peace that follows triumphant effort. Thus is the Church of the Living God enabled to go forward with a new faith in her own powers, and a new dependence upon the leading of her Lord.

V.

The Protestant Episcopal Church aims to be a broad and inclusive Church, which, as we have seen, attempts to view history open-mindedly, and seeks to give standing ground to those who hold divergent views. Therefore its ability to maintain its position depends upon its willingness always to be fair. There is a misleading phrase, "Anglican Moderation," which unless defined may convey an impression of a tendency to compromise or a desire always in the middle of the road. Compromise must not be the policy of the Episcopal Church. The way of compromise is as a general thing not the way of truth. Not alone the middle of the road, but the whole road is occasionally to be avoided. Merely to preserve a balance between extremes may be a coward's part. I believe the genius of the Anglican Church essentially and at bottom to be not compromise, but the spirit of the open mind.

If the Protestant Episcopal Church today will but base its policies upon tolerance, democracy, evangelism, and service beyond question it can be the Church of the Future. No Church in Christendom holds in its hands so many of the threads of Church Unity. None, is better entitled to give to the youth of the land that healthy, buoyant, positive gospel which they rightly are demanding. None is more highly honored among the leaders of our thought and life. To be sure its faults and failings are many, but they are as nothing compared to its opportunities. Without charity and open-mindedness these possibilities can never be realized. Towards the other Christian bodies; towards the aspirations of the young people; towards the struggling masses of our citizenship; towards the nations of the world and their problems; towards our brethren of different minds within our own household,—in every case a mind honest and open towards the light, patient, ready to learn, eager to serve.

Upon us as individuals, leaders by virtue of our office, a duty falls. In the eyes of modern American opinion the Protestant Episcopal Church is identified with our presentation of it. If we, its official spokesmen, vision our office in terms of position rather than of service; if our tempers are intolerant; if our minds are narrow and our spirits partisan; if our hearts are cold and uncharitable and unbrotherly; if we are content to preach less than a whole gospel; if we are unsympathetic towards the doubts, aspirations, strivings of our people; if we fear to speak that which the Holy Spirit gives us to speak,—then in proportion to our influence and weight we will hurt the Church.

Let us in the Protestant Episcopal Church be careful how we minimize belief, as unfortunately sometimes seems to be the fashion. Nothing could ultimately kill the Church so effectually as for the Church to adopt as her creed, "It makes little difference what we believe so long as we live right and serve our fellow men." It would be just as reasonable to say it makes no difference what an author thinks so long as he writes good books! It is absurd to say creeds do not matter. They positively do matter. Each man's conduct, whether he will or not, flows out of his belief; and if he says he has no creed, that's his creed. Studdert-Kennedy puts it well when he says: "Follow your conscience and you can't go wrong is popular cant and clap-trap. Many of the most damnable deeds in history were done by conscientious people. Their conscience was alright but their creed was all wrong. Your conscience is only an eye which must have light to see with, and your creed is the light by which your conscience sees. Without your creed it will trip you up and break your neck." (I believe, Page 10.) I wish nothing in this paper to be construed as an argument against creeds. We must have them. We cannot live and serve aright unless we think and believe aright. Only let it be an open-minded and not a pad-locked creed.

Once more, all must remember that for constructive theological thought long and accurate training is necessary. It is easy for a clergyman who is a success as a popular preacher, as a parish priest, as a writer, or as the leader of a large parish, to fancy that therefore he will be a success as a theologian and as a reviser of the creeds of Christendom. Non sequiter. Few performances are in poorer taste, or fraught with greater peril, than for a preacher without sufficient training, without possessing the necessary intellectual gifts, or without adequate preparation, to attempt to deal critically with the great doctrines of the Church in the presence of a miscellaneous congregation. Let us preach doctrine, by all means; but let us do it with care and due humility. The Church must sink its foundations upon ground more solid than that prepared by the amateur, eleven o'clock Sunday morning theologians. The Protestant Episcopal Church sorely needs just now a large number of trained thinkers. They can be developed in time through scholarships and fellowships in our Seminaries and colleges, and through relieving adequately qualified Bishops and other clergy of so much of their routine duties as will permit them to give time to scholarly pursuits.

I have spoken to little purpose if at the end of my paper the open mind in religion does not appear as a worthy object of Christian search. Let no man think he may win it easily. Like everything else really of the will of Christ it comes hard. L. P. Jacks aptly describes the task of those who would be the disciples of Jesus. "Whoever sets out to follow Christ will have to follow Him a long way, and to follow him into some dark places. The path we have to follow is a narrow one. It runs all the time on the edge of a precipitous mystery, sometimes taking you up to the sunlit heights and the Mount of Transfiguration, and sometimes taking you down into the fires of suffering and into the shadows of death. Following Christ means that when you find these dizzy things before you, these dark things in your path, you go through them and not around them. Have you a good head? Have you a stout heart? Are you loyal to the leader in the front? Easy enough while the road runs by the shining shores of the Lake of Galilee, but not so easy when it turns into the Garden of Gethsemane and become the Via Dolorosa." (Religious Perplexities, Pages 86-87.) These beautiful words are true of the striving of the Christian life. They are likewise true of the quest of the open mind.

Stewardship

The idea of stewardship is this—that what we have and what we are is not our own. But has been placed in our hands as a kind of trust of which an accounting must finally be made.

There is probably no thought that is more firmly embedded in the human consciousness than that of possession. This fact of possession has attached to itself so naturally the idea of right and independence in possession that most of us are incapable of thinking in the Christian term of stewardship.

And yet the fact does remain that, for all we have and all we are, there must be an accounting made.

The New Testament is full of this truth: of which the parable of the talents is the central illustration.

We are thinking now of the Christian's four-fold stewardship of Worship—of Faith—of Possessions—of Life.

It is a singularly impressive thing that Christ never asked anything of anybody. On the face of it. His calling of His Disciples was nothing short of preposterous, and, yet, apparently without explanation of wordy justification, He called person after person from one daily pursuit or another into His fellowship.

The truth is that this calling is preposterous save on the ground that the invitation was extended by no one less than the Sovereign Lord of life Himself.

To Him Who had given everything, it could not occur that He should ask of others less than everything.

He asked of men, themselves, as simply as one might ask a cup of cold water of his neighbor. Indeed, Christ's whole life was a great act of reclamation in this respect, that what had become divorced from God's Proprietorship through the selfishness and perversity of man, God, now, through His Son, was claiming again as His own. Thus, must it be borne in upon us, who are called by Christ's Name, that the blessed privileges of Worship, of Faith, of Possessions, and of Life are really an investment that God makes in us and of which He requires a return with interest.

But we think more especially at this time of the privileges rather than of the responsibilities of stewardship. When one contemplates what has been entrusted to the care and supervision and the cooperation of man, one must be profoundly impressed with the potential dignity and glory of human kind.

To have it all our power to forward or to obstruct a plan of God is in itself and at once the guarantee of our God-childhood and the possibility of our falling from the high estate thereof.

So, we would escape from the fallacy of human proprietorship and, excising from our consciousness that word "mine" and all of its connotation, cultivate within ourselves the spirit of that old hymn:

Oh, the bitter shame and sorrow,

That a time could ever be

When I let the Saviour's pity

Plead in vain, and proudly answered,

"All of self, and none of Thee."

Yet He found me: I beheld Him

Bleeding on the accursed tree;

Heard Him pray, "Forgive them, Father";

And my wistful heart said faintly,

"Some of self, and some of Thee."

Day by day His tender mercy,

Healing, helping, full and free,

Sweet and strong, and ah! so patient,

Brought me lower, while I whispered,

"Less of self, and more of Thee."

Higher than the highest heavens,

Deeper than the deepest sea,

Lord, Thy love at last has conquered;

Grant me now my soul's desire

"None of self, and all of Thee."

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Editor.

A HOT WEATHER DIVERSION.

The days are hot and long and our collars wilt and crumple quickly unless we forestall them by putting on soft ones to begin with, and it is difficult to keep our dispositions from undergoing the same crumpling process from which our collars are suffering.

These conditions make it all the more important to impress cheerfulness upon our readers as a Christian virtue and duty.

For this reason we are going to suggest the doing of something that will bring you joy every minute while you do it. The reader would never guess what this joyous proceeding is to be so we might as well tell it frankly. It is to read a book of the Bible!

Now don't feel discouraged and think that we have been deceiving you and just leading you on to a mirage in the scorching desert of the torrid heat. Of course to find joy every minute in the reading of a book of the Bible means that you must be a little careful as to the selection of the book. We do not recommend Lamentations or Job for this purpose.

If, however, you will turn to St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, you will find that our suggestion is literally true. That letter which was sent from Rome contains only four short chapters, and can be read by the average reader in eighteen minutes, and in it you will meet with the words "joy," and "rejoice" no less than nineteen times, so it is an actual and literal fact that you find joy every minute in its perusal.

In the fourth verse of the last chapter you get the direct command which makes cheerfulness a Christian duty as well as a happy attribute of Christian character. It is in this verse that St. Paul gives the direct command to his friends in the Macedonian city, for he exclaims, "Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice!"

Cheerfulness is a social quality which gives us an excuse for writing about it on this page. It is a part of your social service to "rejoice in the Lord alway," for it is only when you are happy yourself that you can bring cheer to others. This quality is not solely social. It can be practiced alone, and it ought to be. If you have no company but yourself you should make yourself as agreeable to yourself as you possibly can; nevertheless it is in the group formation that this flower of Christian virtue blossoms to the best advantage—and to the greatest usefulness.

It is necessary to call the attention of many good people to this command to be joyful, because there are such numbers of them who have entirely overlooked it, and in fact, seem to think that the injunction is just the other way, and that it is only in an atmosphere of solemnity, if not actual sadness, that religion feel at home.

Happily this attitude is changing for the better, and it is now some years ago since a long-faced Puritan parson made this entry in his diary, "This day attended a wedding, but by God's grace, my sermon banished all carnal joy from the occasion." We say a "long-faced" parson made that entry though we have no authority for such a description of him, except our knowledge of the effect that this attitude of mind produces upon the appearance of those who assume it, and especially upon those who consider it an essential part of their religious equipment.

Think of the contrast between the effect of this divine presence, and that of his Lord and Master. Our Saviour, too, attended a wedding, but, by God's grace, His being a guest did nothing to banish the joy from that occasion.

On the contrary He exercised His divine power to add to the hospitality of the festivities.

Let us return, however, to the primary object of this article, which is to induce our readers to become acquainted with the Epistle of the Philippians as a happy hot weather diversion. Its reading will also teach us a great lesson in the art of letter writing. (Which is in danger of becoming a lost art.) For should we have the energy to read a little more of the Good Book and go back to the sixteenth chapter of the Book of Acts of the Apostles we shall find that during his stay in Philippi St. Paul had been the recipient of most harsh and unfair treatment. He had been cruelly beaten without a trial, had been subjected to the closest confinement in "the inner prison," which, judging from our knowledge of jails today, must have been a truly terrible place. Yet there is not a single reference to anything of that sort in this joyous letter that he writes from Rome to his friends. From its tone one might suppose that he was on a pleasure trip, or had just achieved some great accomplishment that had been the desire of his soul, so great is its buoyant and triumphant tone. Again there is a surprise in store for the reader, and a lesson for the letter writer; for at the time those words were penned, the author of them was in prison, awaiting trial for his life.

That, however, is the great secret of real Christian cheerfulness. It is the conqueror of its surroundings. Prison walls and impending death could not keep the happy strain out of that letter to his friends, because the writer knew "that to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

That peace which passes all understanding," and comes from God and perfect trust and confidence in Him, carries us through life, through death, and into all eternity. It is well worth cultivating, and the surest way to find it is to read about Him and those who loved and depended upon Him.

No more inspiring example of this can be found than the Epistle to the Philippians read in connection with the sixteenth chapter of Acts. TRY IT.

PROBATION PAYS.

Putting juvenile delinquents on probation results in rescuing many children from what might become careers of crime. This is the verdict of the Massachusetts Commission on Probation, appointed by the Massachusetts Legislature to find out what happened to probationers after they had been discharged from supervision. Nearly three hundred boys between seven and seventeen years of age were included in the study; two hundred and thirty-nine of these boys, it was found, were carried through the original probation period without surrender and commitment. Sixty per cent of the boys discharged from probation to the community had no subsequent court record; and eighty-seven per cent had not at any time been committed to institutions. In order to find out something about the habits and work records of these boys after their discharge, nearly two hundred of those who had been put on probation in 1915 were studied during 1923. It was found that seventy-eight per cent of them were steady workers and eighty-seven per cent were non-drinkers. The best showing was made by the boys on probation for one year or more.

"Teach us the lesson Thou hast taught,
To feel for those Thy Blood hath bought,
That every word, and deed and thought,
May work a work for Thee.

For all are brethren far and wide
Since Thou, O Lord, for all hast died;
Then teach us whatso'er betide,
To love them all in Thee.

In sickness, sorrow, want, or care,
Whate'er it be, 'tis ours to share:
May we where help is needed, there
Give help as unto Thee.

IMPRESSIVE SERVICE AT ANCIENT SHRINE

By Vera Palmer

REGARDLESS of lowering clouds and even occasional showers, hundreds of men and women crowded into the little church at Jamestown on the afternoon of the Third Sunday after Trinity for that celebration of the Holy Sacrament which each year marks the anniversary of the first Anglican Communion in the Western World. Three hundred and seventeen years have passed since the Rev. Robert Hunt gathered together his courageous little flock and there beneath a widespread sail from one of the tiny ships administered the sacred bread and wine in thanksgiving for their safe journey across the uncharted seas to a land on which the sun had smiled and where the fruits of the earth were abundant.

Before the appointed hour not only was every seat occupied, but also all available standing room at the doorways and in the tower, the latter, with the foundations, constituting what remains of the original churches built by the colonists. The congregation was comprised of visitors from Williamsburg, Newport News, Hampton, Norfolk, Tono and Richmond. The Rt. Rev. Beverley Dandridge Tucker, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, was the celebrant, assisted by the Rev. E. Ruffin Jones, rector of Bruton Parish Church, Williamsburg, and minister-in-charge of Jamestown; and the Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, D. D.

Bishop Tucker, who was also the preacher, took his text from the Gospel, appointed for the day, St. Luke 15:9, "I have found the piece which was lost," giving a most scholarly and impressive address, the "piece" in question referring, of course, to the heretofore lost continent which was to be saved to the Cross. During the communion service the Bishop read the same prayer which Robert Hunt gave so long ago and which, by episcopal decree, was read in every parish church in Southern Virginia this Third Sunday after Trinity.

The beautiful service at hallowed and historic Jamestown was initiated twelve years ago by the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities under the untiring leadership of Mrs. John B. Lightfoot, who for nearly two decades has been chairman of the Jamestown Committee of the Association. From the beginning she has received the hearty approval and cooperation of the Bishop of the Diocese of Southern Virginia. Never until this year, however, has the service been held under cover and then solely on account of the inclemency of the weather. In the open did those first English settlers consecrate themselves to God and country and in the open have their descendants offered up their prayers of gratitude to the Heavenly Father for giving to the Anglo-Saxon race custody over this vast country.

At first only a mere handful gathered to commemorate this greatest historical event in the American Church, but each year the congregations grew until dozens expanded into scores and then into hundreds until in 1922 fifteen hundred men and women, representing almost the entire

Atlantic Seaboard and more, assembled on the Island, where there forefathers had faced, and ultimately conquered, famine, disease, dissensions within and the deadly tomahawk of the Indian. That was the year in which was dedicated the Rev. Robert Hunt Memorial Shrine, erected by the Colonial Dames of America in the State of Virginia.

Now each summer, weather permitting, the celebration is held at this shrine, which consists of an altar of Indiana limestone beneath a reredos of bronze, picturing in bas-relief that first communion under the sail when the communicants knelt at a chancel rail made from the bark-covered limb of a sappling resting on bark-covered wooden horses, instead of before the substantial granite rail, now part of the shrine. But the words of the ancient liturgy are unchanged and the silver vessels used are those which for years found place on the altar of the Jamestown Church and now are held for safe-keeping in the crypt of old Bruton.

Although, perhaps, it is easier in the open to bring to mind the scene of that first administration of the communion on Virginia's soil, yet the tiny edifice, so permeated with the history of the colony, has a very real appeal of its own. One cannot look on those old bricks without picturing the slight figure of Pocahontas as she stood before the font to receive the sacrament of Christian baptism, or recalling to memory that group of fearless men that formed the first legislative body in America a year before the Pilgrims landed on New England's rocky coast, and then try to visualize the difficulties and achievements of those whose bodies lie in numbered graves beneath the bricks of the flooring.

Never until this Third Sunday after Trinity has the church been used for a communion since its restoration and the visitor expecting to find sumptuous furnishings must have been surprised at the extreme simplicity. The location of the ancient altar is behind an iron picket fence, placed there for protection. Thus, the communicants knelt on the bare bricks without chancel rail. But the dignity, sincerity and deep spirituality of the well-known words of the Prayer Book as spoken by the Bishop seemed to hold an added richness.

Hydrangeas from the garden of the Yeardley House decorated the background of the original chancel and roses planted in the same garden and carefully tended under the supervision of Mrs. Lightfoot were placed on the communion table, while members of Bruton choir led the familiar hymns. It was altogether an outstandingly beautiful service from the processional to the final "Amen," and when another Third Sunday after Trinity comes around may the skies be clear to permit of at least fifteen hundred gathering again in the sunshine before the memorial shrine to offer once more their prayers and thanksgiving unto Almighty God.

THE INAUGURATION OF A NATIONAL MONUMENT

An Effort to Givo the Jamestown Shrine Its Proper Place in the Life of the Nation

THE REV. E. RUFFIN JONES has inaugurated a movement that may become one of the largest in the Church, and, if properly supported will do much to call well-deserved attention to the fact that the first religious services conducted in the United States by English-speaking people were those found in the Book of Common Prayer, most of which are still used today throughout this country.

No doubt there are many people scattered over this broad land, who are descendants of those early settlers, and although, they may have changed their religious affiliations it is almost certain that they would be glad to associate themselves with this movement, one purpose of which is to emphasize the fact that the mighty structure of the United States of America had its beginning laid in a religious foundation.

The two kinds of membership suggested by Mr. Jones in the following appeal need not be confined either to members of the Protestant Episcopal Church nor to those who have ancestral connections with the early days of Virginia, but should include Christian people of all beliefs throughout the country who have the desire to make the motto on our coins, "In God we trust," a more vital fact in our national life, and to revive the knowledge that the first public gathering on the soil of the United States was for the purpose of giving thanks to God for His mercies, and asking His aid for future success.

THE ORDER OF JAMESTOWN.

Haec olim meminisse iuvabit.

The rich and sacred associations of Jamestown should be carried to all our people. What traditions more important than those of the planting upon our shores of our most holy religion, the establishment of our civilization with its Anglo-Saxon heritage of law and liberty, than those of the beginnings of representative government here in America with the calling of the first assembly in the church at Jamestown on July 30, 1619!

The island is now preserved inviolate, a place by a river side where prayer is wont to be made. Here the Robert Hunt Memorial Shrine has been erected with altar and rail of Indiana limestone, and reredos consisting of a handsome bronze bas-relief depicting the first open air celebration of the Holy Communion after the landing in 1607, according to the description left by Captain John Smith: "Wee did hang an awning (which is an old saile), to three or foure trees, to shadow us from the Sunne, our walles were railles of wood, our seats unhewed trees, till we cut planks, our Pulpit a bar of wood nailed to two neighbouring trees . . . we had daily Common Prayer morning and evening, every Sunday two Sermons, and every three months the Holy Communion."

For some years it has been the custom to hold a celebration on the Third Sunday after Trinity, which is believed to be the anniversary of the first communion, and also to have a short service with brief historical address on the Island every Sunday afternoon except in severe weather. We are now, however, effecting a definite organization with an enrolled membership that the old Mother Church of Jamestown may function in a large way in the life of the nation. We plan to send bulletins and messages at Easter and Christmas to all members, and a personal letter to each on his birthday, and on the Third Sunday after Trinity to summon all for whom it is possible to worship at the Shrine, also to encourage the observance of that day throughout the Church as Founders' Day with celebrations of the Holy Communion, and to urge upon our people to attend these services with a grateful remembrance of the foundations laid by our fathers. We plan also to provide a special commemorative badge or button to be worn on that day, and to make the celebrations on the Island more and more notable in character, and of ever greater interest to the nation at large.

Two Types of Membership.

First. We plan to enroll as regular members of the old mother shrine Churchmen everywhere who are out of touch with their home parishes. Such are found in the ranks of the commercial travelers, in the army and navy, and among those who have moved to new homes where they do not find the church. May it be ours to reach them with some measure of the Church's care, and the blessing of the faith of our fathers.

Second. We would enroll as associate members all who wish to receive our bulletins and messages, and become partners in our undertaking. This enrollment will not be limited to communicants of the Episcopal Church, but will be open to all who are in sympathy with our plans and will, of course, have no effect upon local affiliation elsewhere.

Annual dues for the present have been fixed as follows:

For the first class, whose primary obligation as full members is to the old Mother Church, the sum of $6.00 per annum, one dollar of which is to be set aside for permanent endowment, while the remainder will go into the current expense and missionary fund. Life membership, $100.

For the second class the sum of $1.50 per year, fifty cents of which will go for the endowment fund. Associate life membership, $25.

There may be taken also Foundation Membership in the sum of $500 as memorials to ancestors or loved ones, their names and that of the donor to be recorded permanently in our Book of Memorial, and the donor to receive perpetual rights of membership.

IT IS OUR PURPOSE THAT PRAYER SHALL EVER ASCEND FROM THE SACRED SOIL OF JAMESTOWN FOR THE MEMBERS OF OUR ORDER.

Resolutions Adopted by the World's Sunday School Convention, Glasgow, June 26, 1924

Nine resolutions were adopted. Following the general words of appreciation, the following statement was made concerning world brotherhood and peace:—"This Convention views with profound concern the long-continued national jealousies and racial antagonisms, and expresses its deep conviction that these things are contrary to the Will and purpose of the Eternal and Universal Father, and should be replaced by the spirit of Christianity, which makes for brotherhood and peace. It therefore earnestly calls upon all Sunday School people throughout the world to promote, by every means in their power, and especially by prayer and teaching, by example and cooperation in service, the coming of that Kingdom, which alone can secure on earth peace and goodwill towards men."

The declaration on total abstinence and prohibition was—"This Convention, recognizing the Sunday School as the chief educational department of the Church, strongly holds that it should be a vital factor in creating and maintaining public opinion in favor of total abstinence from intoxicating liquor and the prohibition of the manufacture and sale thereof. It urges upon leaders and workers to use the Sunday-school movement as a powerful agency in promoting world-wide prohibition by appropriate instruction, for which adequate place should be found in the lesson courses and by the use of the total abstinence pledge; and it calls upon every officer, teacher, and scholar to promote by precept and practice this great moral and social movement among the youth of all nations."

Child Welfare was thus emphasized—"The Convention, in the light of the incarnation and mission of our Lord, and, in the belief that the hope of the world lies with the young and the yet unborn, urgently advocates the adoption in all lands of such standards for child-welfare as will increasingly secure for children everywhere their essential rights. And this Convention calls upon Sunday Schools and other Christian workers to give leadership in a world campaign for a higher valuation of child-life and to devote service to national and local movements toward the practical application of the gospel to the betterment of the world's children."

Emphasis was placed upon the need for Sunday-school leadership—"The Convention is of the opinion that the time is ripe for a forward movement for religious education through the Sunday School. To this end trained and efficient leadership is of vital importance. It strongly recommends that a theoretical and practical course in religious education be included in the training of candidates alike for the ministry at home and on the mission field. It welcomes the increasing success of those colleges set apart for religious education, commends the opportunity they offer for training in Sunday-school leadership, and rejoices in the establishment of colleges for the better equipment of an indigenous leadership in the mission field."

The immediate program was defined—"This Convention expresses its deliberate judgment that in the Sunday School and its auxiliaries, the Church of God possesses its most effective instrument for world evangelization. It, therefore, earnestly recommends an immediate advance along the whole line, especially by the steady recruiting of unreached children and young people and of fresh teachers; the promotion of leadership and teacher training; the supply of lesson courses to meet the needs of each field; the provision of more adequate buildings and equipment; the development of instruction and auxiliaries; and by the stimulation of missionary enterprises and other Christian activities."

The observance of International Golden Rule Sunday, December 7, 1924, in the interests of the tens of thousands of orphan children and refugees of "Bible Lands" was endorsed.

The present challenge was announced—"The Convention is convinced that the present world situation constitutes a rare opportunity and a startling challenge to Christian Churches and Sunday Schools to improve and extend their work of Bible instruction and of educational evangelism, and to pursue with faith and courage the task to which the World's Sunday School Association is committed of bringing the children and young people of every land, and in every language, to the knowledge of God in Christ, through living teachers of revealed truth, and so, in time, to secure the world against the calamity of war; and it sends its heartiest greetings to the Sunday School workers throughout the world, and calls for many new volunteers to dedicate their service and wealth in this best and most hopeful of capital causes."

Negro Methodists Adopt Our Methods.

The Negro postman in a city in Georgia, who delivers the mail to the Diocesan Executive Secretary, asked her the other day if she would meet a committee from his Methodist Church, to help them work out a financial plan for their church on the budget system. Surrounded by eleven committee men she told them how to make up a parish budget, how to run an every-member canvass, and what the group system is! One of them was quite taken with the group system and thinks it is the thing they need. They were most interested. The Secretary adds, "I gave them Bishop Johnson's 'Stewardship' pamphlet, Mr. Pepper's 'Proportionate Giving,' the Bulletin on Group Organization and Suggestions to Canvassers, and also told them how to organize themselves into a working committee with sub-committees on finance, education, canvass and prayer! They were perfectly delighted."

Congestion at Hooker School.

Time was when Hooker School for Girls, just outside Mexico City, had a useful and much-needed auditorium. Last year the demand for sleeping space made it over into a dormitory and teachers' bedroom. That was bad enough, but this year it has had to be divided into class-rooms, and fifteen girls were turned away who would have been boarding pupils.

In spite of the hard times of revolution the enrollment has grown to ninety, an increase of twenty over last year. There is now an English department, with all classes taught in English from English books. The tuition is just double that for the same grades in the Mexican department, but there are twenty-two enrolled, aged four years to fifteen (kindergarten teacher wanted!). The commercial department, with a four years' course equivalent to a commercial high school, has seven pupils. It has been necessary to put their five typewriters in the library, which is not good for the library.

The primary and music and normal departments are advancing. One normal school student was lost to the school as she went to the Mexican normal, fearing that our certificate would be inferior to that of the government institution, which, considering the handicap of crowding and lack of teachers, is no wonder. The domestic science department has had to be dropped, for the present, for lack of a teacher. One with experience and marked initiative and adaptability is needed. More than twenty children under ten years were refused because there was no place to put them. The work among the young children is our greatest opportunity.

Enlarged a little and adequately staffed, the school, as Deaconess Newell realizes, could make a contribution of the greatest value to the development of Mexican womanhood, and through that to the stabilizing of Mexican life.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D.

The Bishop of Washington and Mrs. James E. Freeman have announced the engagement of their daughter, Elsie, to the Rev. Raymond L. Wolven. Mr.

Wolven is assistant rector of Epiphany Church, having held that position when Bishop Freeman was rector of the parish. Beginning September 1 Mr. Wolven will become vicar of Trinity Diocesan Parish. Bishop Freeman and his family have returned from their trip to England, and have gone to Lorrento, Maine, for the remainder of the summer. During this time the Bishop will visit other places in the interest of the Washington Cathedral.

St. Thomas' Church has been the recipient recently of a memorial given by Joseph McReynolds in memory of his mother. This memorial takes the form of two iron screens with double folding gates, placed before the organ chambers on the north and south sides of the east end of the church. The beauty of the interior of the church has been greatly enhanced by this addition. St. Thomas' Church is considered one of the most beautiful churches in Washington. Dr. Ernest Smith, the rector of the church, has just returned from a trip to Bermuda.

The Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker of the Virginia Theological Seminary, was the preacher at Trinity Diocesan Church at the eleven o'clock service on Sunday, July 13, and in the afternoon of the same day preached the sermon at the Cathedral open-air service.

M. M. W.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Church of the Good Shepherd, Brooke-wood.

On Sunday, July 6, a service of more than usual interest was held at the Church of the Good Shepherd at Brooke-wood, in Augusta County, this being the occasion of the formal opening of the building. The service was very largely attended, the congregation more than filling the church. Two persons were confirmed. During the past eighteen months, while services have been held in a school building nearby, thirty-five persons have been baptized and there have been seventeen confirmations, including those above noted. The Rev. John J. Gravatt, Jr., rector of Trinity Church, Staunton, has charge also of this new church at Brooke-wood.

At the service last Sunday Bishop Jett preached and administered the rite of confirmation, and other ministers taking part in the service were the Rev. Mr. Gravatt, the Rev. J. Lewis Gibbs, rector of Emmanuel Church, Staunton, and the Rev. Theodore H. Evans, who is for the present in charge of St. John's Church, Waynesboro, and also assists the Rev. Mr. Gravatt at Brooke-wood.

For some time there was a Sunday School conducted by one of the other denominations, in a public school building. Owing to small attendance this was practically abandoned. Mrs. Jos. S. Cochran, who lives nearby and has been a member of Trinity Church, Staunton, continued the Sunday School and gathered an increasing number of grown persons and young people. Gradually a desire for an organized congregation manifested itself. On Thanksgiving Eve, 1923, after a brief entertainment, Bishop Jett told the story of the Episcopal Church: its faith, customs, etc. Shortly thereafter it was decided to proceed at once with plans to erect a church building. This building which, as recently noted in the Church papers, has just been completed, has a seating capacity for one hundred and fifty persons, and the chancel is churchly and arranged for the accommodation of a choir.

It is interesting to note that up to the time that Mrs. Cochran began her activities in connection with the Sunday School here none of the people of the community, with the exception of two or three families, were Episcopalians. The success of the movement is chiefly due to Mrs. Cochran, who had at all times the fine support of her husband.

The plans for the building were donated to Bishop Jett by Messrs. Thos. J. Collins and Brother, Architects of Staunton.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., Coadjutor.

New Rector at Romney and Moorefield: Rev. H. P. Lyman-Wheaton, D. D., Trinity Church, Lawrenceville, Indiana, will shortly assume charge of St. Stephen's, Romney, and Emmanuel Church, Moorefield.

Summer Conference, Sweetbriar, Virginia: Bishop Gravatt attended the Summer Conference of the Dioceses of Virginia and West Virginia, at Sweetbriar, Virginia.

The Rev. W. T. Willis is attending the Summer sessions in the University of Chicago, engaged in particular study.

Bishop-Coadjutor R. E. L. Strider preached twice Sunday, June 29, at the Gambier Summer Conference. The conference this year was the largest ever held at Gambier.

St. Andrew's, Wheeling: St. Andrew's will be temporarily under the charge of the Rev. E. N. MacConormy, who becomes rector of Trinity Church, Moundsville, July 13. Somewhat extensive repairs are to be made on the church and rectory of St. Andrew's. They expressed in a fitting way their appreciation of the services of Archdeacon William Meade since the death of their rector, the Rev. James L. Fish.

Mission at Marlinton: Beginning Sunday, July 13, Bishop Strider will conduct a mission at St. John's, Marlinton. St. John's is under the charge of the Rev. G. J. Cleveland.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Bishop.

About one hundred and twenty-five books from the library of Bishop William White, the first Bishop of Pennsylvania, have come into the possession of the Philadelphia Divinity School through gifts of the descendants of the Bishop. The books are preserved in two antique mahogany book-cases, which were the property of the Bishop, who has in a number of ways left the imprint of his personality upon this city and community. Works by the Bishop in the collection include some of the original editions of his lectures on the Church Catechism. Other notable volumes include works by Provost William Smith and works by Jacob Duce, rector of Christ Church and St. Peter's Church, and a member of the first graduating class of the University of Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Leslie F. Potter, rector of St. Mark's Church, Frankford, was the preacher Sunday, July 13, at the Community Open-Air service in the Frankford Stadium. The committee in charge have secured microphones and amplifiers in order that the speakers may be heard in all parts of the Stadium. Ten churches of Frankford are cooperating in these union outdoor meetings.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Georgia's First Y. P. S. L. Camp.

In its initial camp for Young People's Service League members of the Diocese of Georgia, the Department of Religious Education which sponsored the venture, feels that it has scored a complete success. While the attendance was not as large as was expected, the impression made on those who attended, wholly justified the camp idea. The attendance included the Bishop, thirteen officers and councilors, and other adults, twenty-two young people, and five children, making a total of forty. The camp was located on St. Simon's Island, near Brunswick, at the far end, away from the summer colony, on the edge of a grove of shade trees, about two hundred feet from the ocean. The girls were quartered in a large cottage and the boys in tents; classes were held under the trees, and meals were served on the porch of the Arnold House. The officers and councilors, included the Rev. W. Aimison Jonnard, director and vice-chairman of the Department of Religious Education; chief councilor, Mrs. F. K. Ffolliott, of Johnson City, Tenn.; registrar, Miss Emma Twiggs, instructors, Mrs. Olaf Otto, the Rev. D. Watson Winn, the Rev. Robb White, Jr., the Rev. E. W. Halleck and Mr. Jonnard. Beginning on Wednesday morning and continuing through Saturday, the daily schedule was as follows: 7 A. M., morning ocean dip; 8:15, prayers; 8:30, breakfast; 9 to 9:30, intermission; 9:30 to 10:15, first class, Bible class, by the Rev. Mr. Winn, for boys and girls; second class, instructions on personal religion (ideals of manhood and womanhood), the Rev. Mr. Halleck for boys; Mrs. Otto for girls; 11:30 to 12, recess; 12, noon-day prayers; 12:05 to 1, third class, missionary course, "The other side of the world," by the Rev. Mr. White; 1 to 1:30, intermission; 1:30, dinner; 2:30 to 4, quiet hour; rest of afternoon recreation; 6, supper, followed by stunts, camp-fire and good-night service. The big feature of the camp was the Rev. Mr. White's class, and before the camp was over many of the boys and girls were asking questions about the duties of missionaries, and, as a result of these lectures, at least one member volunteered for service to the Department of Missions. The real inspiration of the day came at the good-night service on the beach, when the camp director led the prayers and inspirational talks. On Saturday night the whole service was given over to Preparation for the Corporate Communion the next day. Sunday morning the campers attended service at historic Christ Church, Frederica on the Island, and the Bishop preached a special sermon and was the celebrant at the Holy Communion service. Before the service a Bible class was held under the trees, after which the young people roamed around and saw the Wesley Oak," under which the Wesleys preached. After service they drove to the old fort at Frederica, built by General Oglethorpe, the founder of the colony for defense against the Spaniards. To the Rev. Mr. Jonnard is due the success and inspiration of the Camp. He was at all times the life of the camp, and the members felt that they are unusually lucky to have as their young people's leader, one who is so exceptionally gifted in this work and who makes an appeal to youth.

UPPER SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Bishop.

The Diocese of Upper South Carolina has just closed its Young People's Camp. This Camp was held from June 16 to July 1, at Bowman's Bluff, near Etowah, North Carolina. The site of "Camp Capers" is ideal, it is situated in the heart of the Blue Ridge Mountains, about ten miles from Hendersonville. The scenery is unsurpassed and the Camp equipment has been characterized as "de luxe." All about the Camp are the mountain peaks, and on the Camp grounds there is a beautiful lake, a ten-room house, with, more or less, modern conveniences, a mess hall and canvas tent quarters.

The Diocese conducted two separate Camps last year, one for the boys and one for the girls, but this year it was thought best to have a "co-ed" Camp, and some one hundred and sixty young people, of both sexes, with their leaders, councilors and faculty, have spent two delightful and beneficial weeks in communion together and in consideration of the "things concerning the Kingdom of God." The girls and women occupied the "Big House," which was called "Chum Cottage," and the boys and men occupied the tents. The Rev. Frank A. Juhan, the rector of Christ Church, Greenville, who is the director of the Young People of the Diocese, and the Associate Chairman of the Department of Religious Education, was the manager and inspiration of the Camp. His most able assistant, who was in charge of the girls' department, was the Diocesan Y. P. S. L. Field Director, Mrs. Frank N. Challen, also of Greenville. The Bishop of the Diocese, the Chairman of the Department of Religious Education, the Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, the Rev. Rufus Morgan, Miss Theodora Young, the Supervisor of the Diocesan Church School Service League and the Headquarters Secretary, Mrs. William P. Cornell, also assisted in making the Camp a success. Although these Diocesan officials made their contributions in various ways to the good work of the Camp, they were assisted by numbers of parish workers whose services were invaluable to the Diocese and to the young people.

Each morning was begun with a swim before breakfast. After breakfast came the "policing of Camp" then the morning service under the Assembly Tent, on the hill. This was followed by three study periods. Bishop Finlay led a course on the Bible, Mrs. Cornell on "The Mission of the Church to the World," and Mrs. Challen on the Young People's Service League. These classes were attended by the entire Camp and much good was derived from them. After the classes came another swimming period, then dinner. An hour of enforced rest after dinner was found to be a necessity, after which the athletic directors, Miss Laura Ebough and Mr. Dixon, of Greenville, arranged games, hikes, swimming contests, etc., to entertain and train the young people. Supper time came at 6:30 and about 8, in good weather, the Campers would gather on the Assembly Hill, and, by the light of wonderful Camp Fires—when the weather permitted—would present Service League Programs on one night and "Stunts" on the succeeding night.

During the entire Camp period, the young people were divided up into eight Teams; these, in turn, were formed into four Service Leagues, and certain duties and responsibilities devolved upon each group in turn. Points were kept by an official "scorer," and at the closing banquet, Camp Letters and other tokens of recognition were presented to those who had fulfilled the various requirements.

One of the most to be remembered features of the Camp life is the way in which the two Sundays were spent: Never will the impress of the those Early Celebrations, before the rustic altar, on the hill top, leave the minds of those who were privileged to attend them; nor will the morning services, at which the Revs. Morgan and Juhan brought such beautiful lessons before the assembled company, cease to influence the lives of those who listened.

"Camp Capers" has been a wonderful success and has made a profound impression on the life of the Diocese. We look forward to a repetition of our experiences next summer and we are thankful to Almighty God for the benefits which He has bestowed upon us.

Notes.

The first Teacher Training Camp of the Diocese is now in session at Camp Capers, in the North Carolina mountains, near Hendersonville. The Chairman of the Department of Religious Education, the Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, is in charge and several notable men and women compose the faculty. Although the Conference is small, it is doing good work and it is a beginning which we feel sure is a move in the right direction for the increased efficiency of the Church Schools of Upper South Carolina.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The Fifteenth Annual Council of Colored Churchmen of the Diocese of South Carolina, convened at St. Augustine's Church, Sumter County, S. C., the Rev. W. H. Brown, Jr., rector, June 26-29, with a large delegation in attendance.

The Executive Committee having met at ten A. M., the convention was formally opened at 11 A. M., with the celebration of the Holy Communion, celebrant and preacher being the Rt. Rev. William A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop of South Carolina, who also presided at all the sessions of the Council. A full program had been provided and was adopted, and many splendid papers and addresses were listened to, with evident satisfaction on the part of delegates and visitors. Especially was this true of the address of Prof. R. S. Wilkinson, of State College, Orangeburg, which threw much light upon the School situation in South Carolina.

The Rt. Rev. H. D. Delany, D. D., Bishop Suffragan of North Carolina, was detained at home by illness, so that his report of work done by him in the Diocese was not read.

Archdeacon Baskerville read his report, a report complete in every respect and highly commended by Bishop Guerry on account of its fulness and faithfulness as to details, and made some recommendations touching the several phases of the Church work and the Schools, all of which were adopted.

The Woman's Auxilliary Colored of the Diocese met with the Council. Its first meeting was on Thursday evening. Saturday morning was also given to the women. They had Corporate Communion at 10 A. M., and held a business session after that service. Their list of delegates was very large and they had an enjoyable and instructive session. Sunday afternoon at 3 P. M. they had their public meeting and presented a stirring program which was immensely enjoyed by the large number present.

The most interesting feature of the Council occurred on Sunday morning, when the beautiful consecration, and ordination to the priesthood services were held in the church, Bishop Guerry officiating as well as preaching the sermon. The Rev. W. C. Banks was advanced to the Priesthood. He was presented by the Ven. E. L. Baskervill. The following clergy joined with the Bishop in laying on of hands: The Ven. E. L. Baskervill, the Rev. George E. Howell, the Rev. J. J. Thomas, the Rev. William H. Brown, Jr., the Ven. J. B. Elliott, and the Rev. C. A. Harrison. The young priest will still have charge of the work at Walterboro.

The consecration of this church is the second to take place in a short space of time, and two more will be consecrated in the near future.

With the evening service of Sunday, the Council adjourned to meet at Faith Memorial, Waverly Mills, on Waccamaw Neck, next June, having been voted the "best Council" in the memory of its members.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D. Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. I. Reese, D. D. Coadjutor.

Gambier Summer Conference.

The Gambier Summer Conference met this year from June 23 to July 5, inclusive. Some misgiving was felt at first by the officers of the Conference that the attendance this year would not be as large as in previous ones, owing to the fact that it was preceded by the Centennial Celebration of Kenyon College.

However, all fears were put to flight on the first day of the conference, a larger number of people registering for the full period of the conference than ever before. The increase was mostly in the Young People's Division, the total enrollment in this section alone being nearly one hundred and seventy. The grand total of registrations for the whole conference was about four hundred and sixty.

An important development in the Young People's Division was the appointment of ten girls, college students, to work with Miss Elspeth Battle, of Colorado, as counsellors to the younger girls. It was felt by all concerned that the experiment was abundantly justified and will undoubtedly be a permanent feature of the conference life and organization. Each counsellor was assigned a group of eight or ten girls with whom she held regular conferences and over whom she exercised special oversight. Through these conferences and intimate personal contacts the spiritual values of the daily life were coordinated and conserved. The call to service was made a personal matter with each of the members of the respective groups and in presenting the call to others some of the counsellors found themselves.

The program of the Conference was prepared with the needs of all types of Church workers in mind. Special courses were arranged for clergy, with leaders like Professor Jared S. Moore, of Western Reserve University; the Rev. Franklin Spencer, of Kansas City; Judge Baggott, of Dayton; Dean Chalmers, of Dallas, Texas; the Rev. F. S. Fleming, of Chicago, and the Rev. B. H. Reinheimer. There were courses for Church School teachers, organized with the N. A. T. A., in mind, taught by such skillful persons as the Rev. Philip Porter, the Rev. Rudolf Schultz, the Rev. Charles C. Jatho, Miss Edith James, Mrs. Gordon Graham, Miss Florence Powell, of the Cleveland Normal School; Mrs. Lester S. Riley, of Pittsburgh. Miss Emily Tillotson, of New York, conducted a two-hour class for Woman's Auxilliary Leaders on the text book for the year, "China's Real Revolution. Girls' Friendly Courses were in the capable hands of Miss Florence Newbold. Social Service courses were given by Dr. Sunderland, of the New York City Mission, and Mr. Howard Knight, of Ohio Institute of Efficiency. Courses for Young People were given by the Rev. LeRoy L. Burroughs, of Ames, Iowa; the Rev. E. S. Haines, of Liberia, and Miss Mary Goff, of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland. Altar Guild work was in charge of Sister Ruth of the Order of the Transfiguration. Bishop Reese of Southern Ohio conducted a question box for young people.

Conference lectures open to all members of the conference were given by the Rt. Rev. Bertrand W. Stevens, of Los Angeles, and the Rt. Rev. Irving P. Johnson, of Colorado.

The Conference Bible Class—the one class at which attendance was compulsory—was in charge of the Rev. George R. Wood, of the General Theological Seminary. No higher compliment can be paid to Mr. Wood than to say that no other form of compulsion was necessary to secure attendance at the Bible Class than that of interest in his brilliant, positive and somewhat witty lectures on the "Christology of the Synoptic Gospels."

The class in Pageantry was under the capable direction of the Rev. Lester L. Riley, of St. Peter's Church, Pittsburgh, and the religious plays and pageants given under his direction on the closing night of the conference will long be remembered by all who were privileged to see them.

The Rev. R. S. Chalmers, Dean of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas, Texas, was Chaplain of the Conference and it was due entirely to him that many said, "The devotional tone of the Conference" was deeper than any of its predecessors.

Miss Elizabeth Fitch was an enthusiastic director of recreation and Mr. Henry Anderson of Conference Music.

At a meeting of the Joint Executive Committee of the Conference on July 3, the present officers were reelected for the following year:

The Rev. Maurice Clarke, Executive Chairman; the Rev. John Stalker, Dean of Faculty and Chairman of Program Committee; the Rev. Harold Hohly, Executive Secretary.

St. James' Church, Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., was the recipient of three beautiful and useful memorials which were blessed by the Bishop of Dallas, the Rt. Rev. Harry Tunis Moore, D. D., upon a recent visit to the parish.

A Lavabo, made by Geissler, presented by Anne Ida and Mary Constance Williams, in memory of Ann Williams and Ida O. Clarke Mills. A chalice and paten, made by Gorham, presented by Mrs. Charles Adna Smith in memory of Charles Adna Smith, M. D.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. H. L. Burleson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Wm. Blair Roberts, Suffragan.

The 1924 Niobrara Convocation.

Unique always and of never-failing interest, the annual gathering of the Dakota Indian people at the Niobrara Convocation is one of the most attractive features related to the Church's work in the Missionary District of South Dakota. This year the Convocation will open on the morning of Friday, August 22, at Pine Ridge Agency, and will close on the evening of Sunday, the twenty-fourth.

Pine Ridge, known as the Oglala country, is the westernmost of the Indian Reservations in South Dakota. The Dakotas, who live there, have been under the influence of religion and civilization for a shorter period than any of their brethren of the nine reservations of the state. So far as the primitive conditions of Dakota Indian life persist in this day they are to be found on the Pine Ridge. The home land of the Oglalas is a country of beautiful hills, pine trees and streams, lying immediately to the east of the famous Black Hills. The Convocation itself will be held at the Agency, which is a considerable settlement and where there are more conveniences than are usually found on the Reservations. It is a most attractive spot and an ideal location for the gathering.

An outstanding feature of the Convocation will be the consecration of the new church of the Holy Cross. When finished, this will be the finest church anywhere in the Indian country, built at a cost of $10,000. It is a memorial to Mrs. George Cabot Ward and a large portion of the cost is given by the Society of the Double Temple, which she founded. There is expectation that representatives of this society and other visitors connected historically with the work at Pine Ridge may be in attendance. Among the visitors will be Bishop Beecher of Western Nebraska, and some of his people who are neighbors to the Pine Ridge Indians just over the state line. In fact, many of our Indian people cross into Nebraska each year to help in the harvest.

There will be, of course, the usual services—Confirmations, Ordinations and Inductions of Catechists, with the usual wonderfully interesting meetings of the men and women separately and in union.

The Rev. Nevill Joyner, who has been superintending presbyter for the last thirteen years, residing at Pine Ridge Agency, will be host to the Convocation, assisted by committees from the clergy and laity of the Mission. The Indian people extend a most cordial welcome to their white brethren to visit their Convocation and will do all in their power to make it a wonderful and pleasant experience. It is, however, important that all who plan to attend should promptly notify the Rev. Mr. Joyner in order that proper provision can be made for their entertainment.

The Maister and the Bairns.

The Maister sat in a wee cot house
Tae the Jordan's watters near,
An' the fisherfolk crush'd an' croodet roon
The maister's words tae hear.

An' even the bairns frae near-han streets
Kept mixin' in wi' the thrang,

"Lat the wee bairns coom tae Me."
An' He gaithert them roon Him whaur He sat,

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

The Preparation for the Passover.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

Nothing is so beautiful as irrigated land in spring. The sun shines brighter, the leaves are greener; there are more birds, the shade is denser than on ordinary land. The population, too is denser. Five acres in trees or grapes will support a family, and give occupation without overwork. The national emblem of Judea was a fig-tree planted in a watered vineyard. Jordan valley, the ravines, and as much of the hillside as could be terraced, were irrigated, the population was enormous and the land-owners were at leisure.

Irrigated land has a house every hundred yards, a village every mile. Landowners live in the houses, tradesmen and artisans in the villages. At short intervals are cities. It takes a very small irrigated area to support a city, and to need one as a purchasing-point. The rural population, however, outnumbers the urban, for the whole irrigated district is practically one suburban town. Irrigated districts can turn out a crowd of well-to-do and educated suburbanites so enormous, so amazingly out of proportion to the number of square miles, that the feeling of the man from non-irrigated country is incredulous stupefaction. Palestine, on the map, is a microscopic land, and half of that is hill-country, fit only for grazing. Yet the population of Palestine which crowded to the Passovers at Jerusalem can be justly compared in numbers to the crowds of Hindus at the festival of Juggernaut at Benares, and intellect to modern Americans. Every village had its school master and half the population could read and write. Nobody unfamiliar with irrigated land will believe the unanimous testimony of ancient writers as to the Passover crowds. Moderns take Josephus and other authorities, note their estimates, divide by ten and take half the quotient, and then cannot see how so small a country could furnish or support so vast a multitude. How many people could a country two hundred miles long and one hundred wide, with a house every hundred yards, support; the waste and mountain spaces compensated for by the extra density of population in the cities, and the extra density in the villages being clear gain? The population tributary to Jerusalem was between twelve and twenty million. It was the duty of every male over twelve years old to attend Passover; innumerable women came also, and it might easily happen, in a favorable year, that three million visitors entered the city. Of course, the city could not accommodate them, and did not try. When all the vacant rooms, and all the suburban villages for six miles round were filled, the rest lived in tents outside the walls.

Jerusalem lived on tourist-traffic. A large Passover was to them what a good crop is to a farmer. A small Passover meant hardship. Nothing, absolutely nothing, must be allowed which would diminish the crowd. As the motive for the pilgrimage was religious, anything which lessened the influence of the religious authorities was obnoxious. Our Lord had publicly proved the Chief Priests and Elders, nay, the very High Priest himself, indubitably mistaken in their knowledge of the Bible concerning the Messiah, and had said they had no real religion anyhow. In this He had carried the crowd with Him. Therefore He must die.

The "Jews"—permanent inhabitants of Jerusalem—felt for the Passover crowd contempt mixed with fear. To a city man farmers, rustics, clodhoppers, always seem contemptible. Yet they had money, and, as it was impossible to identify the leaders of disturbances, they were exceedingly turbulent. In a proportion unheard of among us, the crowd was full of boys. It was the duty of every man to bring his son as soon as the boy was twelve years old. The boys started disturbances and the men followed them up. Rioters, when threatened, plunged into the crowd. It opened to them and closed to their pursuers, and in ten steps they were safe.

This enormous multitude needed lambs and a place to cook and eat them. A flourishing business was built up on this. Two hundred thousand inspected lambs, says Josephus, were needed. First you organize your Passover group, about fifteen persons to one lamb. Then you arranged for the cooking. Virtually every vacant room in Jerusalem was used for visitors to sleep in, but pallets could be piled in a corner and the same room used for the feast. Every one could get the use of a room in a house did so. Having arranged for the cooking, you bought a lamb. If bought in the market you must have it inspected in the Temple. If bought in the Temple you paid a heavy premium, because it was inspected already, and certified to be without blemish. This lamb you took into the Temple court after the evening sacrifice at two-thirty on Thursday. There you went, very rapidly, through a certain ritual. The lamb must be killed by the owner. The whole twenty-four courses of priests were on duty that day and stood in line. The priest in front of you caught the lamb's blood in a golden bowl and passed it rapidly up the line to the altar, where it was poured. With equal rapidity you butchered your lamb, marched by the altar, handed up the parts to be burned and went away, carrying the lamb on a stretcher made of two sticks. It took ten minutes or less, and several thousand such butcherings went on at once; yet the whole afternoon was needed, so many were the lambs.

I AM THE CHURCH.

The Rev. Thos. F. Opie.

I am the Church. I represent God at work in the world. I create character; I make manhood and womanhood; I bless and sanctify childhood. I am the divine manufactory. I am the Church of God.

Without me ideals would fade out of minds and aspirations would die out of hearts. Without me real-estate would depreciate and communities would become unsafe for women and children. I am an asset to any community. I am indispensable to the welfare of the human race.

I am the Church. I am "an angel by the highway, leading men to the well of life." I call men from self to altruism and to holiness. To me little children come to learn of the Saviour; women come to me to find inspiration to purity and men come to me to find incentive to Christian service and civic righteousness.

Around me cling sweet memories of infants and of brides and of mothers. An innumerable host of little ones have been redeemed and blessed through me. Tears of sorrow and tears of joy have been shed within my walls. Hearts have been transfused with courage and souls lifted up to high heaven in my courts. Eloquence and oratory have resounded through my precincts for centuries.

I lift up the fallen, I strengthen the weak, I help the distressed, I show mercy, bestow kindness and offer a friendly hand to the man in fine linen and to the man in homespun. I am the world's great democracy. In me kings and peasants meet as brothers and all men are equal. I am the Church of Christ, the Best Friend of Humanity.

I am not the priest. I am not the creeds. I am not the vestry, the consistory, the board of deacons, the elders—I am the people! You are the Church! I am not a building—I am the Body of the Christ, I am His hands, His eyes, His organ of speech, of hearing and of touch. I am His instrument to work out the world's problems; His hands, to uplift mankind; His medium of redemption and transformation.

In me men find the sweetest fellowship, the highest friendliness, the purest and most disinterested love and devotion. I meet all men with outstretched arms and with songs of glad joy. I welcome the prodigal and I extend pardon to the wayward and the soiled. I am the Church of the redeemed.

From my sacred confines radiate all the motivating impulses to do good, to love mercy and to walk humbly. Humanitarian enterprise and benevolent charity are engendered within my walls and springs of living water flow from my courts, to the healing and refreshing of the streams of a complex and varied life.

In me art and architecture, music and eloquent oratory, history and philosophy, literature and poetry find their highest and best and idealst conception, perfection and consummation. My towering spires point men upward to God and my painted windows reflect the sweet lights of heaven itself.

I bring back restored courage to the despairing, honor and peace to the fallen, joy and elation to the disheartened, pardon and tranquility to the stricken and new hope to the hopeless. I cry aloud to the mean man and the vicious man and the selfish man, that he forsake the error of his ways and come up higher. I warn, I exhort, I counsel, I inspire, I enhearten—If men will, but heed me as they pass by my hallowed walls.

But to be and to teach and to perform and accomplish my high destiny and my great task for God and humanity, I must have the willing hands, the ready wills, the loving hearts, the divine personalities of little children, of busy men and of noble women—else even I, the Church must be futile, vain and ineffectual. I am the Church; through me God calls to all mankind to come into the vineyard.

FRIENDSHIP.

L. C. Cummings.

Too often we find to our sorrow that the so-called friendships of life are but fragile possessions and break and disappear upon the slightest strain. Even the closest family ties of years standing are not immune and the gross dollar, is at times a more impelling argument than blood and kindred.

In sorrow and trouble shallow friendships fail and fall, like dead leaves from the trees at the first blast of winter; the slightest differences of opinion, become wedges to split the oak of friendship.

Friendship requires loyal, sturdy qualities of heart and mind; friendship requires deeds and sacrifice. To true friendship every burden is light, and it remains constant in all events, but dread more the false friend than the open enemy; friendship begun for an end will not continue to the end.

The pure gold of friendship is refined in adversity and tried in the fire of sorrow, and differences, in which its fragility is changed to the temper of steel, and cannot be bent or broken under any strain.

True friendship is the gift of heaven, it is worth the cost of many failures to find but one true unchangeable heart.

Common Things.

Give me, dear Lord, Thy magic common things,

Which all can see, which all may share—

Sunlight and dewdrops, grass and stars and sea—

Nothing unique of mine, and nothing rare.

Just daisies, knapweed, wind among the thorns;

Some clouds to cross the blue of sky above;

Rain, winter fires, a useful hand, a heart, The common glory of a woman's love.

Then, when my feet no longer tread old paths,

(Keep them from fouling sweet things anywhere),

Write one old epitaph in grace-lit words: "Such things look fairer that he so journeyed here."

THE PARABLES OF SAFED THE SAGE.

The Parable of Keturah and The Flowers.

"I am a Spasmodic and Unsuccessful Gardener. But I raise Hollyhocks. And when they be once planted they continue. For the old plants die the Second Winter, but the young ones bear in the Second Summer. And I like to remember how the Crusaders when they went to the Holy Land brought back this Glorious Blossoming Scepter to the Gardens of Europe and to my garden and that of Keturah.

But Keturah is more industrious than I. She planteth Flowers of divers kinds.

And it came to pass that she set out Flowers, and Rude Boys came by in the night and pulled them up.

And Keturah suspected who they were.

Now it came to pass on a day that Keturah saw that Tough Bunch coming. And she took a Basket of Apples that she had ready, and she went out into the Porch. And she saluted them as they were passing by, and they answered her gruffly, and edged away, for they feared that she would Bawl them Out or threaten them with the Police.

And Keturah said unto them, What tall, manly fellows ye are. How strong ye are, and how brave.

And by that time she had them Guessing.

And she said, I need help from you, and I am sure that you will give it. I plant flowers, and boys pull them up. They are not bad boys, but thoughtless. I desire that you help me to protect my flowers.

And they said nothing.

And she said, I have boys, and they also are strong and tall. And they have grown up and gone forth into the world. I am as old as the mothers of you boys, and it is hard work to set out Flowers and have them plucked up. And I know that if you boys, who are so strong and brave, will protect my Flowers, and speak to the other boys about them, then my Flowers will Grow and Blossom.

And when she had said this, she produced her apples.

Now Keturah's mother, a long distance back, learned what can be done with an Apple, and Keturah knoweth that little trick quite as well as Eve ever knew it.

And if thou shalt pass the Garden of Keturah, thou shalt find her Flowers unmolested. For they are guarded by the best policemen in town, even by the boys.

Now thus it hath been ever since the wind and the Sun had their quarrel as to which could compel a man to take off his Coat; and the stronger the Wind blew, the more he tightened it, but the warmth of the Sun quickly accomplished what the harsh treatment could not do.

There be those whose word of progress is, Treat them Rough; but Keturah can show unto you a More Excellent Way.—Exchange.

Some "Whys" Asked by Jesus.

When He begins His ministry, mark how His words are punctuated with this word, "Why?" Almost half of the discourses of Jesus, as they have come down to us, are challenges of the orthodoxies of His own day.

"Why are ye so anxious about the morrow as that ye cannot enjoy today?"

"Why do ye see so clearly the little sins of your brethren, but perceive not the great sins which are your own?"

"Why do ye make the Sabbath a day of gloom, instead of a day of rejoicing?"

"Why do ye call upon men to fast when the bridegroom and the bridal hour are nigh?"

"Why callest thou me good?" using an absolute term in a merely complimentary way.

"Why do ye not of yourselves judge what is right! Know ye not that all the sacred scrolls that lie in the synagogue are not so sacred as the word that is written on your own heart?"

"Why do ye make the market-place a place of parade for the sanctities of the soul?"

"Why do you think it pious to dress in sombre robes and wear your hair long?"

"Why do you not read Moses, for Moses spoke of me?"

"Why do you dare to supplant the word of Moses by your own traditions?"

"Why should Moses himself impose a burden upon men when God meant them to be free?"

"Why do you go about to kill me when I only tell you the truth?"

One day, in the terrible darkness, in the most awful hour of His life, you hear His voice ring out again, breaking its way out of the blackness—"My God! My God! Why hast thou forsaken me?"

This is the skepticism of Jesus, the most reflective, carefully considering, challenging, daring soul the world has seen.—Exchange.

It is a selfish thing to want comfort only. Christ has something more than that to offer. He offers you a share in His work. He offers you cooperation with Himself, the life of a member of His body which is to carry out His work and witness in the world, which is to be detached from material interests, which is to seek first the Kingdom of God.—Charles Gore.

Grandfather's Clock.

My grandfather's clock
In the days of my youth
Had an unpleasant habit
Of speaking the truth.

"Tick, tock!" said grandfather's clock;
"Jane has a tear in her very best frock!
Tick, tock! Tick, tock!
Jane is the naughtiest girl in the block;
Tick, tock, Tick, tock!"

No chance for escape
From so watchful an eye;
From its living-room place
It was easy to spy.

"Tick, tock!" said grandfather's clock;
"Jane has her hand in the gingerbread clock!
Tick, tock! Tick, tock!
Jane made a face at her grandfather's clock;
Tick, tock! Tick, tock!"

The Bees and the Pigeons.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Once two farmers lived side by side. One kept bees, and the other kept carrier pigeons.

When bees have collected honey enough, they fly in a straight line toward home. For this reason, people call a straight line a bee line. Carrier pigeons, too, know how to fly straight home, even when taken to a great distance. They are often employed to carry letters, because they are so quick and sure. That is why they are called carrier pigeons.

The farmers agreed one day to try which could make the best time, the bees or the pigeons. They took a dozen bees and a dozen pigeons, to a distance of three miles from home, the owner of the bees having first rolled his little racers in flour, so he would be sure to know them. Both bees and pigeons were set free together to give them a fair start. The first bee reached his home hive a quarter of a minute before the first pigeon reached the box. Then three other bees reached home before the second pigeon. A little later the rest of the pigeons and the rest of the bees all arrived together.

How Tom and Tot Surprised Themselves.

Tom and Tot felt almost as big as grown-ups, for they were to see to things at the house and barn all day, and maybe until after dark. The rest of the folks were going to drive to grandfather's, fifteen miles away, to spend the day.

There was enough hay down from the mow to give all the cows and horses their supper, and Spot was only milked in the morning now. So everything was fixed for chores, and Tom and Tot would have little to do except get their dinner and supper.

This was easily done, for the pantry was full of good things already cooked. After dinner Tom said: "Let's go out to the barn and see if things are all right."

As they opened the little door cut from the big barn door, and stepped inside, Tom stopped short, so short that Tot was frightened for fear one of the horses was loose. Then she looked in and saw what she thought was the head of a little gray kitten.

"Oh, I want it for my very own little cat," she exclaimed, starting to pick it up.

Tom jerked her back quickly. "It's not a cat," he declared. "It has feathers."

It was not a chicken, or a duck, or a turkey, or anything they had ever seen before.

"It's 'most frozen," declared Tot. "Let's take it to the house and get it warm."

Tom shook his head doubtfully. "I believe it is an owl," he said. "It looks some like the picture in my reading book."

"We mustn't let it suffer, even if it is an owl," said Tot. "We must take it in and get it warm."

Tom put on a pair of thick leather mittens lying near and touched it cautiously. He was afraid it might scratch or bite, but it was too nearly frozen to do either. Then he picked it up and carried it to the house.

It soon felt much better in the warm room and blinked at the children in a most comical way.

When it came time for the night feeding, the question was what to do with the owl. "We can't leave it here," said Tom; "it might get into the fireplace and get burnt."

"Let's put it in the spare room," said Tot. "We can shut the door tight, and it cannot get out."

"The very thing," declared Tom, and they shut it in the big room over the parlor.

After the stock was fed they thought about feeding the owl. But what should they feed it? Both decided that bread and milk would not hurt it, anyway.

"It looks so like a kitten," said Tot, "that I think it must like cat food out of a cat's dish."

This was given, but the owl looked at it with doubt, and then he crossed the room in front of the grate.

"How glad we are there is no fire in it!" said Tot.

Tom nodded. Suddenly he said, as they slipped out of the room and shut the door, "Let's surprise papa and mamma. We'll go down into the parlor and jump out at them when they open the front door."

"Let's," said Tot; "it must be time for them; it's getting dark."

They scampered downstairs and into the big room below. It was cold and dark, and Tot wanted a light.

"That would spoil all the surprise," objected Tom.

"What's that noise?" asked Tot, as a queer sound came from the side of the room containing the grate.

"Maybe it's a brick blown from the chimney," replied Tom doubtfully. "You know one did blow down the other night."

"But I hear something flutter," said Tot.

"It's just your heart," insisted Tom. "Hush! I guess they're coming."

The sleigh stopped in front of the door. "When I nudge you, jump and say 'Boo!'" said Tom.

The door opened. But before he could nudge there was a terrible trembling scream from the fireplace.

Tom and Tot both screamed and jumped out into the hall just as something went sweeping over their heads.

"What's the fuss?" asked papa, who had just opened the front door.

"Something awful's after us," cried Tot.

A light was lit in the sitting room, and in one corner sat the little screech-owl, as badly frightened as any one.

"We had it shut in the spare room!" exclaimed both children. "How did it ever get into the parlor?"

For a moment papa was puzzled. Then he laughed and said, "It must have fallen down the chimney from the fireplace in the spare room."

"That was the noise we heard," exclaimed Tot. "But may I have it for a pet?"

"If you will keep it in the granary at night," laughed papa. "It will be a better mouse-trap than the one I was intending to buy."—Bessie L. Putnam, in the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

The Torch of Life.

Alfred P. Thom, III, Age 12.

The "Torch of Life" we hold on high,
Flaming upward to the sky.
The light we hold must never fail
Until we hear the Master's call.

And onward still Life runs its race
Redeemed by Him Whose radiant face
Shone on men of every birth;
'Twas He kept Life on this earth.

Onward still Life wends its way
And on each and every day
A new child comes to take the place
Of him who's fallen in the race.

And onward evermore does bear
The torch that flames like flowing hair,
While he who's fallen takes the place
Of one more cog in that great space.

Promising Polly.

As Polly Patterson went hurrying across the pebble walk that led to her cozy home she said, "Of course, I'll do that for you." At the front doorstep she saw her small brother, who was puzzling his little brain over a problem in first arithmetic.

"Can't you help me over this problem?" he asked, earnestly.

"I can't do it right now," Polly answered, "but I'll help you after dinner is over," and Polly was gone.

No sooner had she entered the sitting room than she faced Billy, an older brother.

"I say, Polly," he began, boyishly, "couldn't you show me how to press my trousers. They surely need it very much."

"Of course I can," Polly answered, "but I'd rather do it than to bother about showing you; I'll press them for you tomorrow, so you'll have them for the community social."

After dinner was over Polly slipped out the side door for a little visit with her best friend and next-door neighbor, and when she came back her small brother had gone to bed.

Next morning she didn't get up in time for breakfast; both boys were gone when she went down.

On the street Polly met Lula Landers. "Oh, Polly!" she exclaimed, "I'm so glad to see you—you know, I was scared stiff you'd forget this is our day to arrange the class program for our next entertainment at the church."

"So it is," Polly answered; "but I can't do it today. We'll do that tomorrow; I'll call you all when I have time; it's several days off yet, and we'll have plenty of time."

But in spite of her shortcoming, Polly was a popular girl, and when she reached home she found an invitation waiting for her to visit one of her girl friends who lived in a nearby town.

For ten days she had a most delightful time, and when she returned home her mind was filled with all sorts of plans for interesting stunts.

But scarcely had she gotten in when she met her younger brother.

"Well, Buddy," she laughed, "how did the 'exam' go?"

"I failed to pass, sis," he answered, "and you know I failed on that example you promised to help me with."

Polly didn't wait for more, but went hurrying away. In the dining room she met Billy.

"Hello, brother!" she greeted sweetly. "How did the community social come off?"

"I—I don't know," Billy answered. "You see, I got in late from work and went to dress and found you had forgotten to press my trousers, so I had to stay at home; though, they said they had a great time."

Just then the telephone rang, and Polly ran to answer it. It was Lula Landers speaking, and immediately Polly inquired how the church entertainment went off.

"Oh, Polly! It was wonderful—all except our class. You know, you promised to call me when you had time, and we depended on you to help us plan something, and waited too late to do anything worth while; so we didn't report at all—but are planning to give a concert."

"I'll help," Polly answered, promptly.

"Listen at Promising Polly," her little brother exclaimed to Billy. "She'll promise anything, and never mean a word of it."

Polly didn't say anything, but she hung up the receiver and went hurrying upstairs to think, and, in thinking, she remembered all the unhappiness she had caused by her quick promises, and before she went to sleep that night she solemnly resolved that henceforth her reputation would be changed from "Promising Polly" to "Dependable Polly."—Alice M. Barr, in Junior Joys.

"All Foxie's Doing."

Foxie was a big, beautiful Newfoundland dog, and Fred was a small, yellow-haired, merry-faced boy.

Fred thought Foxie the best dog in the world, and Foxie was sure that Fred was the finest boy, so being of the same mind, they were the best of friends and had very good times together.

They lived on a farm, close to the bank of a deep, swift river; and, although Fred loved to play near the water, mother never felt uneasy about him when Foxie was with him, knowing that the big dog would take as good care of her boy as she could do herself.

Foxie was such a handsome dog that every one noticed and admired him, and Dr. Allen, who loved dogs, was very anxious to buy him.

"What will you take for Foxie, Fred?" he asked one day.

"Nothing, sir," Fred answered, promptly. "Foxie's not for sale!"

"What! You wouldn't take fifty dollars for him? I'll give you that in a minute. Think of it, Fred. Fifty dollars, all for yourself!"

"No, sir! Not fifty hundred dollars! It wouldn't be the same as Foxie himself," declared Fred.

The doctor laughed. "So I haven't money enough to buy him, it seems. Well, Fred, if you ever change your mind, let me know, and remember that fifty dollars is yours any time you want to trade Foxie for it."

Fred promised, being very sure that he would never change his mind. But a month later he did.

It began with father having the grip, and being very ill. After he grew a little better, he was still so weak and thin that the doctor looked anxious. He told mother one morning that the patient must have the most nourishing fare, and be kept very cheerful and as hopeful as possible. "Don't let him see that you are anxious or depressed. Keep bright when you are with him, for all depends on keeping up his spirits and strength," he said. "We must feed him up!"

That was easy enough to say. Mother promised to do her best, and she went back into the room to tell father that he was getting on beautifully, and must just take his jelly and not worry about business; and then when she had cheered her invalid with her bright face and merry laugh, she went out in the yard where Fred and Foxie were playing, and let the pent-up tears have their way for a little.

Fred was dreadfully frightened. He had never seen mother cry before, and his world seemed tumbling about his ears. He threw himself into her lap and hugged her, and cried, too, until she was afraid father would hear him, and she dried her own tears quickly.

"Don't cry, dear. We mustn't let father know we are troubled. Dr. Allan says he must have all sorts of nourishing food, and, of course, he must; but it costs so much! And there will be the doctor's bill besides. It will be fifty dollars, at least—and where in the world is the money to come from?"

She cried a little again. Just then father called feebly from the house, and she jumped up and ran in, smiling.

Fred stood where she had left him, looking very thoughtful. Fifty dollars, mother had said. It was a lot of money; and she was so troubled about it. He wondered how he could help her.

Foxie came close up to him and looked in his face with his loving eyes filled with almost human sympathy and intelligence. He understood that something was wrong, and he would help if he could. That was what his gaze seemed to say.

Suddenly Fred remembered something. Foxie could help. Dr. Allan had offered fifty dollars for him—and fifty dollars would pay his bill. In a minute his mind was made up. He threw both arms around Foxie's neck, and smothered his sobs on the dog's soft head.

After a while he looked up. "It's for father—for father!" he whispered. "Foxie, you'll understand why I did it. You won't think I don't love you?"

"Woof!" said Foxie, to show he understood.

A car drove up, and Fred ran to the gate. It was Dr. Allan, and with him was his little daughter, Maisie, a lovely, dimpled bunch of sweetness, three years old.

"She's going with me on my rounds today, because her mother is sick," explained the doctor. "She can play out here with you and Foxie while I go in and see your father."

He went into the house, and Fred and Maisie and Foxie played very happily together for a little. But after a while Maisie grew restless, and before Fred knew what she was going to do she ran out of the gate and down the path to the river bank.

"Come back, Maisie!" Fred called, but she ran on, laughing.

There was nothing to do but follow, and the small boy and the big dog ran after the little figure that fluttered ahead of them like a pink butterfly.

Straight toward the river Maisie ran. The bank was high in that place. Fred saw her reach the edge—then, suddenly she was gone!

Fred opened his mouth to scream, and in the same breath remembered that father must not be startled. What was he to do? He turned to Foxie, running beside him, "Fetch her, Foxie! Save her!" he cried breathlessly.

Foxie had not waited for the order. Like an arrow from a bow he darted straight for the spot where the pink figure had vanished. Then he disappeared, too. Fred, running with all his might, reached the bank in time to see Foxie, with something pink in his mouth, swimming gallantly against the heavy current, scrambling up the bank, laying down his dripping little burden at his master's feet.

And just at that minute the doctor came running from the house, followed by mother.

It seemed to Fred that all kinds of things happened in the next few minutes. The doctor hugged Maisie, and then hugged Foxie, and Foxie shook himself so that a shower of water flew all over everybody, and altogether it was a very damp time. The first thing was to discover whether Maisie was injured. She was all right, only very wet and frightened; and when the doctor had satisfied himself of that, he let mother take her in the house to dress her in some of Fred's outgrown frocks, left over from the long-ago days when he wore such things. The doctor and Fred waited out in the car; and suddenly Fred remembered what he had meant to say to the doctor.

He began to talk very fast for fear he should break down before he could get it said. "Doctor, you said you'd give fifty dollars for Foxie—and I wouldn't take it—but I've changed my mind. Mother said your bill for making father well would be fifty dollars, and—and—I thought maybe you'd take Foxie instead, to pay it. He—he'd take care of Maisie for you." Fred stopped and waited.

"Bill!" almost shouted the doctor. "What are you talking about? Do you think fifty dollars would begin to pay my debt to Foxie, after what he has just done for me? No, son, you tell your mother there won't be any bill—she needn't look for it. Foxie has paid it a thousand times over! I'm going to send a hamper of strengthening things for your father and she's not to say a word. What would have happened just now, but for Foxie! It can't be paid back. I just want to show—" Here the doctor stopped and choked.

Fred opened his eyes wide when the great hamper came with such quantities of "nourishing things" for father. He wondered a good deal why mother laughed and cried and hugged him when she had unpacked it. He thought she ought to have hugged Foxie, for it was all Foxie's doing!—Boys' Weekly.

The Happiness Flower.

Did you ever feel the Happiness Flower?
It isn't so hard to find;
It opens wide at the morning hour
In the meadows of cheerful mind.

But it sometimes grows in the sandy dust
That fills the desert of care,
And down in the fields of perfect trust;
You always can find it there.

It's sweet as honey, the Happiness Flower,—

Winter, and summer the same;
On the difficult hills by Troublous Tower
It shines like a rosy flame.

If you ever find the Happiness Flower,—
And it isn't so hard to do,—
May it flourish fair in your golden ground,
A-glisten with joy's bright dew!

The Bluebird's House.

"I wish some one would write to me," longingly said Robert as the postman left the house after leaving the family mail.

"Say, Bobs," said his father, looking up from a letter, "why don't you and John Henry put a box of your own in the corner of the hedge and write to each other? You will find it a lot of fun."

Robert thought it was a fine idea, and so did John Henry. It was not very long before they had a nice new box hidden on a good prop at the extreme back corner of the hedge.

"It looks like a secret postoffice," said Robert. "That is what I like about it. We must never let any one see our letters."

"We never will," agreed John Henry. "It may be that after a while we can make a language of our own."

The fall days passed and winter ones came, but still Robert and John Henry exchanged letters in the secret post-office. They spent many moments hunting up words to see if they were properly spelled, and often tried to see which could send the neatest letter.

One day Robert mailed a few pretty marbles by parcel post to John Henry, and it was not long before he received a nice red top, almost new, in return. They agreed that the postoffice was one of their greatest pleasures.

As the spring came in, however, they found other delights, and the postoffice was for a while forgotten. One day John Henry came running over to Robert's house in a state of great excitement.

"Did you know something was living in the postoffice?" he asked. "I went down there to mail you a letter, and found a bluebird inside."

"Is that so?" was Robert's eager answer. "Let's go see if he is there now."

Some brown twigs were still hanging from the hole left for the boy's hands, but the bluebird was up in a tree nearby.

"There he is," whispered Robert. "We will give him the house. Aren't you glad he came?"

"Yes, indeed," replied John Henry, "and of course we are glad because wherever the bluebird lives he brings happiness."—The Child's Gem.

The really good things, the big things, are inside and not outside the man. The big thing is not luxury, but contentment; not a big house, but a big satisfaction; not accumulated art treasures, but a fine, artistic appreciation; not a big library, but a serene studiousness; not a big estate, but a large vision. The big things are not "the things that are seen, but the things that are not seen." "Seek peace and ensue it." "Seek the things that are above." "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness." Such are the goodly pearls.—J. H. Jowett.

RESOLUTIONS.

William S. Rodas.

At a meeting of the vestry of Greenwood Parish, Greenwood, Va., held on the 9th of June, 1924, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, it has been the will of God to call to his eternal reward our fellow-vestryman, WILLIAM S. RODES, who departed this life May 21, 1924, and

Whereas, we desire to record our sense of deep loss and our appreciation of his place in our affection and esteem; be it Resolved, that we, the rector and vestrymen of Greenwood Parish, Albemarle County, Va., do hereby express our high regard and admiration for our fellow-member of this vestry. In him we had always a co-worker and counselor of integrity and Christian conviction.

Quiet and conservative in manner and judgment, he yet combined with these a quality of directness and decisiveness that none could fail to value.

Be it further resolved, that these resolutions be entered on the minutes of the vestry, that a copy be sent to his wife and to the "Southern Churchman" for publication.

IN MEMORIAM.

Mrs. William Henry Fitzhugh Lee.

There passed into the life of the eternal world on the night of Monday, the 5th of May, 1924, at Richmond, in her native Virginia, MARY TABB BOLLING LEE, relict of General William Henry Fitzhugh Lee, who was the second son of General Robert Edward Lee, the great and stainless leader of the Southern Confederacy in the War Between the States. Mrs. Lee was the daughter of Mr. George Washington Bolling, a prominent citizen of Petersburg, Va., and a descendant of one of the ancient families of the Old Dominion, going back to the earliest days of the colony. As we are told by Captain Robert E. Lee, General Lee's youngest son, "Mr. Bolling had been very kind to his father during the eventful months of the siege of Petersburg and his handsome daughter, who afterwards became Mrs. W. H. F. Lee, often went to see the general and was a great favorite of his."

From her earliest years Mrs. Lee grew up amidst all the high ideals and noble traditions of true Virginia womanhood, surrounded by everything that a home of culture and refinement, possessing hereditary wealth, could give. As a young girl, budding into a beautiful and resplendent womanhood, she experienced the tragedy and vicissitudes of war in the siege of her own home. But she lived in the presence of heroes; and as we have just related, knew and was admired by the noblest of them all, therefore her own soul could not fail in catching the glow of the same exalted spirit of heroism. So as the years passed onward, and a new era began to make itself felt, Miss Bolling became one of the most typical representatives of that glorious heritage she had received in common with so many other Virginia and Southern women from their beautiful and inspiring past, which is now fading into the light of common day, and becoming known only to tradition or living in the pages of poetry and romance. And to quote a sentence from a tribute to her in a late issue of a Richmond paper, we find as a fitting close this fine description of her outward personality: "Years never bowed her, to the end her head was high, and in her eyes was the light of the great days of her youth."

In the early fall of 1867 Miss Mary Tabb Bolling became engaged to General William H. F. Lee. When his father heard of this happy event he wrote to him, expressing his congratulations, and said further, "I have the most pleasing recollections of 'Miss Tabb' and of her kindness to me, and now that she has consented to be my daughter, the measure of my gratitude is filled to overflowing. . . . You must present her my warm love, and you both must accept my earnest prayers and most earnest wishes for your future happiness and prosperity."

They were married in St. Paul's Church, Petersburg, on the night of the 28th of November, 1867, two years and seven months after the end of the war. The wedding was of course a most notable event, not only because it was that of a son of General Robert E. Lee, who, too, had borne his part on the field of battle, but also because of the handsome bride whose beauty and attractive personality had won for her the name of being amongst the number of the most popular young ladies of her day. General Lee at first felt that it would be impossible for him to attend the wedding, but finally consented to do so through the earnest entreaties of his son and "new daughter." He was delighted with the visit. It had been a success in every way. Wherever he was seen he was treated with the greatest love, admiration and respect.

His son, General William H. F. Lee, had settled down after the war to "the honorable life of a farmer" on his estate of the "White House," inherited from the Custis family, and situated on the Pamunkey River between Richmond and West Point. Thither he brought his bride, and there they lived in happiness and contentment for some years. Of course making visits to Richmond and Petersburg, not so far distant, as opportunity offered, and also to Lexington, in the mountains already famous as the home of his illustrious father. After the death of his aunt in 1874, Mrs. Fitzhugh, of "Ravensworth," Fairfax County, Va., about nine miles from the historic city of Alexandria, General Lee received his part of that large estate, including the residence, and in due time took possession of it. In that charming home General and Mrs. Lee entertained their relatives and friends, and noted visitors for many years, dispensing a gracious and beautiful hospitality in the spirit and manner of the old days of Virginia.

After the general's election to Congress they usually spent their winters in Washington, but always rejoiced to return in the early spring to "Ravensworth" with its large and splendid flower garden, and magnificent trees and spreading lawn, to which they and their sons were strongly attached. While at Ravensworth General and Mrs. Lee always attended Zion Church, Fairfax, where the general was a vestryman and communicant, and which was for a great part of that time under the ministry of the Rev. Frank Page. While in Washington their place of worship was the Church of the Epiphany, of which their beloved friend, the Rev. Randolph H. McKim, D. D., was rector.

But upon this ideal home a dark shadow at last fell. It was noted with much anxiety by his family and friends that the general's health was gradually failing. After much suffering he passed away to the rest of the people of God from "Ravensworth" on a lovely October day in the year 1892, leaving his devoted wife and their dear sons in deep sorrow over the unutterable loss they had sustained. She withdrew from society, and remained in close retirement at "Ravensworth" for a long time. At length, under the calming influence of the passing months, she realized that the truest loyalty to the memory of her beloved husband would now be to take her place at the head of the home for her own sake and the sake of her sons, consecrated as it was by the happy memories of those happy days when he was by her side. The old life was resumed as far as it could be, and "Ravensworth" again opened its doors to dear friends of her heart as in former days, and to others whose friendship was valued as they valued hers. Her brother-in-law, General Custis Lee, found a happy home at Ravensworth for the rest of his life, and was a wise and interested counsellor and companion to his nephew, Robert E. Lee, Jr., the eldest son of Mrs. Lee, who remained at home. His brother, George Bolling Lee, studied medicine and settled in New York, where he is still a prominent physician. His mother frequently visited him there. Toward the latter part of her life Mrs. Lee went to Washington for the winter, having an apartment at Stoneleigh Court.

As we have already said, Mrs. Lee was in every respect a noble Virginia gentlewoman of the old school, a true and sincere friend, admired and beloved by all who knew her. To her dependents and every one who lived on the estate, or in the neighborhood, she was always the kind and helpful friend, who entered into all their pleasures and sympathized with them in their troubles. Children of all ages were dear to her, and always glad to see her. She never failed to seek out the country folk wherever they were gathered at any entertainment or church festival attended by her, and have a pleasant word with them. Not only was she the stately and gracious chataleine of "Ravensworth," but also the kind and beloved Lady of the Manor to the whole countryside around her home.

Mrs. Lee was brought up in the Presbyterian faith, but became a communicant of the Episcopal Church, of which many of her own family had been, and were members from generations past. She loved the simple ritual and beautiful services of the Old Church of Virginia, and stood firmly in the ancient paths of the fathers, so far as the teaching of the Bible and the preaching of the gospel were concerned. Her own faith was fixed and sure, resting on the plain and saving truth revealed in Jesus Christ our Saviour. It was her regular custom, unless prevented by some good reason, to attend church on the Lord's Day, and her living example in keeping it holy was a constant reminder of its sacred claims upon those who came within the range of her influence.

We have already referred to her passing away in Richmond on Monday night, the 5th of May. The following Wednesday evening the funeral service in that city was held in St. Paul's Church. This consisted of the former part of the Burial Office, which was read by the rector, the Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, Jr., D. D., assisted by the Rev. G. Freeland Peter, a relative of the Lee family, the rector of St. James' Church. On Thursday the funeral train arrived about 8 o'clock in the morning at Lexington. Mrs. Lee's remains were then taken to the Lee Memorial Church, where she had often been a worshipper. A short service was held there at half past ten. At its close a procession was formed, headed by the white-robed choir singing a hymn, followed by the honorary pall-bearers and the clergy immediately preceding the hearse, then Mrs. Lee's only surviving son, Dr. George Bolling Lee, and his wife, with her three nieces, followed by other relatives and friends. At the mausoleum the casket was borne within the crypt, where the full committal service was read by the Rev. Dr. Samuel A. Wallis, an old friend, and the Rev. Churchill J. Gibson, the rector of the church. At its close, General Robert E. Lee's favorite hymn, "How Firm a Foundation, Ye Saints of the Lord," now the funeral hymn of the Lee family, was sung, and a last benediction of peace was pronounced by Dr. Wallis. Then on that lovely spring day, with the soft breeze whispering its requiem through the trees, the reverent company of relatives and friends, hushed by the solemnity of the occasion, passed silently away, and all that was mortal of Mrs. Lee was left to rest by the side of her beloved husband in that historic tomb, until the eternal morn shall be again.

"Numbered with Thy saints in glory everlasting."

The Last Enemy.

Some time ago an eminent physician announced a discovery, and treatment which enthusiasts declared would revolutionize human existence.

The eminent specialist claimed that the body of man is composed of electrons in vibration—that in a healthy organ the electrons vibrate at a certain rate of speed; and that in an unhealthy organ the electrons vibrate at a different rate of speed. In other words, an unhealthy organ is one in which, through some circumstance or combination of circumstances, the rate of electronic vibration has been changed.

Manifestly, then, the way to make an unhealthy organ healthy would be to change the rate of vibration of its electrons to the healthy rate of vibration. The specialist invented an electrical machine designed to accomplish that result.

And people, highly intelligent, who saw it work, declared that the results were so marvelous that henceforth the human family need have no fear of the most virulent disease, that cancer, syphilis and tuberculosis would vanish before the treatment as mist before the rising sun.

Keen, intelligent men who investigated the discovery threw their hats in the air and affirmed they were not afraid of any disease on earth, no matter how vicious. By keeping a man's body at the right rate of vibration, disease could be eliminated and prevented. It certainly sounded good, and hope and enthusiasm were raised in the hearts of millions.

And yet recently the discoverer of this remarkable treatment and the inventor of this life-giving machine died. He died just like anybody else would die. He died as people have died who never heard of electronic vibration.

There is no way to beat death. It is not intended that we should. We would not want to if we knew all the facts. It is the only way out of this world and every human is supposed to get out of here when his work is done, just as every student is expected to get out of school eventually.

It is doubtful if science has ever prolonged the life of a human by a single day beyond the intended span. Science has prevented lives from being snuffed out prematurely. It has helped people to live healthfully. But medical science cannot keep the soul in the body when the time for flight has come.

We have many experiences in this world. They are all vital; they are all teaching. We encounter many problems. The final and greatest experience that we go through—the last enemy that we overcome is Death.—Wilkes Wamboldt.

Gather Us In

Gather us in, Thou Love that fillest all,
Gather our rival faiths within thy fold,
Rend each man's temple's veil, and bid it fall,
That we may know that Thou hast been of old;
Gather us in!

Gather us in: we worship only Thee;
In varied names we stretch a common hand;
In diverse forms a common soul we see;
In many ships we seek one spirit-land.
Gather us in!

Each sees one color of Thy rainbow light;
Each looks upon one tint and calls it heaven;
Thou art the fullness of our partial sight;
We are not perfect till we find the seven;
Gather us in!

Thine is the mystic life great India craves,
Thine is the Parsee's sin destroying beam,
Thine is the Buddhist's rest from tossing waves,
Thine is the empire of vast China's dream;
Gather us in!

Some seek a Father in the heavens above,
Some ask a human image to adore;
Some crave a Spirit vast as life and love:
Within Thy mansions we have all and more;
Gather us in!

Would you not say that the ideal college town is of moderate size, but not isolated; that it is clean, healthy, law-abiding, American, cultured, interested in education? And would you not include beauty of location and proximity to points of historic interest among its assets?

Geneva, New York, the home of Hobart College, meets all these qualifications. One of the beauty spots of the Finger Lakes Region and nationally known for its unspoiled American culture, it receives from countless visitors the title: An Ideal College Town.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

I have learned something from every man I have met.—Emerson.

The man who hates the Bible generally has most reason to.

Self-control in trifles trains to self-control in crises.

He who refuses to face his worst forfeits the possibility of finding his best.—Percy C. Ainsworth.

A drop of the oil of humility will save a man from a great deal of the smart of humiliation.

I shall behold Thee, face to face,
O God, and in Thy light retrace
How in all I loved here, still was't Thou.
—Browning.

"Take care that the face you see in your mirror in the morning is pleasing to look at. You may not see it again all day, but others will."

How become a little child, you cry. Look to Jesus! The feebleness of Bethlehem and the manger, of Calvary and the grave, was Christ's way to enter the kingdom. For us there is no other way.—Andrew Murray.

The Master Hand behind all the doings of men is unseen, and yet it shapes and molds events as they move in seeming confusion and disorder toward a consummation which God has ordained and which He alone foresees and understands.

Living a noble life for the sake of any reward is likely to end in an ignoble life with no reward; but living right for right's sake and for Christ's sake results in noble living and generous rewarding.—Selected.

In service which Thy love appoints
There are no bonds for me;
My secret heart is taught the truth
That makes Thy children free;
A life of self-renouncing love
Is a life of liberty.

Hold fast to love. If men wound your heart, let them not sour or embitter it; let them not shut up or narrow it; let them only expand it more and more, and be able to say, with St. Paul, "My heart is enlarged."—F. W. Robertson.

The true attitude to life is not, "Give me," but "What can I give?" Not "What can I get?" but "What can I spend for other people?" Not "What can serve me?" but "How can I serve?" We must learn that attitude in everything. We must realize that we do not get out of life anything worth while until we take to it this key, "What can I do for people? What can I put into life?"—Reid.

There is one thing with which I am tempted to be impatient. It is when I hear in missionary addresses, "If you do nothing else, you can pray," as if prayer were the easiest thing in the world. It is the hardest thing to do for Foreign Missions. It is much easier to read, or to give, or to go, than to pray. If a man begins to pray for Foreign Missions, he will find it takes spiritual power and energy, if his prayer is to be real.—W. H. G. Thomas.

THE CRIME DOCTOR

In the current number of "The World's Work" there is an interesting statement of the results of extensive investigations made in Chicago to discover the cause of crime. The tests cover a period of ten years and have been made in approximately forty thousand cases. The investigators declare that they have proved beyond peradventure that crime has a physical basis. Crime, we are told, is caused by a physical defect of the brain. This defect renders its victim so far below normal in emotion that he has little or no conscience, or so far above normal as to make him hysterically irresponsible. The upper part of the head, we are told, contains the "gray matter" used in the process of thought and the lower part of the head, the "basal ganglia," which constitute the material of the "feeling mind." For some years "intelligence tests" have been applied and a fairly accurate measure of the thinking power determined. These have been tests of the upper brain. Now come the "feeling tests" by which it is claimed it is possible to measure a man's power to feel. A criminal, we are told, is a man whose brain has a structural deformity. The material used in the emotional process is either so deficient in quantity or so much in excess of normal that in neither case is it possible for him to have a normal reaction to human relationships. His condition is fixed for life, for the structural deformity is incurable. We are further told that the particular form of crime to which the victim of this infirmity is going to be addicted can also be determined. There are structural thieves, structural fire-bugs, structural highwaymen, structural murderers. A boy can be led into a testing-room, and when the tests have been applied he may be labelled as one of these and the label is indelible, for the conditions are absolutely permanent. The men who have conducted these experiments are so convinced of the validity of the tests made that they declare the results supply a complete answer to one of the gravest problems of government and that the application of methods suggested by them will immediately produce a marked reduction of crime and practically eliminate it in one or two generations. The upper part of the brain, we are told, is not a determining factor at all in this matter. The structural murderer may or may not be endowed with high intelligence brain, but if his basal ganglia be abnormal, all that his intelligence can do for him is to make him a more or less efficient criminal.

All this leaves our mind confused. Can it be possible that the whole structure of criminal law, which in itself is a wide term; for every deliberate breach of contract affecting property or rights in property, may be classified as crime is after all but a mass of rules regulating a world that is hopelessly insane? Or has society deliberately made the unfortunate victims of a physical deformity the scape-goats of its wrath in order to obscure the real disease of evil which lurks in the heart of every man. Perhaps when we have eliminated the pickpocket, the hold-up man, the safe-breaker, the gun-man, and the wife-murderer, we may be able to get down to business and try to find out the root of that selfishness whose fruits are "adultery, fornication, lasciviousness, hatred, jealousies, wrath, factions, divisions, parties, envyings, drunkenness, revelings and such like."

THE SCRAP-HEAP

We know a minister who was once the almoner of a generous congregation, and he used to say that it was the most difficult as well as the most instructive part of his ministry. We have heard him say that it required greater spiritual preparation to enter the home of poverty than to enter his pulpit on Sunday morning. His people protested at times that he gave too much time to the beggars and ne'er-do-wells; but ever since that day, when browsing through the Greek Testament, he had come to realize that those whom the Master had come to save were not merely as he had somehow always interpreted the words "those who had wandered astray and had lost their way," but that they were literally those whose lives had "gone to smash," he had felt that the Church had not yet found out what the abattoir and cotton-gin owners discovered long ago, namely, that the scrap-heap was the surest source from which they could secure a profit. A church that has in it no poor is about as inadequately equipped as a college with a chair of chemistry but without a laboratory, or a school with an athletic instructor, but having neither gymnasium nor playground. The art of helping is one of the most difficult ones because it is the very highest art. It consists not in giving, but in sharing. Into the act of service must be put all of self.

To strike a golf-ball looks to the uninitiated a very simple thing indeed, but as most of us know, it requires a coordination of the vision with pretty much all the muscles of the body. Making a good approach to the green is easy compared to the art of approaching and getting into the heart of a poor, bruised and wounded life. The minister quoted above used to say that he found out that most of the gifts made in his rectory or study did more harm than good, so when the poor came to him he would say: "Let's go to your home and talk over the matter there."

"The walk," he said, "gave me a different person with whom to deal, and as for myself, I could actually feel myself being changed. What seemed in the study a perfunctory and hopeless sort of business became in the end a real spiritual adventure."

We believe this minister somehow hit upon a principle demonstrated by the Master and appropriated by the Church of the first century with results that still leave the mind of the student of history dazed. Gibbon's five reasons for the growth of Christianity fail to mention the fundamental one. It was the human touch.

To us the most splendid scene of courage in the New Testament is the description of the Master's first day in Capernaum. He had come with His mother to make His new home there. He was already widely known and the eyes of all men were upon him. Almost His first act is to go to the custom house and invite Matthew "to follow" Him, and Matthew, the publican outcast, shuts his ledger and comes. That walk together up the streets of Capernaum and the Master's presence at the feast that night in the house of Matthew not only made Matthew, but taught the early Church the secret of conquest. Lest they should forget, Jesus, in the last fortnight of His life, when every moment caught the focused rays of His gift to the world, tarried a day in Jericho that He might be a self-invited guest in the home of another social outcast, Zaccheus. It was the request to an outcast woman to give Him a drink of water that made the walls of prejudice that surrounded the Samaritan town of Sychar fall down, and made the conquest of a hostile people seem a miracle to His disciples.

THE RURAL CHURCH CONFERENCE

Madison, Wis.

THE second annual Rural Church Conference of the Episcopal Church, which began here on June 30 and closed July 11, will almost certainly be followed by results of far-reaching importance. More men than last year are attending; in fact, ours is by far the largest delegation of clergy at the school which is open to the members of all religious denominations. The truth is, the Church is afraid that the conference will grow so rapidly that no university will be able to take care of us. Danger of this sort is to the rural worker altogether unexpected. A little over a year ago he was convinced that the Church knew nothing about rural work and cared only enough about it to reserve it for those considered unprepared or unfit for urban service. To his way of thinking, the master minds controlling ecclesiastical polity looked upon the open country as a sort of Siberia to which to banish all undesirable clergy.

This sudden change is having about the same effect upon the rural pastors that a government edict from Washington cancelling all farm mortgages would have upon the farmers of the wheat belt. It has put heart into the men here to such an extent that they verily believe that when they return to their fields they will have to double their plants to meet the new demands of their work.

It is, in fact, quite impossible to describe the enthusiasm of this conference for the vocation of rural service. On the one hand, it is very close to elation; on the other, it is the calm product of instruction by some of the ablest teachers of agricultural subjects in America. And with this enthusiasm goes the reassuring thought that it is all practical. Some of their fellows, men they are living with night and day, have told them of thrilling spiritual adventures in the foothills of California, on the wide prairies of South Dakota and Kansas, among the mountains of Appalachia, and along the shores of the Chesapeake Bay. This great convention has no doubt that it can carry the gospel of Jesus Christ into the nation's great open spaces. Its morale any American Church might well treasure.

The problem immediately ahead of this conference is how to spread the flame, how to set the communicants of our urban minded Church on fire with zeal for the new-found task of extending the kingdom of God beyond the city limits.

It is not unlikely that young men preparing for the ministry will from now on find in rural service just the form of high emprise they seek. The great difficulties in the way stimulate courage. The extreme necessity of farming folk, already the chief concern of statesmen, arouses the sympathy. The possibilities of a soul-satisfying life in the country grip the imagination. The current of population, social engineers tell us, is soon to flow back from the city to the open spaces. Mr. S. J. Brown, an undergraduate of the Cambridge Seminary, located in the most congested part of the country, attended the conference at the expense of his fellow-students. They wanted to learn more of the new gospel of God's wide out-of-doors, and so they sent young Brown to sit in and listen for them.

One of the most useful members of the conference was a clergyman now in his eightieth year, the Rev. S. S. Hepburn, of Worton, Md. He lives on and conducts his own farm in the midst of his parish. Here, at the school, he drew out with shrewd questions and observations the great agricultural experts in the class room and among the members of his own group, many years his junior. He was continually dropping helpful remarks charged with the favor and charm of country life both as a planter and pastor.

Mr. Hepburn may be called the father of the new rural church in our communion. At the Portland Convention he introduced a resolution in which he called attention to the supreme importance of rural work; showed how it had been all but forgotten, and asked for help. The originality and unexpectedness of the idea hastily caught the fancy of the convention. Without question it was adopted and many loyal Churchmen congratulated Mr. Hepburn upon the notable ecclesiastical achievement of rediscovering the open country. An appropriation was made to provide for an annual national convention of rural workers, of which this one now closing at Madison with notable contributions to the cause is the second.

Night before last, at a gathering of all the denominational groups now at the school, Mr. Hepburn, when the regular speakers had finished their assigned topics, asked for the privilege of the floor. What he then had to say—upon sudden impulse—better tells the story of what has happened to the Church since the great rediscovery than anything that any one else has said at this conference or the one preceding it. Here is something of the spirit of it:

"Brethren, many years ago, in fact, as far back as 1867, I entered the rural ministry to make it my life work. All these years I have been working among the farmers of the countryside, alone and forgotten by the Church. No outside help came to me. The difficulties, the trials and the bitter disappointments of the neglected ministry I faced without sympathy, encouragement or council. Of course, I dearly loved rural work and the farming folk, and that love, together with the amusing experiences of the day's work, carried me through.

"Brethren, I can scarcely tell you what my feelings are tonight, and I speak to you companions in the great lonely cause I fought for all my life. The Church I deeply love has finally come to our rescue. It is aroused and will, I believe, put all its heart into this service of rural life. My dreams have come true."

Everybody was deeply stirred by the old pioneer's words, and upon a motion of Rev. E. Tetreau, one of the most active and successful Methodist clergy in the rural field, the whole gathering arose for a chautauqua salute.

The Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, Secretary of the Social Service Department, visited the conference for a day, Sunday, July 6. In his sermon at Grace Church he gave the conference the heart of the great problem confronting the Church. He said that there are three needs—first, men with a vocation or rural service; second, fields in which they can express their personalities through notable achievement, and third, a decent livelihood.

These three thoughts were constantly brought up in the class room and conference during the ten days' session. For many, perhaps most, of the men who came to the conference, the meaning of the pilgrimage was altogether hazy. They gathered with an intense love of their work, but with little sense of its technique and a wide wonder about the sort of instruction to be given them. This is all very different now, though. They have so much technique in their note-books and perhaps in their heads that they fear they can't apply one-half of it in a lifetime. Glance through this schedule and find out why:

The first class began at 8 o'clock in the morning. Think of breaking into the top of a clergyman's morning with an alarm clock. At that rustic hour Professor Roy J. Col-

THE HISTORY AND DEVELOPEMENT OF THE SOCIAL SERVICE WORK OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES

The Reverend Jos. M. Waterman, A. B., B. D., Baltimore, Md.

I.

THE contributions of Dr. William Augustus Muhlenberg to the Social Service Work of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America.

The Man and His Work.

Dr. Muhlenberg was born in Philadelphia in 1796. His grandfather was the first speaker of the House of Representatives of the First Congress. In Philadelphia Dr. Muhlenberg was a member of Christ Church under Bishop White and there he was ordained in 1820. While in his first charge at Lancaster, Pa., he organized the school system of the city. He became convinced that not only the hope of the Church but the salvation of the commonwealth centered in the Christianizing of education. He conceived a vision of Christian schools throughout the land.

In 1827 Flushing Institute was built at Flushing, Long Island, and a year later was opened with Dr. Muhlenberg as rector. He hoped to expand this institute into a college for boys so he purchased City Point as a site for later development. The Flushing Institute later became St. Paul's College, but City Point was never developed through lack of funds. Schools sprung up all over the country modeled after St. Paul's. Dr. Muhlenberg was in this manner the originator of Christian schools in our Church. He was rector of St. Paul's for eighteen years. During this period nine hundred boys were educated. Among fifty of them who entered the ministry, was Bishop Kerfoot. Dr. Muhlenberg resigned in 1846 and St. Paul's was discontinued about three years later.

From 1844-46 the subject of an ideal parish occupied his field of vision. His sister, Mrs. Mary Rogers, wanted to build a free church in New York City, and gave Dr. Muhlenberg the opportunity to plan such a church. This church was consecrated as the Church of the Holy Communion in 1846. It had the first parish house in this country and was the first "institutional church" in our Church. On St. Luke's Day of that year, 1846, Dr. Muhlenberg announced that one-half the offerings would be given to form a nucleus for a hospital for sick among the poor. Thirty dollars was raised.

About this time Dr. Muhlenberg began to consider the work of women in the churches and he considered sisterhoods. There was no organization of the kind in any Protestant communion, either in England or America. He was convinced of the necessity of the womanly element and influence in any worthy or permanent organization of charity. He therefore wanted to start a community of women consecrated to life of charitable service. The first sisterhood was formally organized in 1852.

The first Christmas Tree for poor children in the City of New York was lighted in the Church of the Holy Communion in 1847. During his first three years as rector, a day school for boys and one for girls were operated. An employment society was started for furnishing needlework to the indigent women of the parish. It also marked the beginning of the sister's systematic care of the poor and their dispensary. The Fresh Air fund as applied to country refreshment for poor in the summer was original with Dr. Muhlenberg, both in name and in fact.

Several gifts were received in 1849 for St. Luke's, so in the following year $150,000 was raised and the hospital incorporated. It was the first Church Hospital in our Church in America. The cornerstone was laid in 1854, and the building opened in 1857. The sisterhood was placed in charge of the hospital. A chapel was built in the center of the building, for St. Luke's was to be truly a church institution. Dr. Muhlenberg's faith was so strong that he underwrote the household expenses for the first three years, feeling that he would be supported. He was.

Hospital associations were formed among young men of various city parishes—charged with the duty of searching out and bringing to the hospital and maintaining while there, the sick and destitute who came under their observation. The members visited the beneficiaries while they were in the hospital, provided decent Christian burial in case of death, and interested themselves to set them on their way again in life if they recovered.

In 1859 Dr. Muhlenberg resigned the parish of Holy Communion, and devoted himself to the management and pastoral duties of St. Luke's. He was pastor and executive head of St. Luke's for the first twenty years of its work. The leading features of St. Luke's were the new system of nursing, the element of personal interest, and responsible care. "The personal solicitude with which he ministered to the spiritual necessities of stricken inmates in the atmosphere of home-like cheer and peace and comfort which pervaded the house as the result of his presence, the sacred offices he performed with solemnizing, comforting, and elevating results . . . all these cannot be adequately written down."

His enthusiasm and labors continued until 1877, his eighty-first year, when he was stricken. He was buried at St. Johnland which he loved.

The Muhlenberg Memorial.

The work which Dr. Muhlenberg had accomplished in his own parish made him hope that a movement might make possible and widespread in the General Church what he had already done in a limited degree. The Memorial did not so much ask for specific measures as suggest action according to certain indicated principles.

The Memorial raised the question of whether "the posture of our Church with reference to the great moral and social necessities of the day was all that could be wished or was to be expected." The Memorial suggested the inquiry whether the work of the Church among the masses might not be made more successful by an allowance of rubrical relaxation and by a less stringent policy in conferring Holy Orders. The language of the Memorial was that of inquiry and suggestion rather than conviction. The presentation of it and its dignified and sympathetic reception at the hands of the Bishops awakened the widest interest and provoked a general discussion throughout the Church.

Edward Washburn in a monograph on the Memorial states: "The party fears on either hand the jealousy of the episcopal authority by the Lower House, and the great power of inertia in the body, strangled a plan as wise as it was generous." In many respects, however, the Memorial won success in the midst of defeat. It occasioned widespread discussion. The attention of the younger clergy was attracted to a new phase of Churchmanship and thoughtful minds awakened to a new and nobler idea of the Church's mission. Tiffany says: "It is interesting to recall what Dr. Muhlenberg himself wrote to Bishop Otey in the pamphlet, 'What do the Memorialists want? concerning flexibility in the use of the Prayer Book in regular congregations, and to find the desired requirements every one granted in the Revised Prayer Book of 1892. The Memorial was the deed of the revision movement, as it also was of the celebrated Declaration concerning Unity, promulgated at the convention of 1886 and by the Lambeth Conference of 1888."

One champion of the principles of Memorial Movement was Bishop Alonzo Potter. "In his efforts to emancipate the liturgy from the slavish yoke of the letter, to remove the bars to the progress of the apostolic ministry, to bring out the undeveloped powers of the Church and to utilize its every instrument to reach and elevate all conditions of men and departments of life, he showed himself a master builder on the foundations which Dr. Muhlenberg had laid bare."

St. Johnland.

Dr. Muhlenberg was led to start St. Johnland by two ideas: first, his daily observation of the great disadvantage of the city poor in their tenement houses; second, his desire to present to the Church an example of the principles of the Memorial or Evangelical Catholicism.

He planned therefore to organize a settlement or ideal industrial community where the worthy and diligent poor might have good homes.

Twenty-two years after the founding of St. Johnland, Superintendent Gassner made the following statement:

"The fundamental idea of St. Johnland, a collection of homes for industrial workers . . . has not been found practicable simply owing to the fact that the poor will not leave the city. As a home for old men and children it is probably unsurpassed."

The work was first started in 1866 on the North Shore of Long Island, where six hundred acres were purchased.

In 1870 this work was incorporated for the following objects:

"To maintain a home for aged couples and aged men in destitute circumstances . . . to care for friendless children and youths by giving them home, schooling, Christian training and occupation by which they can earn their future livelihood; to give form and practical applications to the principles of Brotherhood in Christ in an organized congregation or parish constituted by the settled residents of St. Johnland."

During the year 1922 a total of two hundred and forty-nine persons were cared for in the various homes of the St. Johnland group. Expenses for the year were $69,878.64. The trust funds of the Society total $250,780.76.

This Society is now entering its fifty-fourth year of work, the fifty-eighth since the founding of St. Johnland. It has moved forward steadily in its splendid work. It is not a diocesan institution, but it is within the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Conclusion.

Dr. Muhlenberg had no theory of social reorganization which was to operate as a panacea for all existing ills. His good works are the simple and natural outcome of his observations. His efforts were directed toward meeting the needs of people in a practicable way.

THE RURAL CHURCH CONFERENCE.

bert lectured on Sociology of Community Life. No lecturer at the University gave his hearers anything more entertaining or useful. He puts country life and the countryman on an operating table and shows you what is the matter. Best of all, he can usually suggest the practical remedy.

At 9 o'clock Ralph S. Adams showed the ministers how to survey their fields for the purpose of social and religious organization. This subject is a new one and knowledge of it is needed before any important and lasting religious work can be done in the country.

At 10 o'clock Professors Hibbard and Macklin revealed the mysteries of marketing. They also explained how the farmer got into the present plight. They say that he is prone to try all kinds of patent medicines in the hope of a speedy cure of his ills. What they prescribed is a longer and more effective course of treatment. It is greatly to the advantage of clergymen who have influence with agricultural workers to learn sound principles of the economics of farming. Through knowledge of this kind the farmers should be better protected against the demagogue and the loose thinker.

At 11 o'clock the groups met in conference. The Episcopal group gathered at St. Francis' Club House. There some of the most important work of the school was done. Nearly every day some man who performed some constructive work in rural service had an opportunity to explain what he had done. In this way inspiration for better service and more intelligent methods was aroused throughout the group.

At 12:30 dinner was served at the Y. M. C. A.

At 2:15 the entire school gathered at Music Hall to be instructed in community and religious music by Professor E. B. Gordon and religious drama by the Rev. William P. McDermott.

At 3:30 the ministers relaxed and played games which Professor Fred Schlatter taught them, and which they will hand on to their youthful communicants at home.

At 3:30 considerable part of the group studied auto mechanics under Professor F. W. Duffee. He showed them how to repair their own automobiles without great expense. As every clergyman needs to save all he can in this expensive department of his operations, the course was very popular.

In addition to all this, there were seminars, movies, concerts, receptions, picnics and exhibitions of various sorts.

In the opinion of the members, one of the greatest achievements of the conference was the organization of the rural church workers. This body, which is made up of all the clergy of the Church who came to Madison, will undertake to arouse the Church to the necessity of rural work. They will attempt to enlist in the fellowship, every worker serving in rural communities. Dr. J. L. Prevost, Glen Loch, Pa., was elected President, and the Rev. Oscar Meyer, of Oxford, N. Y., Secretary and Treasurer. The Executive Committee is composed of the Rev. H. J. Edwards, of Redding Ridge, Conn., First Province; the Rev. E. S. Ford, Sparta, N. J., Second Province; the Rev. William McClelland, of East New Market, Md., Third Province; the Rev. Val. H. Sessions, Bolton, Miss., Fourth Province; the Rev. William J. Vincent, La Peer, Mich., Fifth Province.

Three underlying principles of Dr. Muhlenberg that underlie his efforts were:

"1. That the end of human existence and social order is the production of a perfect type of individual and corporate character.

"2. That character is a growth, a continuous evolution, the result of an educational process in which the interaction of individual and corporate energies is the indispensable factor.

"3. He regarded the family as the true social unit . . . to mould and determine the development of individual character. Hence his effort toward social amelioration contemplated the elevation and education of families as the chief results of its action."

Three opinions of Dr. Muhlenberg:

"He stands before us in the fulness of his living, charitable, eager religion, striving to embody his idea in concrete work."

"A wise master builder who sought to make men one in the fellowship of a simple faith."

"Such were the beginnings of activities which have transformed much of the life of the Church, given to us the modern institutional Church and started many activities outside of ecclesiastical limits."

vince; the Ven. E. W. Couper, Minneapolis, Minn., Sixth Province; the Ven. H. H. Marsden, St. Louis, Mo., Seventh Province, and the Ven. M. M. Goldie, Cove, Ore., Eighth Province.

Our group was quartered for the most part at the University Club. Getting up early and staying up late at night gave them all a vast amount of learning and recreation, but a scant amount of sleep. They will return to their fields with the need of a few extra hours of rest, but with a determination to put on a program of rural work that will revolutionize their Diocese. If the Bishops don't stop them, they will carry the gospel of the open country into the very heart of the chief cities in their several States.

Findings.

The following findings were reached by the conference:

Your Committee on Findings, acting upon the spirit and letter of the proceedings of this conference, submits as worthy of special emphasis the following:

1. That since we are indebted to agricultural scientists, sociologists and economists for revealing the distressing conditions of the rural districts and the amazing opportunities for service there, it be regarded as one of our chief duties to disseminate their findings throughout the Church to enlist its whole-hearted cooperation in solving the rural problem.

2. That the rural workers throughout the Church accept every opportunity to recruit men for the rural ministry. This may be done by presenting the importance and the romance of the calling before business men, schools and young people's societies.

3. That the rural mission, wherever possible, be linked with a city parish as a means to a better understanding of rural needs and a more intelligent support of domestic work.

4. That the subject of rural Church work be regularly presented in a special department of all the National Church papers under the editorship of the chief of the Publicity Department of the National Council. To that end it is necessary that rural Church workers send to the department stories of all interesting activities in their fields.

5. That every Diocese be urged to adopt a Diocesan program, suggestions for which are contained in the resolutions and findings adopted at this conference.

6. That every rural parish and mission adopt a parochial program, suggestions for which will be found in the proceedings of this conference.

7. That the seminaries be requested to place special emphasis upon rural work.

8. That the program of special interest to the young people be worked out that they may be induced to remain in rural communities, for service and leadership.

9. That the problem of material for the rural Church school is still unsolved and requires continued study by experts. We invite the continued attention of the Department of Religious Education to this subject.

10. That inasmuch as the National Council is willing to purchase for its lending library any books desired by rural workers for the study of their profession, it is important that the widest possible use be made of this service.

11. That the life together made possible by the present dormitory system be continued at succeeding conferences, particularly because of the inspiration of fellowship resulting from such intimacy of kindred spirits.

"HEALERS" AND DIVINE HEALING

W. H. Moore, M. D., Hartford, Conn.

IT is currently reported that as an aftermath of the Rev. Mr. Hickson's ministry of healing in the United States a few years ago, there has been something of an epidemic of 'healers' and 'Divine healing.'

This from a leading English scientific society, which, if not in the Church of England, is largely made up of Churchmen. Undertaking to make inquiry as to whether this is tenable, a considerable amount of data was collected in this country on the subject. The Dowies, Sanfords, Weltmers, Holy Rollers and the like were not taken into consideration as relevant. The matter at issue was as to whether Mr. Hickson's visit was instrumental in breeding "healers" and "Divine healing."

"As I understand it," said a Hartford clergyman, standing at the door of Jarvis Hall, Trinity College, "the question is as to whether Hickson and his mission of healing is being parodied as a sequel of his visit. Look across the campus. There stands the bronze statue of Bishop Brownell. It is a fine piece of art, made in Italy in 1867 on the order of the Bishop's son-in-law, Mr. Burnham, and costing thirty-five thousand dollars. All who knew the Bishop say that it is as true to life as such works can be, but it is not the living, breathing Thomas Church Brownell, who died two years before that bronze was cast. Hickson may be imitated, but the imitative article is but an aping of his mission. Never mind," he continued, "as to inquiring as to whether Mr. Hickson's 'classes' petered out after he went home! That isn't it. Coue has been here twice, and Margot Asquith has paid her visit. Mr. Hickson meant well, and was straight out-and-out with his teaching and methods. Is there in this so-called aftermath that which is just as well meaning and just as undeviating?"

Opportunity availed to obtain the opinions of some of the Episcopal Bishops as to the subject, with "fundamentalists" and "modernism" laid aside for the moment.

Speaking of healing and healers, Bishop Whitehaad said: "It is a subject of far more importance than many realize. The various 'cults' of modern days, laying stress upon the healing of physical diseases, compel us to question whether the Church is fulfilling her duty in carrying out the high commission given by our Lord. We should all pray for the revival of her original faith and power."

On the same subject Bishop Brent said: "Faith is the unvarying and progressive activity of the Christian life, and we must remember that it does not consist in departments or in detached acts. It is neither an act or a series of acts. All that the Christian does, however, should be the expression of faith. It is increasingly evident that even the glimmerings of faith which we have affect appreciably the entire life including the body as well as inner faculties. That science has an important part to play in maintaining and recovering health is a fact no sane person can deny. But science without God, whether in matters pertaining to physical health or whatever department of life, is a poor thing and can do no less than the work that God intended it to do. It is a calamity that the Prayer Book provides such wholly inadequate and feeble prayers for the sick. For many years I have never used any of them but one, supplementing this by extemporaneous prayers or carefully prepared prayers from other sources.

Another Bishop, when asked his opinion, said: "The vital questions are these: Did Christ's commission to His disciples to 'heal the sick' terminate with the death of the apostles, or is it still in active existence? Are the churches really Christian in their beliefs about pain and sickness?" He directed attention to a society in the Church which is endeavoring by practical methods to procure answers to these two questions, a society which is not generally known, but which has quite recently begun to be understood, and brought into estimation.

The Society of the Nazarene is an Episcopal organization that is devoted to the practice of Divine healing "according to the methods of Jesus." Its headquarters are at Boonton, N. J., where the rector of St. John's, the Rev. Henry B. Wilson, is the director. He has written several books on the subject, among them "Does Christ Still Heal?" "The Power to Heal," "The Revival of the Gift of Healing." He also publishes a magazine entitled "The Nazarene," and has issued several pamphlets entitled "The Ministry of Healing," "The Will of God in Healing," "Spiritual Healing and Psycho-Therapy," "Is Spiritual Healing Real?" and "Important Aspects of Hickson's Ministry of Healing." Asked to explain the aims and purpose of the society, Mr. Wilson said: "It is an organization for Christians or those desiring to become Christians, founded on the belief in our Lord's continued belief in the health of the body as well as the salvation of the soul. Its object is the restoration of the gift of healing, universally practiced in the early Church. It aims to develop the inner life and to inspire a faith that will enable man to appropriate God's blessing for body and soul."

The members of the society have an office of anointing, which has long been in disuse in the Church. The oil that is used has been blessed by a Bishop, and is carried carefully in a small bag or box. At the conclusion of the anointing, which is on the forehead or breast, it is wiped off by a small piece of cotton, which is carried away and burned. It is positively stated that although the oil is described as "sacred," it has no magical properties; but it is declared that by virtue of the blessing of the Bishop there is bestowed upon it, however, a Divine character which is imparted to those who receive it in true faith. The anointing is not used in all cases of illness, nor is it considered indispensable, even in some cases of serious illness. It is also held that to use this office where a person does not earnestly believe in it and desire it, would be useless, if not actually wrong, as in such case it is stated that it would produce no results, and would thus bring great discredit on the office.

The anointing is, as a rule, done by a minister, and in the office there is provision for confession of sins and the assurance of absolution prior to the anointing, whenever possible. It is held that where the sick person has committed deadly sins, the act of confession will contribute very largely to his recovery. Where he has not committed any deadly sin, a short form of general confession is made, and absolution pronounced. The direct purpose of anointing, it is stated, is to restore in a supernatural way physical health, and that the act of anointing does not include remission of sins.

The office opens with the reading of the Thirteenth Psalm, followed by the lesson (Jas. 5:14, Jno. 14:12, and Matt. 17:19). Then comes the confession, absolution, prayer of faith, and prayer of healing, followed by the anointing. This is as follows:

"O, Lord Jesus, who in Thy love for souls didst minister to the bodily infirmities of man, and didst bestow upon Thy disciples the gift of healing, grant, we beseech Thee, by the power of Thy sacred name, Jesus Christ of Nazareth, that this Thy servant, whom we anoint by virtue of our faith in Thee, and who turns to Thee in true faith, may experience the effect of Thy healing presence both in soul and body, may be restored to health, and be numbered among Thy faithful servants, who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Spirit, ever one God, world without end. Amen."

Then, after the Lord's Prayer, and Twentieth and Twenty-third Psalms are read, and the office concludes with a "thanksgiving for recovery," the sick person firmly believing in the efficacy of the anointing, and casting away all doubts and fears. The greatest help is given in proportion to the faith of the sick person, and this must be accompanied by a like faith on the part of the healer, the minister. Stress is laid on the fact that it is faith in God's power to heal, and not on the special ability of the healer or the form of healing, but that both healer and the candidate for healing must possess it.

The healer disclaims all power of healing on his own part. He never proceeds until he has made a definite appeal to the Lord to be present, and grant the use of His name and power. The candidate is exhorted to cast out of his mind all thoughts that would tend to obstruct the Divine presence, together with all doubts and fears. Rev. Mr. Wilson said: "The true character of the true healer will be not in his ability to heal, but in his ability to awaken faith as Jesus did, and to prepare the soul for healing, as Jesus did, so that the true character of God's nature and power and love may be unmistakably revealed." There is nothing mysterious about the treatment, no charlatanry, no quackery. It cannot be satisfactorily exercised in an atmosphere of unbelief or ignorance. The unrepentant, indifferent person cannot be healed. The person who is lax about approaching the sacraments, and the man who is living in known sin with no idea of doing different, are poor subjects for healing. The bandit who robs a bank and contracts pneumonia, and the conscienceless profiteer who in the exercise of his profession achieves high blood pressure, cannot by mere anointing obtain cure and strength for more hold-ups and up-boasts.

The Society of the Nazarene is exerting efforts to restore to the churches the old-time virile element of healing, and the blessings which have been lost where it is neglected. Because of this neglect hundreds of people have gone into Christian Science and New Thought societies, or have put themselves under the care of fake "healers," simply because the churches have not only failed to provide the Divine healing work, but have refused it when requested. Said a leading clergyman: "It will be a glorious day when the churches realize that for centuries they have been presenting only a partial Christianity; and still more glorious when they restore to the people the full gospel that Jesus preached and practiced and intended His disciples to continue in His name and by virtue of faith in the power of His name." Another, when questioned on the subject, said: "Jas. 5:14 and 15 is still in Holy Writ. Do not make a mistake of saying Divine healing is a Roman Catholic matter; rather, it is truly catholic."

Inquiry as to the interest in the ministry of healing in the Episcopal churches shows that all the ministers are not interested. Some frankly refuse to have the office of anointing, while others, like most ministers in other Protestant churches, are bound by the theology that God has a purpose in sending and prolonging sickness, and surrender the field entirely to the doctors and surgeons, limiting themselves with the funeral when the former have failed. Many are totally unfamiliar with the methods, and in consequence are incapacitated for the work. Others state that they are not interested, as they believe that "the age of miracles is past," and do not care to "imitate Christian Science." The Rev. Dr. Colladay, dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, has what he calls a little service of special intercession for the sick, when he lays hands on those who come forward every Wednesday morning in the cathedral, followed by a celebration of the communion. Dean Colladay says that he has understood that Mr. Hickson is at the present time somewhere in the Orient.

It must be fully understood that there is no quackery about that which is essentially a religious service. The laying on of hands has no electric or "electronic" quality, and whatever may or may not be true as to the "magnetic" or "electric touch," the religious service has nothing whatever to do with it. A like deduction belongs to the use of the oil. It is true that it is blessed by the Bishop, but it is not claimed that it has any magical effect, or that it is "infused" with electricity.

Another phase of "Divine healing," far and away removed from the ministry of healing, is gaining considerable vogue in certain quarters. Taking the familiar hymn, "What a Wonderful Saviour!" as its base, it maintains that Christ made atonement for disease as well as for sin. The hymn reads:

"Christ has for sin atonement made,
What a wonderful Saviour!
We are redeemed, the price is paid,
What a wonderful Saviour!"

It is sung with a vim, and the explanation is made that atonement was made for the sins of the body, which cause disease, just the same as for moral sins!

The believers support their contention by quoting as their proof text the words, "He has borne our infirmities." Resource is had to the dictionary to validate this argument.

"Isn't an infirmity a condition or state of not being physically strong?" they ask. "Isn't an infirmity a disease?"

Then, to further bear this out, they mix the Scripture with Shakespeare, and ask, "Is not Christ spoken of as the friend of sinners, and do we not read, 'A friend should bear his friends' infirmities'?"

Again, "Does it not say that, although without sin, Christ was like us? We have no need to suffer from rheumatism, the flu, tuberculosis, or any other disease if we only have a full faith, for He who took away our sin, if we have repentant faith, will just as surely take our diseases."

When a believer has a headache, a cold, or some other malady, he repeats the proof text, and maintains that the disorder disappears without medical treatment. He is his own "healer," and his strange belief is "Divine healing" in a shape altogether unique. But this is not all. If he has a full faith that the Saviour saved him from his diseases as well as from his sins, he declares this belief prophylactic, and although influenza or dyspepsia are ordinarily to be had for the asking, all he has to do is to plead that as the Lord bore his infirmities, there is no need of his having the derangements.

"Nothing can be more plain," he argues. "If I have saving faith, although I could otherwise steal, murder or blaspheme, I find no manner of temptation to do so: so although pneumonia, neuralgia or fevers are to be had readily by others, I am immune because of my faith. Just read the Bible, and see how true believers handled snakes, were exposed to terrible storms, and ate poisonous food, and never suffered for it."

This certainly beats the laying on of hands and the use of sacred oil, electric belts, horse chestnut charms, rabbits' feet, and all the other things of one kind or another that enter into the armamentarium of the "healer," and go to bear the label of "Divine healing!"

The Rev. Kenneth Mackenzie, of Westport, Conn., has recently had published a study of the modern healing movements, entitled "Our Physical Heritage in Christ," which, reviewing its genesis and growth, brings Divine healing up to date, harmonizes differences of opinion, and shows that every believer is entitled to the life which flows from the Christ. Nearly a generation ago Mr. Mackenzie wrote his "Divine Life for the Body," which has become a textbook on that corollary subject. Himself singularly healed half a century ago, the author brings to bear upon the healing movements the results of keen observation and practical searching. Bishop Brewster says: "Widely known as an expositor of the Holy Scriptures, the Rev. Mr. Mackenzie has, moreover, long devoted himself with conscientious thought and painstaking labor of research to the interesting and momentous subject, and the results of his study may well claim attention and consideration."

Is it not about time to look upon the healing problems and perplexities carefully, and with the evidence that spiritual healing is being effected, treat it honestly, and thereby get it out of the hands of charlatans who are abusing it? While Mr. Hickson's visit may have been instrumental in bringing forth the illegitimate fry, at the same time it is to be conceded that it has stressed the interest of those who have deep conviction of the movement.

A Year's Religious Progress

Religious progress is not usually marked by sudden strides over ground permanently gained. Reformation is the slow result of years, and sometimes it seems that there is no progress at all. But if our retrospection goes back far enough we can see that there has been some movement forward, and that it is capable of measurement. The last year was marked by events that show that the Christian spirit is awake and active, that interest in religion and in its works is unflagging. There were breaks and rifts, rumblings of schisms, controversies pitched in a high key. But it all shows, we are told, that religion, far from being merely a topic for Sunday discoursing, is still, as it was in the day when man first began to speculate on his origin and his fate, the subject of supreme interest. This is brought out in a casual survey by The Christian Century, which is optimistic in tone.

The most evident sign of human sympathy is the response to human need, and last year men and women of all faiths, Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, and other confessions "proved afresh that it is the members of the organized religious bodies who respond most effectively to the call for help, and to whom the appeal for the tokens of good-will is presented first and with greatest confidence." The calls from Japan, from the Near East, and from Central Europe were answered generously and effectively. A great number of churches and other buildings devoted to religious purposes were erected, and this in spite of hindering market and labor conditions. Interest in evangelism was also marked. "The attempt to revive the mass efforts, the tabernacle type, and the emotional phases of earlier years seems to be proving futile and to be giving way to a more intelligent, educational and co-operative type of evangelism." Statistics of church membership showed steady gains in most of the denominations.

Impetus was given to religious education, which has taken such forms as "the employment of educational experts as directors of religious education in Sunday Schools, either singly or in community groups; the organization of teacher-training classes under competent leaders in the same directions; the projection of week-day religious instruction, sometimes in cooperation with the public schools; and the planning of daily vacation Bible schools in available centers." It is interesting to note that the universities are gradually taking up instruction in religion and according credits for the studies so offered. It is also recorded that the secular newspapers are giving more space to matters of a religious nature, frequently through the services of religious editors, and that denominational journalism is taking a larger place in the life of the American people.—The Literary Digest.

HOW TO RUN A DIOCESAN SOCIAL SERVICE COMMISSION ON $200 A YEAR.

The following paper, read under the above title at the Toronto Conference by the Rev. Lewis N. Taylor, chairman N.-W. C. Commission on Christian Social Service in North Carolina, has such practical suggestions that can be so easily carried out in other Dioceses that we use it in full on our page this week:

How to Run a Diocesan Social Service Commission on $200 a Year.

Lewis N. Taylor, Chairman N.-W. C. Commission on Christian Social Service.

"In this paper I purpose to show what the Diocesan Commission of North Carolina on Christian Social Service accomplished with $200 last year, in the hopes that our story may suggest to others plans to meet their conditions.

We started on the theory that people cannot be asked to do anything very definite until they have a clear idea what it is all about. "Social Service" was a new phrase to many, and conveyed all sorts of different meanings. A campaign of education was the first step. Study classes were organized in several places where a member of the Commission had spoken and requested that this be done. In some instances the rectors of the various parishes did this of their own accord. The books issued by the National Department, particularly "The Social Opportunity of the Churchman," was used as a basis for the discussion. The rector at the State University during Lent gave a course of six lectures, using this book as a basis.

The good women of the Woman's Auxiliary organized the Diocese into nine different districts, each district comprising several counties. Every district held two meetings during the year, one in the spring and one in the fall. At each of these meetings Christian Social Service was presented and given a prominent place on the program. Each district had its Social Service Secretary, whose duty and ambition it was to establish a live working committee in every parish and mission in the district. The Diocesan organization had its own Diocesan Secretary, and at their annual convention the subject was presented by the Director of the Department of Public Welfare of the State, who, by the way, is a Churchman.

As a further help to the campaign of education, the Commission thought it wise to hold a conference in some central place and invite all interested clergy and laity. This conference was to be addressed by local and neighboring leaders, as well as a representative from the National Department. This conference would give us an idea of the opportunities the Diocese offered. We could then formulate a definite policy of action.

The conference was accordingly planned, and the Church at the State University at Chapel Hill was selected as the meeting place. By meeting here we could have the advantage of the presence and help of the faculty of the Department of Sociology. We invited the President of the North Carolina Conference for Social Work, who is an Episcopalian, to tell us how our Church could cooperate with the State Conference. He did in an admirable and helpful way. It happens that the head of the North Carolina Department of Public Welfare is also a member of our Church. She was asked to show us in what ways our Church could assist her department. She outlined the actual work that was being done by the county organization; mental health and hygiene (bureau for feeble-minded children); institutional supervision (for inspection, etc., of jails, county homes for the poor and aged); promotion and education (bureau for the better fitting of workers to serve the State; child welfare (for the care of delinquents under sixteen years of age). She outlined the actual work that these bureaus are doing, and stressed the fact that Church people can greatly advance the department's work in effectiveness by lending a hand in the matters of public opinion, advice, actual helpfulness and definite coordination of forces.

The Rev. Cary Montague, City Missioner of Richmond, Va., and Executive Secretary for the Department of Social Service in the Diocese of Virginia, outlined the activities of his organization, referring to the many ways of carrying gladness into hospitals, homes for the aged and poor, asylums and institutions for children. He displayed a graphic chart setting forth a great array of figures as to visits made, gifts, acts of social and individual help, etc., which convinced all present of the far-reaching possibilities of Christian service when definitely organized and properly directed.

Dean Lathrop, of the National Department of Social Service, was the last speaker. He gathered together the threads of thought for the whole day and said pertinently, "This conference has been my dream—the dream that I have had for the whole Church." He pled for the introduction of religion into every avenue of life, and gave emphasis to the words of a former speaker as to conceiving and enriching human life and bettering the conditions that surround human life everywhere.

The Executive Secretary of the Department of Social Service of the National Council said afterwards: "It was, to me, the most satisfactory conference I have yet attended, because it was carrying out exactly the program that I have been pressing for in the Church."

Those who spoke did so as ones having authority, that is, the authority of people who know whereof they speak, and they knew, because they are enlisted in the most vital and practical sort of Social Service.

Tremendous publicity was given to this conference, and expenses of all the clergy, who requested them, were paid out of our $200 fund. North Carolina is a large Diocese, geographically, extreme points being 250 miles apart. Half the clergy of the Diocese, the Bishop and one of the Archdeacons were present, and with the laymen, over 100 people gathered together for the day. Just before adjournment a committee was appointed to draw up from the findings of the meeting a definite Diocesan policy in Christian Social Service to be presented to the Diocesan Convention. This committee met shortly thereafter and drew up such a policy which included the commendation to our people for patronage and support, the Church hospitals, the Church Orphanage and other orphanages of the State, the training schools and other State institutions, placed the Church solidly behind the program of the State Welfare Department, the program of the State Conference for Social Work, and made several recommendations of a purely local nature as objects of particular interest.

The department has issued bulletins from time to time telling of certain particular things of interest, and asking for support, material and otherwise, such as the building of a chapel at the State institution for delinquent girls; report of the above conference, etc., editing a page in the Diocesan paper; working up attendance upon the State Conference, etc.

We recommend, first, that a campaign of education be put on in such a way as fits local Diocesan conditions; second, that a Diocesan conference, if feasible, be called to consider all the fields of Social Service within the Diocese that a definite working policy be worked out. Third, that the subject of Christian Social Service be kept constantly in the minds of clergy and laity by means of occasional bulletins.

With strict economy, these things can be done in a Diocese where only $200 is allotted annually for the work, and something definite can be accomplished."

THE CONFERENCE ON THE MINISTRY AT ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL

Concord, N. H.—“Really, sir, I hadn't thought a great deal about the ministry before, but I have been thinking about being a teacher for some time and now after these days we've had here I feel that if I don't go into the ministry I'd like to spend a few years at least teaching in some mission school.” Such was the remark made by one of the boys who attended the Conference on the Ministry at Concord, N. H., to one of the group leaders, as the two walked together down the hill from the Upper School after breakfast on the morning of the last day of the conference—and there were other remarks like this made to other group leaders. Such, in brief, was the most important phase of the conference held at St. Paul's School from June 23-27.

For four days some two hundred and fifteen boys and twenty-four of the younger clergy of the Church picked to be group leaders, together with three Bishops, met together to consider the claims, the opportunities and the challenge of the ministry as a vocation. The boys came from every diocese in the East, from Maine to Southern Virginia, from Pittsburgh and Erie to Rhode Island, while the leaders were chosen from dioceses even farther away. A committee composed of the Rev. R. B. Ogilby, D. D., President of Trinity College, Hartford, Conn.; the Rev. W. T. Hooper, of St. John's Church, Hartford; the Rev. S. S. Drury, D. D., Headmaster of St. Paul's School, our cordial host; the Rev. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of Grace Church, New York, and Messrs. A. Felix DuPont and Harper Sibley were in charge of the Conference. There are probably few places as well suited for such a conference as St. Paul's School, with its beautiful buildings and grounds, splendid athletic field, tennis courts and golf links, and three lakes, which give ample opportunity for swimming and canoeing, and, certainly, there could be no more considerate a host than Dr. Drury, who, with the assistance of several of the masters of the school, did all in their power to make our sojourn at St. Paul's pleasant. That their delightful hospitality was appreciated by every one was very evidently shown by the three rousing cheers which were given Dr. Drury at the closing meeting of the conference on the last night.

Perhaps the best way of describing the work of the Conference is to give an outline of the schedule followed each day. Every morning at seven o'clock a communion service (attendance voluntary) was held in the school chapel, a building which compares most favorably in every way with the best of the English college chapels. Following this service came breakfast in the great dining-hall of the Upper School, where all the meals were served. Then every member of the conference, leaders as well as boys, returned to his room where each made his bed, as is the custom of the St. Paul's boys since the war. At nine the entire conference gathered in the chapel for morning prayers, led by Dr. Drury. Then at 9:30 each leader with his group of boys, generally eight in number, went to a classroom in the Lower School building, where leader and boys alike spent a half hour in the study of the lesson for the day, after which, for an hour, which was the most important act of the conference each day, took place, the open and frank discussion of the ministry as a vocation. Most of the leaders adopted the so-called “Round Table” method. Each leader at once made clear the underlying policy of the conference, that no pledge or decision regarding life work would be asked for or accepted, thereby removing any sense of pressure that might otherwise have been detrimental to free discussion. That the boys were interested and serious in thought soon became clearly manifest by the type of questions asked, and, while some of those present may not think seriously of the ministry as a possible vocation for themselves again, yet every leader felt that at least during the four days of the conference every boy was led to think more deeply and earnestly about his future vocation in general and the ministry in particular. If the conference accomplished nothing else, it certainly did a great deal for every boy in bringing home the importance of thoughtful service for God and his fellows. At the close of the group meetings each day the entire conference then met in the big Study Hall to listen to three wonderfully fine addresses by Bishop Slattery on "The Intellectual Life of the Ministry," "The Pastoral Life of the Ministry" and "The Devotional Life of the Ministry." Certainly no one could have given a clearer or more helpful message on the practical life of the Christian minister—as valuable for the leaders as for the boys, than did Bishop Slattery.

In the afternoon from 2:00-4:30 the conference played. Under the able leadership of Mr. Haslam and Mr. Jeffries, two of the masters at St. Paul's, a schedule of baseball games, a track meet and golf and tennis tournaments were arranged. Practically every member of the conference, leaders as well as boys, took part in one or another branch of sport. Unfortunately, because of rain, the chief athletic event, the baseball game between the leaders and boys had to be given up. At a mass meeting the last night of the conference prizes were awarded to the winners and runners-up in the different events.

At five o'clock each day there was a social hour, when the whole conference group met together and partook of light refreshments, then at six everybody gathered once again in the big Study Hall to listen to three splendid, vigorous addresses, one each day, by Bishop Roberts, the Suffragan of South Dakota, who came half way across the continent to deliver these addresses on "The Priest As A Man," "The Priest As A Citizen" and "The Priest As A Priest." In strong, compelling words Bishop Roberts gave a vivid description of his fifteen years' experience as a missionary among the Indians of South Dakota. His virile personality gripped and held the boys each day and certainly many came away with a new vision of the difficulties, the triumphs and the adventure of the life of a minister on the frontier.

After dinner the conference assembled again to hear addresses, one on Tuesday evening by Canon Scott, the great Canadian war chaplain; another on Wednesday evening on "The Work of a Missionary in the Philippines," by President Ogilby, and on Thursday evening Bishop Brent was the leader in the preparation service for the Corporate Communion of the conference, held the next morning. Both of these services were held in the chapel. Bishop Brent's great appeal to the conference that last evening was centered upon the consecrated life and service of that great layman, the late Robert Hallowell Gardiner. Certainly none who heard Bishop Brent that night could help but be moved and uplifted by his powerful message. To many that service and the Corporate Communion the following morning were "the high spots" of the entire four days. Certainly there could have been no more fitting close.

To one who has been present at two of the conferences on the ministry, held during the last three years, there is nothing in the life of the Church today which seems of so great value as gatherings such as these, for, if the ministry of the Episcopal Church is to have the finest, most earnest and most consecrated men for its future leaders, as it must have, to bring in the Kingdom of God on earth. Conferences such as these must be continued and have the whole-hearted support and backing of the clergy who will send the pick of the youth of our parishes to them. The whole Church owes a great debt of gratitude to Dr. Drury and others who are looking ahead and who see the vision of the method by which the future leadership of men in the Christian life shall be assured.

Among the leaders who took part in the conference beside the members of the committee already mentioned were the following: the Rev. W. A. Lawrence, the Rev. Frederick C. Lawrence, the Rev. Charles H. Collett, the Rev. S. H. Edsall, the Rev. John H. Rosebaugh, the Rev. Allan C. Whittemore, the Rev. Francis B. Rosebro, the Rev. Louis W. Pitt, the Rev. Henry W. Hobson, the Rev. Gardiner Monks, the Rev. George E. Norton, the Rev. William E. Gardner, D. D., the Rev. A. C. Coburn, the Rev. Fleming James, the Rev. Malcolm Taylor, the Rev. Raymond Cunningham, the Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, II., and the Rev. John S. Moses.

Church Intelligence

The Italian Conference, 1924

By the Rev. Theodore Andrews.

A conference of our Italian clergy was held under the auspices of the Foreign-Born Americans Division, Department of Missions, National Council, at Eagle's Nest Farm, the Newark Diocesan Camp, at Delaware, N. J., from June 17 to 20. The peaceful beauty of the surroundings, and the intimate nature of the gathering, gave opportunity for fine fellowship and much very real mutual help and spiritual benefit. The Holy Eucharist was celebrated each morning at the little Church of Saint James in the nearby village. Daily Morning and Evening Prayer and noon-day intercessions were said. The Rev. Thomas Burgess, Secretary of the Foreign-Born Americans Division, was chairman of the conference. The Rev. Theodore Andrews, of Passaic, New Jersey, acted as secretary. The Rev. Canon Leslie, in charge of the Foreign-Born Work in the Diocese of Newark, was host and camp master.

The conference opened with a Quiet Day, conducted by Archdeacon Elliot White, in charge of Foreign-Born Work in the Diocese of Pennsylvania. It was of real help to the workers in their life as priests. All agreed that this was the most important part of the Conference and should always be part of future conferences.

The first business session was devoted to the general topic of Publications for use among Italians. The Rev. F. C. Capozzi presented the topic. Some felt the need of a scholarly yet popular work on the Church in Italian. All agreed on the need of short tracts in Italian. Deep interest was shown in a publication, "La Sentinella," which has been issued during the past two months by a few of our Italian clergy, with portions in English as well as Italian. Translations of the most suitable tracts could be published in this magazine and reprinted separately, if found acceptable. All present were united in the feeling that a common bond between Italians of our Church would be created by the development of this magazine.

The Rev. Oreste Salcini spoke of the useful pamphlets being circulated by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company and other agencies on health and civic topics, especially helpful to new arrivals in this country and those seeking citizenship.

The second session was of great importance, as the actual types of work now being done among Italians were under consideration and criticism.

The Rev. Oreste Salcini and the Rev. Nicolo Accomando spoke on "The Separate Italian Mission," and the Rev. Thomas Burgess spoke on "The Separate Mission of a Large Parish." "Diocesan Combination Work"—where the Diocese helps in furnishing an Italian general missionary and Italian workers to enable parishes to meet the problems of a changing population—was treated by the Rev. Sisto J. Noce and the Rev. Joseph Anastasi, who have been doing such work in the Dioceses of Erie and Newark, respectively. This type of work, while comparatively new, holds large possibilities and has been successful where the English-speaking congregation can be converted to a sense of fellowship and of responsibility. The Rev. Kenneth R. Forbes, of Boston, sent a very helpful paper on "Work in an Ordinary Parish Without an Italian Priest." In the discussion, it was brought out that an American priest can well reach and hold the children of Italian parents; but in order to gain those parents' confidence, he should know Italian backgrounds, and preferably be an Italian himself. The importance of having a woman worker of the right sort, where there is no Italian priest, was stressed.

The Rev. Paolo Vasquez presented the problem of "How to Put Italians into Touch with American Life." He showed how the Church can do this far better than the unsympathetic (Irish or other) "boss." The need of "contact men" in American parishes, according to the method described in the current National Council Bulletin No. 45, "How to Reach the Foreign-Born," was pointed out.

The Rev. Theodore Andrews read a paper on "Independent Catholic Movements Among Italians." Whole parishes have broken with Rome, notably in the Diocese of Newark; one of these has sought affiliation with our Church. The consensus of opinion was that this might prove a big movement, but that it was full of difficulties.

At the third session, the "Training of Italian Clergy" was discussed, beginning with a very helpful paper sent to the Conference by the Rev. Melville K. Bailey. In the discussion, the difficulty of supporting Italian candidates was pointed out, and the vexing question of how to deal with applicants for our ministry from the Roman and Protestant bodies. It was felt that both types ought to be tested out; whereas at the present time a Roman priest can be admitted very easily—almost too easily. The idea of a hostel for these candidates, from both sides, was mentioned.

The Rev. Louis Lops read a deeply spiritual paper on "The Value and Qualifications of Women Workers." He emphasized the unrest among young women and girls of Italian parentage and the need of interpreting these girls to their old-fashioned Italian mothers. All said that women workers were greatly needed; but they must have the Church point of view and not be simply social service workers. Also suitable Italian girls should be found and trained. It was considered ideal, if some Sisterhood could be persuaded to specialize on work among Italians.

The Rev. Joseph A. Racioppi presented a paper on "Italian Parish Societies," emphasizing the need of societies for young men with an American leader.

At the final session, the following resolutions were adopted in addition to resolutions of sympathy to those who were absent because of bereavement and illness in their families:

(1) Resolved, That the Italian Conference be held from year to year, meeting preferably in the different parishes and missions where Italian work is carried on;

(2) Resolved, That the Seminaries and Deaconess Training Schools be urged to undertake special courses for the training of students for work among the foreign-born, especially Italians, including study of racial and ecclesiastical backgrounds, language and literature;

(3) Resolved, That this Conference approve of the magazine, "La Sentinella," now being published by the Italian Priests' Fellowship, and respectfully ask the National Council and the Bishops having Italian work under their jurisdiction to share with them its financial support;

(4) Resolved, That the Foreign-Born Americans Division be requested to publish tracts for the use of Italians, which shall be translations of existing tracts in English;

(5) Resolved, That the National Council be asked to provide financial assistance for the collegiate and theological education of young men of Italian race in preparation for Church work among their own people;

(6) Resolved, That every Italian Roman priest and Protestant minister desiring to be received or ordained into the ministry of this Church to be given his year of probation with an Italian priest;

(7) Resolved, That the Woman's Auxiliary be made acquainted with the great need of women workers among Italians, and that it is urged that this need be considered in making appropriations from the United Offering;

(8) Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Conference that work among Italians can be done in an ordinary American Parish along the lines suggested by the Rev. Kenneth R. Forbes' paper and the results of our discussion thereon;

(9) Resolved, That we desire to state to the Church that we are continuing the practice—universal among our Italian missions—of the use of the English language in at least half our services and that our purpose is not the establishment of Italian, but American, Parishes.

The Conference adjourned at 11:30 A. M. Friday with a closing thanksgiving and intercessions. It is planned to print the proceedings and prepared papers, so they may be available for all doing or interested in Italian work.

There was a fine spirit of fellowship and forbearance among the clergy present, and all felt that this Conference marked a real step forward in the unifying and strengthening of our work among Italians.

Election of the Bishop of Florida.

Word has just been received of the election of the Rev. Frederic A. Juhan, rector of Christ Church, Greenville, S. C., to the Bishopric of Florida. Mr. Juhan was nominated by the Rev. C. A. Ashby, of Jacksonville, Florida.

Death of Bishop Bliss.

The death of the Rt. Rev. George Y. Bliss, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Vermont, occurred, after a long illness, on Wednesday, July 9. The burial day was Saturday, July 12. An early celebration was held at St. Paul's Church, Burlington, for the members of the family, after which the body lay in state until 10:30 in St. Paul's Church, of which Bishop Bliss was rector for sixteen years. Only the members of the late Bishop's family and the clergymen were present at the interment, which was made at Lake View cemetery.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

St. James' Church, Leesburg, did an unusual thing when, through the decision of its vestry it decided to hold its evening service on the Courthouse lawn during the summer months, and to invite the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist Churches to join with them and make it a community service.

That was in June, 1921. The services were so immensely successful and attracted such large congregations that the Chamber of Commerce became interested, and the next summer they appropriated a fund to buy folding chairs, and to build a platform in front of the Courthouse for the preachers.

Besides that they underwrote the services to the extent of twenty-five dollars a Sunday to be paid the speaker of the evening.

Each Church is responsible for securing a preacher on the four successive Sundays of the month.

People drive in from all over the country, and on pleasant nights the congregations are tremendous, many sitting in their automobiles which are parked around the green. The choirs from all the churches combine and each minister takes some part in the service, which is very informal.

Meeting of the Colored Convocation.

The annual meeting of the Convocation of the Colored Missionary Jurisdiction of the Diocese of Virginia was held in St. Philip's Church, Richmond, on Tuesday and Wednesday, July 8 and 9. The Convocation sermon was preached on Tuesday morning by the Rev. W. E. Cox, rector of Holy Comforter Church, Richmond, and the Communion was celebrated by the Rev. J. F. Ribble, D. D., and the Dean, the Rev. Junius L. Taylor, D. D., in the unavoidable absence of Bishop Brown.

At the evening service an address was made by Archdeacon James S. Russell, of St. Paul's School, Lawrenceville, Archdeacon of the Colored World in the Diocese of Southern Virginia. The sermon on Wednesday was preached by the Rev. Professor J. C. Mayne, of the Bishop Payne Divinity School.

Encouraging reports were made by all of the colored clergy and representatives from vacant parishes. The following officers were elected: the Rev.

Charles L. Somers, rector of John Moncre Memorial Church, rector, President; Mr. Aston Hamilton, Richmond, Secretary; Mr. O. G. Conn, Charlottesville, Treasurer; Rev. Charles L. Somers, and the Rev. Edward Ellis, Jr., as clerical delegates, and Mr. O. G. Conn and Mr. Robert Hemsley as lay delegates to the Council of the Diocese.

The Convocational Board of Religious Education was reelected, as follows:

The Rev. J. L. Taylor, John H. Scott, Professor John R. Mayne and Dr. D. O. Fergusson and Mrs. Edward Ellis, Jr. The Convocation decided to send a number of delegates, ten if possible, to the Annual Summer School for Colored Church Workers to be held at St. Paul's School, Lawrenceville, from July 21 to 31. The expense of sending these delegates will be shared by the delegates of the local Sunday Schools and the Convocation itself.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Colored Convocation was held on Wednesday morning, with Miss Louisa T. Davis, President of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, presiding. Every Colored congregation in the Diocese has either a Woman's Auxiliary or a Junior Auxiliary, and reports were made, showing the active interest that is taken by every congregation in the work.

Pledges were made by the branches for the coming year for work in Haiti, Liberia, and St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School.

The newest venture in the Colored work in the Diocese has been the undertaking of work at West Point. A survey of the community by the Rev. Junius L. Taylor of Richmond showed that among the nearly one thousand Colored people living in West Point, there was only one congregation which reaches about two hundred of the people. Strong desire was shown on the part of a good many Colored people to have the Episcopal Church establish a Mission in the community. We have one Colored communicant in West Point, W. R. Bowie, the Principal of the Colored High School, and a lieutenant in the Overseas Service of the American Expeditionary Forces during the Great War. An abandoned Colored Church has been secured in West Point, and repairs are now being made to fit it for use.

Several services have been held and it is planned to start religious services as soon as the repairs on the church are completed. The work will be under the charge of the Rev. Junius L. Taylor, Richmond, assisted by Mr. Aston Hamilton, a recent graduate of the Bishop Payne Divinity School, at Petersburg.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Christ Church, Warm Springs.

This is a "seasonal" church, being open only during the summer in each year, usually beginning with the first Sunday in July. There is no regular rector in charge, but services are conducted by various visiting clergymen who come for different times during the season.

For a number of years the late Dr. James G. Minnigerode, of Louisville, Kentucky, has taken the church for one month in each season; being greatly beloved by the people. This summer there was no minister available for the first Sunday in July. On the second Sunday the Rev. E. H. Ward, D. D., of St. Luke's Church, Hot Springs, Va., preached in the afternoon. For the last two Sundays in July the clergyman will be the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., rector of St. Mark's Church, Richmond, Va.

During the month of August the Rev. Edwin R. Carter, D. D., rector of Grace Church, Petersburg, Va., will take charge.

Owing to its temporary character, Christ Church is not organized as a regular parish. Miss Julia M. Atkinson, of Staunton, who spends each summer at "The Warm" is treasurer of the church.

St. John's-in-the-Mountains: Some months ago these notes contained reference to the fact that the Teachers' Home at St. John's-in-the-Mountains, Endicott, in Franklin County, had been moved to a much more attractive location on the grounds and had been added to and improved in other ways. Through the generosity of Mrs. Alice E. Smith, of Chicago, and a friend of hers in Ohio, a well has been bored and a pump installed at a cost of several hundred dollars, and other means provided for the comfort of the workers. Miss Ora Harrison and Miss Lydia A. Newland and such assistants as they may have from time to time.

Mrs. Smith became attracted to St. John's about two years ago, through correspondence. She has since visited the mission several times and has, in a number of practical ways, evidenced her great interest in the work among the people in this part of the Virginia mountains.

Social Service Work in Wythe County: In the country near Wytheville is a group of missions where activities of especially interesting nature are being carried on. The three churches are, St. Andrew's, at Ivanhoe; St. Barnabas, in the "Piney" neighborhood, a few miles from Ivanhoe, and a mission at Byllesby. While the three points are generally spoken of together as "The Wythe County Missions," Byllesby is just across the county line, being the only mission of the Episcopal Church in Carroll County.

Mrs. William Wilkins is in charge of the work at Ivanhoe and "Piney." At Ivanhoe she conducts two sewing classes, one for beginners and the other for the larger girls. Also there is Sunday School every Sunday afternoon.

At "Piney" is a large and convenient community house where classes in cooking, sewing, basket and rug and carpet weaving are doing excellent work. Mrs. Wilkins also cooperates in every possible way in the work of the County Red Cross Nurse, who conducts at the community house a most valuable class in "Nursing and the care of the Sick," and, with Dr. W. T. Graham of Richmond, who has done a wonderful work in the holding of orthopedic clinics for the children in Wythe County.

Of especial interest in connection with these missions is the great financial help Mrs. Wilkins is receiving from friends in the North. The Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese of Michigan some time ago proposed to establish, in honor of Mrs. Anne Shipman Stevens of Detroit, for nearly twenty years President of the Auxiliary, a "scholarship to be assigned for the benefit of a student from this neighborhood. As the most effective way of using the funds, Mrs. Wilkins obtained permission to contribute the money for the purpose of making possible an extension of the term of the local public school from six months to nine months, and making it an "accredited" school.

Thus it is seen that this mission work of our Church is a valuable factor in the promotion of the welfare of the community.

At Byllesby the chief activities are confined to the Sunday School, which is conducted by local people every Sunday morning in a hall owned by the Appalachian Power Company. A leader in this work is Mrs. Bernard C. Ward. Here is also a branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, which meets monthly.

These missions are under the general supervision of the Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey, rector of St. John's Church, Wytheville.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan.

Grace Church Chimes to Have Five New Bells; Silent for the First Time in Years.

For the first day in many years the chimes in Grace Episcopal Church, Broadway and Tenth Street, did not ring July 13. The Sunday silence in that neighborhood seemed strange. The old chimes will no longer call the people to worship at the Sunday and daily noon services.

Workmen from the Meneely Bell Company will remove the eleven chimes now in the steeple to their foundry in Troy, N. Y., this week. Here they will be thoroughly modernized and five new bells added.

The new chimes will all be memorials as are the old ones. It is said that when the bells are installed, which is expected to be by Christmas, they will equal or excel in musical efficiency any chime in existence.

A single church bell will be placed in the belfry for tolling purposes while the chime is being remade. Edward L. Kehn, the dean of the bell-ringing profession, will direct the lowering of the eleven bells through one of the south windows of the spire. Mr. Kehn has made many notable installations of bells, including that of the huge Westminster peal in the Metropolitan Tower, which are the world's highest bells.

The Year Book of the Parish of Trinity Church, New York City, has just been issued.

In his annual statement, the rector, the Rev. Caleb R. Stetson, D. D., calls attention to the period of general unsettlement in every department of life through which we have passed, and goes on to say:

"It is becoming evident that this period of unsettlement is nearing an end, and that the inevitable reaction is beginning. It is certain that there is today a very keen and widespread interest in religion. Never in the life time of most of us has so much attention been given by the public press to religious matters and to theological discussion. This, in itself is significant. Though it is possible that much harm has been done and that many have been estranged from any Church affiliation by the theological controversies which have marked the past two or three years, on the other hand, the great mass of Church people have been led to examine for themselves the grounds for their belief, and as a consequence have been stirred to a deeper loyalty to the Christian faith and to a more serious devotion to the Church. The differences between Christian and non-Christian are growing in importance as they are more clearly known. We no longer consider definite religious faith a matter of slight consequence, for it is at last seen that sound and true faith makes for right conduct. It may be that their is a widening gulf between those who are indifferent and agnostic, and the Church. But on the other hand those who have learned to love God and are loyal to our Blessed Lord are finding a bond of fellowship in Him and are drawing closer together."

In Trinity Parish there is evidence of new and vigorous religious life. This is borne out by large confirmation classes, and increased attendance at the services for business people held on weekdays in Trinity Church and St. Paul's Chapel. It is especially interesting to note that there are twelve members of the parish studying for Holy Orders.

There is reference to certain special services held in Trinity Church, particularly the memorial services for President Harding and ex-President Wilson, and the service for the dedication of the new organs in Trinity Church. These organs are regarded by many people as the finest church organs in the United States.

Dt. Stetson reviews at some length the changes at St. Cornelius' Chapel, Governors Island, necessitated by the retirement of Chaplain Edmund Banks Smith, D. D. In 1868, Governors Island was dropped from the list of army posts for which chaplains were commissioned, and since that time Trinity Parish has maintained a chapel on Governors Island, and supported a chaplain there. Under this new arrangement, the relation of Trinity Parish to the spiritual welfare of the officers and men is as close as it has been in the past.

There is also a statement of the reasons for the demolition of St. Chrysostom's Chapel, Thirty-ninth Street and Seventh Avenue. An exhaustive survey of the whole neighborhood was made, and it was definitely established that the location of the Chapel was not favorable for any work which it was fitted to undertake as it was surrounded by loft and business buildings and theatres.

The offerings in the several congregations of the parish for benevolences and Church extension amounted to $150,501.65—and this does not include gifts and contributions made through the many societies and organizations of the parish. The appropriations by the vestry for benevolences outside the parish amounted to $87,907.83—making a total of contributions for missionary, charitable and educational purposes of $238,409.48.

The total number of communicants reported in the parish is 9,205 Sunday-school children and teachers, 2,600. There have been 314 baptisms, 318 confirmed, and 448 marriages.

Trinity Parish finds its property steadily increasing in value, due to good management, and the growth of New York. Its income producing property is now estimated at $13,329,000 in value, and its income is greater now than ever before. It was $1,248,681. Only a few years ago it just went over the $1,000,000 line. Such is not income from parish church or chapels, or from the people. These run some $140,000 a year, but it is to be remembered that Trinity is not the New York parish of wealth. Rather, it is that of the missionary and of the working classes.

The large item of expense on the religious side of the parish is $88,000 a year paid to ministers in salaries. Music in church and all chapels cost more than $50,000 a year, and there are always expenses for new organs, and for repairs to expensive windows and other fixtures. Last year, when a new home for the rector was purchased in Park Avenue, alterations in it cost $20,000.

There are in the parish 9,205 persons communicant members. The low number of children in Sunday Schools is explained by the fact that most chapels are in down-town districts, where few children live. The number is about 2,500. Twelve young men of Trinity are at the moment candidates for Holy Orders. One of the new vestrymen is Judge Thomas T. C. Crain, who recently joined with a Catholic and a Jew judge on the same bench in an appeal to people of New York to see to it that children are given religious educations. They gave as basis of appeal that ninety-nine per cent of persons brought into criminal courts of New York never had religious training, and spiritual death alone caused the moral breakdown.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D.

St. John's Church, Georgetown, has awarded the contract for the rebuilding of the tower of the church and restoring it as nearly as possible to its original form. The present tower, of more recent date, is a departure from the original and not in keeping with the structure of the rest of the building. The architects plans for the restoration of this tower have been made from an old picture which is in the possession of one of the older families of the church. The cost of the work will be about four thousand dollars.

The Rev. James H. U. Blake and Mrs. Blake have left the city and are spending the first part of their vacation in Akron, Ohio, with their son and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Vinton Blake. Later in the summer they plan to go to the mountains somewhere, probably in the neighborhood of Cumberland.

Mr. Blake is the rector of Christ Church, Georgetown, one of the oldest churches in the Diocese and one which has been in continuous use since 1818.

Already picturesque and full of interest in its architectural lines and memorial windows, certain improvements have been recently made, which have greatly enhanced its beauty. The walls have been refinished, pew cushions covered, and the wood work in sanctuary and choir darkened to harmonize with the wood in the rest of the church. These necessary improvements have made Christ Church second to none in the Diocese in beauty of its interior.

Rt. Rev. J. B. Chesbro, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. A. Fonick, D. D., Coadjutor.
Rt. Rev. E. B. Delaney, D. D., Suffragan.

From Sunday night, July 13, to Friday, July 18, an open-air preaching mission was conducted on the lawn of the Chapel of Hope, Seventeenth and Caldwell Streets, by the Rev. D. Harding Hughes, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Greensboro, N. C. In preparation of this mission prayer services were conducted in various parts of the community by the Rev. L. R. Anschutz, in charge of the Chapel of Hope. As a result of such preparation the mission was well attended. Many requests for prayer were made and questions answered. The Chapel of Hope congregation feel that the work of the Chapel and the whole community will be abundantly blessed by the good work and splendid sermons preached by Mr. Hughes.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Wyatt Brown, D. D., rector of St. Michael and All Angels Church, Baltimore, has been advised of his appointment as Associate Secretary of the Field Department of the National Council of the Episcopal Church, which is the administrative organization of the Church in the United States. It is through the Field Department that the work of Church promotion is conducted throughout the country, largely by traveling secretaries who address meetings and conduct conferences outlined. The efforts of these secretaries calls for broad knowledge of church affairs and in general a high order of ability, and the post is one of honor.

Dr. Brown is one of twenty-five leading clergymen and laymen of the Episcopal Church who have been designated as associate secretaries in various parts of the country in connection with a renewed effort which will be inaugurated next Fall by the Church in the interests of peace, good citizenship and practical religion generally.

Acceptance of the honor by Dr. Brown will not involve relinquishment of his duties here, as the service he will be called upon to render will involve an absence from his post of a maximum of thirty days at various periods through the year, always with the approval of the vestry of his Church.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Bishop.

The conference for educational workers of the Diocese of Dallas was held at Dallas, Texas, June 8-14.

Those of the conference who lived outside of Dallas were housed at the beautiful college founded by Bishop Garrett, Saint Mary's.

There were over one hundred persons in attendance—fifty-six being cared for at the school.

Courses in the history of the Prayer Book were given by Bishop Moore. Bible study by the Rev. Elmer N. Schmuck, of St. Mark's Church, Denver. Church School Ideals, by Miss Mabel Lee Cooper, of New York. Young People's Work, Dear Chalmers, of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas. Woman's Auxiliary, by Mrs. Taber, New York; Church History, the Rev. Bertram Smith, Dallas.

An especially interesting course under the direction of the Rev. E. C. Snowden, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Dallas, was the Social Service Course.

For a daily lecturer, the guests had Dr. H. C. Gosline, head of the Child's Guidance Clinic, Dallas. Dallas has the proud distinction of being one of the three cities of the United States that has such a clinic.

A course in Church Music, under Mr. Carl Weisman, organist at St. Matthew's Cathedral, was thoroughly enjoyed. Mr. Weisman, being considered one of the masters of pipe organ in the United States.

Lectures on Church Vestments, pageantry, etc., were given by experts.

An unusual feature of the conference was a display of the hand work of the Church Schools of several parishes of the diocese.

Everything that could be done by the Church people in Dallas to make the conference a success was done. Swimming parties, wiener roast, auto drive, theatre party and finally "stunt night" helped to enliven those in attendance.

This was the first conference of its kind ever held in the Diocese of Dallas, and it was pronounced one of the most successful summer schools ever held. All the visitors are looking forward to another delightful affair in 1924.

FLORIDA.

Desiring to have a suitable memorial to the Rt. Rev. William Crane Gray, D. D., first Bishop of what is now the Diocese of South Florida, in the new Cathedral soon to be erected in Orlando, Florida, a fund for this purpose has been started. St. Mary's Chapter of the Daughters of the King in the Cathedral parish being put in charge thereof.

It is hoped that such memorial will represent the loving thought of many friends of this beloved Bishop, both within and without the diocese, where for twenty-one years he gave himself unstintingly in devoted and consecrated service for Christ.

The special committee appointed from the Daughters of the King consists of Miss Corinne Robinson, Deaconess Parkhill and Mrs. L. C. Massey, all of Orlando.

No decision has been made as to the form of this memorial, but it is hoped that a fund of over $600 will be given to provide a memorial which shall attest in some degree the love which Bishop Gray held and the gratitude felt for the help and blessing shed throughout his life of beautiful service.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Diocese of Alabama is giving to the General Church one of its very best leaders in the development of the Church's Program in this diocese in the person of the Rev. Middleton S. Barnwell, rector of the Church of the Advent, Birmingham, who has resigned his parish in order to accept an appointment from the National Council as Field Secretary. The Rev. Mr. Barnwell has adopted enthusiastically the methods of the National Council in his parish, with the result last year the Church of the Advent pledged and paid eight thousand, two hundred and sixty-two dollars ($8,262) for the Church's Program, and for this year pledged nine thousand, five hundred and fifty-three dollars and seventy-five cents ($9,553.75). These financial returns resulted from thorough organization of the parish according to the group system, and from using every means provided by the National Council and the diocese for informing the congregation. It was accompanied by the usual phenomenon of largely increased giving for parish purposes, including last year the erection of a fifty thousand dollar ($50,000) addition to the parish house thoroughly equipped for modern Church School work.

The diocese has made extensive use of the Rev. Mr. Barnwell's eloquence and earnestness in carrying the Church Program into other congregations, and will greatly miss his able assistance this coming fall, but rejoices to learn that his successor, the Rev. Charles Clingman, rector of Trinity Church, Houston, Texas, possesses the same winning enthusiasm for the Church's Program, and has done in Texas work similar to that of Mr. Barnwell in Alabama, and is looking forward to Mr. Clingman's coming as being full of promise for a successful continuance of the splendid work in the Church of the Advent and throughout the diocese.

The Rev. Mr. Barnwell takes up his work as Field Secretary September 1, and the Rev. Mr. Clingman takes charge of the Church of the Advent, Birmingham, October 1.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Coadjutor.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. John H. Dickinson, St. Barnabas' Church, Reading, has resigned and has accepted the unanimous call of St. Peter's vestry of our only church in Hazleton. He begins his work in October.

Mr. Dickinson has done splendid work while at St. Barnabas. He made the mission into a self-supporting parish, brought and almost paid for a rectory, and at the same time ministered most faithfully at the sanatorium for the tubercular at Hamburg.

The Rev. Arthur J. Glazier, rector of Trinity Church, Bethlehem and chaplain of the Bethlehem Preparatory School, resigned his parish to take effect on September 1, 1924. He will move with his family to Plainsfield, N. J. Mr. Glazier will be employed in public speaking for various objects. Bethlehem and all his friends are sorry that the Church will lose so able a preacher. Trinity has progressed splendidly under his administration. A very useful and commodious parish house was built during his rectorship.

Lay Activity.

The Laymen's Association of the Wyoming Valley at their last meeting looked upon the fields in their immediate neighborhood and found them white to harvest. In the last twenty-five years only one new mission was started in this section, including Wilkes-Barre, the two Pittstons, Kingston, Plymouth, Nanticoke and Alden, while the population has more than doubled. Three committees were appointed: (a) To make a survey of the unoccupied towns and find out whether there is need for a Sunday School in the place as a beginning; (b) To get the men to conduct the schools—to open them wherever the committee may recommend that one shall be started; (c) To secure the financial aid necessary to start and equip the work in the different places. Only Sunday Schools will be started now, later they hope missions will develop.

Under the auspices of the Laymen's League for Increased Lay Activity, the Lay Readers of Reading are supplying a number of parishes and missions in Reading and vicinity during the summer months, going as far as St. Thomas' Church, Morgantown. Usually a different man is sent every Sunday. The congregations enjoy the free-will services of these men. They say it is much better than to close the church or the mission while the rector is on his vacation.

CONNECTICUT.

Rt. Rev. C. B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. C. Acheson, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. Hiram Stone Born July 25, 1824.

The first Missionary of the Episcopal Church sent to Kansas and one of the earliest graduates of the Berkeley Divinity School, was the Rev. Hiram Stone. He was born July 25, 1824, at Bantam in Litchfield, Connecticut, in which place the earlier and the later years of his life were spent. Friends have in mind a public service in the early Autumn, when the story of his interesting life and work may be called to remembrance. It is fitting, however, that the main facts of his life should be recorded on the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. He was ordained Deacon by Bishop Brownell at Hartford on October 2, 1853, and Priest by Bishop Williams in the following year. He first served in South Glastenburgh and Essex.

In 1855 he was sent as a Missionary by the General Board of Missions to Leavenworth City, Kansas, his support provided for by St. Paul's Church, New Haven, Conn. This was the first Episcopal Church in that great section of the country and it bears still the name of the New Haven Parish. Four years later, he became the Post Chaplain at Fort Leavenworth, where he had officiated frequently. He was in Kansas in very stirring times as his journals show, and this brought him into relation with many officers who were to be of national reputation. Later he was assigned to Fort Sully, and served also at Fort Totten and Fort Wadsworth, Dakota.

Broken health sent him back to New England in 1876, and, until 1903, he had charge of the churches at Bantam and Milton in Connecticut. He died April 3, 1911, and is remembered with the greatest regard by all those who knew him and his work.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. J. P. Tyler, D. D., Bishop.

The fortieth annual Convocation of the Missionary District of North Dakota was held at St. George's Church, Bismarck, June 15, 16, 17—the first time since 1892 to convene in the Capital City, and was one of the best ever held in the District.

One of the outstanding features of this Convocation was the special spiritual message brought to the gathering by the Rev. Douglas Matthews of Billings, Montana, with special emphasis on Spiritual Healing.

The other speaker from outside the District was Mrs. G. H. Prince, of Minneapolis, member of the National Executive Board of the Woman's Auxiliary.

There was a good attendance of delegates, seven of them being from the Indian congregations.

Bishop Tyler in his annual address revealed a very healthy growth in the work in the District, and made a strong plea for greater effort in all departments during the coming year, making several recommendations to Convocation for consideration.

Following along the lines of the Bishop's recommendations, resolutions were adopted on—The whole question of adult classes in Bible Study and Church History, The Family Altar, Conducting parochial missions in each parish and mission in the fall, Regret at the resignation of the District Treasurer, Mr. C. D. Lord, who for many, many years has rendered faithful and valued services to the Church; that, the Episcopal Church in North Dakota place itself on record as supporting the spirit and letter of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, calling upon the people loyally to respect constitutional government; Urging the people of the Church in North Dakota to back all movements and efforts looking toward the abolishment of war; That, the Episcopal Church in the District of North Dakota commend the plan of President Coolidge for the participation of the United States in the World Court.

Delegates elected to the Provincial Synod at Omaha this fall were: The Rev. George H. Swift, the Rev. C. W. Baxter, the Ven. A. E. H. Martyr. Alternates: the Rev. N. E. Elsworth, the Rev. Joseph E. Ryerson, the Very Rev. H. Cowley-Carroll.

The second gathering of the Girls' Friendly forces in North Dakota held in conjunction with the annual convocation at St. George's Church, Bismarck, on June 14, marked an important step in the life of the work of the Church in the District.

The steady but normal growth of the Society in North Dakota made possible the forming of a District organization with the following officers of the Council appointed by Bishop Tyler and confirmed by the delegates: Honorary President, Mrs. J. P. Tyler, Fargo; President, Mrs. C. C. Gowran, Grand Forks; Vice-President, Mrs. J. E. Featherstone, Valley City; Secretary-Treasurer, Mrs. Homer R. Harrington, Fargo. Heads of Departments: Candidates Mrs. W. H. Temple, McClusky; Commendation, Miss Edith Currie, Park River; Literature, Miss Eva B. Ely, Rugby; Missions, Miss Lucy Gibbs, Fargo; Social Service, Mrs. C. D. Blakeslee, Fargo.

Really remarkable exhibits of the work done by the girls during the year were made, covering three long tables in one room of the parish house, while the walls were covered with wonderful charts, showing work in the five fields—screens draped with quilts and worthy of special mention was the model of the ruins of the old Day Nursery at Kyoto, Japan, and the New Nursery, and in a sand table a model of Christ School, Arden, North Carolina, both of which causes the whole G. F. S. is working for. Fine and interesting reports were made from all the twenty branches and nineteen candidates classes. A "Demonstration Girls' Friendly Society Meeting" led by two little girls, seven and eight years old, of the Candidates' Class of the McClusky Branch, held the audience thrilled and spell-bound with their charming self-possession and efficiency, as they conducted the meeting along parliamentary lines in a way not to be excelled by any grown-ups, and demonstrating what this Society could mean in the lives of seventeen little girls in an isolated prairie town, under the leadership of an efficient, consecrated Associate.

TRUST.

W. B. Lydenberg.

My child (it was the voice of God) I know
Your needs and grant them all—the measure of
The grace in store for you cannot be seen
With eye of flesh, but with the eye of faith.
O fret not for the morrow—that is Mine;
And Mine, the silent hour of death's approach;
And Mine, the burden of eternity;
Forget yourself, and lean a while on Me.
Unworthy I, to seek in things below
What comes in gracious plenty from on high!
Does not the silver stream of youth still flow
For those who linger 'neath its golden sky?
Be still then, restless heart, and simply know
God will provide. Unworthy, thankless I!

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

Before the Feast.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

Tuesday night Our Lord slept at Bethany. Wednesday He kept the eleven with Him at Bethany and sent Judas to buy the lambs Judas took it to the Temple, and there learned of the meeting of the Chief Priests. He must have been alone, for he was free to arrange for the betrayal. He then brought the lamb to Bethany or left it with some friend in the city. As soon as Judas knew, three or four hours ahead, just where Our Lord would be at night, he would bring up the Temple guard and have the arrest made. Our Lord did not choose to be disturbed during the Passover feast, so provided that Judas should not know the place. The sign of the man carrying the pitcher is not miraculous. Our Lord never used unnecessary miracles. The house, according to the overwhelming consensus of comment, was that of John Mark's father. The man was a servant of the house and undoubtedly knew the Apostles by sight. By previous arrangement with John Mark, the servant waited at the city gate on the Bethany Road until Peter and John came, and then went on ahead of them. The little savor of mystery seems merely to prevent Judas knowing the place in time to interrupt the Supper.

Inference that the house was John Mark's depends on events during the arrest. Inference that the Apostles who prepared the room were Peter and John depends on the places they are recorded as occupying at supper. Every citizen held himself ready to lend a room for a Passover Feast. Edersheim says it was regarded as disgraceful to refuse, or to take money for it. He therefore infers that the father of John Mark had received no definite request from Our Lord, but hoped He would come. To us it seems that Our Lord had borrowed the room and arranged for the guide foreseeing the necessity of keeping secret the place of his Passover. That He miraculously foresaw the presence of the servant at the gate when a word or two at a personal interview would have arranged it, we doubt.

Our Lord told the Disciples to ask for a hall, the open courtyard or "Patio" of a house, for Him and the twelve alone. He said "My" hall, which seems to imply previous arrangement. Passover companies often supped two or three together in the same hall. He knew, however, that the Master of the House would give his best; the exclusive use of the upper guest-chamber, reached by an outside stairway to the roof. It would be furnished and ready. It would have one large or three small trestle-work tables and a number of couches. In Our Lord's day the Passover meal was composed of much beside the lamb, the bread and the wine. The host would probably provide everything except the lamb, which the Apostles brought with them.

Having arranged for the cooking the two would take the lamb to the Temple and have it killed. Returning, they would see to its preparation. The mistress of the house had some female servant roast it for them. This is an inference, but safe, and not without its symbolism. We know the name of the mistress of the house. It was Mary. We know the name of her servant. It was Rhoda. Authorities differ as to the exact fare of the Passover meal. Perhaps there was some variation in custom. There must be the Passover lamb, roasted, there must be unleavened bread, there must be wine. These were carefully regulated by law. There were also bitter herbs, a dish of salt water and vinegar, and another of nuts, raisins and apples, chopped fine, to dip the herbs in.

The wine was ordinary red wine of the country. The modern theory that it was unfemented grape-juice is not taken seriously by students. It was mixed with water, generally two parts of water to one of wine. The statement that it was unmixed, passionately advocated by the opponents of the mingled chalice, cannot stand against the rubrical directions for the Passover. There were four cups. Their dimensions were carefully ordered. They were eight inches across and seven inches high. Western Christendom has substituted a deep chalice for this broad bowl, often puts no water with the wine, sometimes uses leavened bread, but these points are not in doubt, for they were regulated by law and we have the law.

At table were thirteen persons. The positions of four were recorded. John lay at Jesus' breast. Judas was within reach of Jesus hand and dipped in the dish with Him, and Peter could signal to John and ask him a question without attracting Judas' attention. We know the two ordinary shapes of table used by the Jews of this era and the law that, at the Passover meal all, even the poorest, must recline to symbolize ease and safety; for the same reason that, before they reached the Promised Land, they ate standing, to symbolize haste. It is probable that Our Lord and the Twelve could not, in this instance, have reclined around a table shaped like a horseshoe. There was no motive for the use of such a table, for there were no servants present to move on the inside of the horseshoe and serve the guests. Probably they used both sides and one end of a long table. Certainly Peter was opposite John and near enough to signal him. John was next Jesus on one side and Judas on the other.

The Paschal lamb seems the only Old Testament sacrifice Our Lord ever offered. He seems never to have offered burnt or sin offering, and the turtle-doves offered at His presentation in the Temple were His mother's and not His own.

While the two were preparing supper the ten, with Our Lord, were in Bethany. Part of the time, of course, He held them in talk to prevent Judas following the two; but the last hours, we think, were due His mother. She knew. However, the twelve interpreted His speeches and the prophecies, whatever they thought, she knew. What He said she took literally, as did Mary of Bethany, who anointed Him for His burial. Therefore the sunset hour was due to her. No one has painted a picture of her standing on the housetop at Bethany and watching Him go to His death over the crest of the western hill against the red sunset; but by all the mother-hearts that ever throbbed, we know she stood there.

The Gifts of Native Christians.

Many think that the native Christians in mission countries ought to be doing more in the way of supporting the work, and not leaning so hard upon us here at home. Do you know that last year the contributions from natives amounted to $884,929? It took the Congregational Churches of America a hundred years to reach that amount? Even now the gifts from our churches are only about twice what the natives themselves contribute.

More than one-third of India's people earn only one cent a day. Grown men say, "I wouldn't care if I could get one good meal in two days." A "good meal" means only a quantity of black coarse bread, yet the native Christians in our fields there gave $37,000 last year.

Native Christians gave $57,000 where labor averages twenty-five cents a day.

Japan's Christians associated with us gave $180,000.

The members of the church in Kusaie, one of the Caroline Island group, sent the Board $400 last August. Those noble women, the Baldwin sisters, brought to their attention the acute need of the Board. Poor, pitifully poor, though those natives are, of their own will they made the gift. Miss Elizabeth Baldwin wrote, "Some of our dear women said to me as they put their small offerings into my hand, 'It is all that I have.'"—American Board.

"Pray Ye One For Another."

I cannot tell why there should come to me
A thought of you, friends, miles or years away,
In swift insistence on the memory,
Unless, for you, it needs be that I pray.

You go your way, I mine; we seldom meet
To talk of plans or longings, day by day;
Of pain, or pleasure, triumph or defeat,
Or special reasons why 'tis time to pray.

We are too busy even to spare thought,
For days together, of the friends away;
Perhaps God does it for us, and we ought
To heed the memory as a call to pray.

Perhaps just then that one has fiercer fight,
A more appalling weakness, a decay
Of courage, darkness, a losing hold of right—
And so, in case he needs my prayer, I pray.

Friend, do the same for me; If I intrude
In thought upon you, on some crowded day,
Give me a moment's prayer, as inter-lude—
Be very sure I need it, therefore pray.

And as you bear my name before the throne,
Perhaps, in prayer for you, I'll meet you there!
Oh, let us not neglect this holy gift—
What blessings God hath wrought thru prayer.

HOME EDUCATION."The Child's First School Is the Family."—Froebel.

(Issued by the National Kindergarten Association, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York City. These articles are appearing weekly in our columns.)

Children and the World Today.

By Florence Brewer Boeckel, Educational Director, National Council for Prevention of War.

"I don't care what you are training your children to do, but what do you think is the most important thing to teach them to be—?"

That question, from a woman whose children are brought up and established in the world, dropped into the midst of a group of mothers whose boys and girls are in the process of being brought up, threw a recent amiable tea party into dispute—and consternation.

It was soon clear that not a mother had any plan reasoned out in the light of the modern world and of what a man or woman needs to be to live usefully and happily in it. There was much talk of strength of will, of love of truth, of power of concentration, of loyalty and bravery; but of all the things that were said it was the idea of the youngest mother of them all which interested me most.

This young mother said: "If I knew how, the thing which I should like more than anything else to give my children is the power to get into real touch with all sorts and kinds of people in all parts of the earth; to feel themselves neither better nor worse than any other; to realize how much alike all people are, and still to value and enjoy all their superficial differences."

I believe it was because this mother was young that she felt accurately the great need of the world today. Year by year men are being brought closer together, having more influence and wielding more power over the lives of each other; what happens to one happens to all, and so the importance of their understanding each other, of their being able to get into real communication, grows greater. It is partly because of this that people everywhere are struggling to find out how to do away with war and establish peace. The world has become so closely knit that war is intolerably destructive. And yet, the very fact that the world is close-knit makes wars more likely, unless the spirit of men toward each other can be changed. The old attitude toward the barbarian and the foreigner must give way to a new sense of unity in a world in which no people is any longer "foreign" to another.

That mothers are coming to realize the need of children to know and feel at home in all the world is evident in the books and toys and songs that are being made for children nowadays. Each year there are more and more stories of the children of other lands, and fairy tales and games and songs of other lands.

I have even heard a sort of little international prayer for children, which runs like this:

"Father, bless all the little children who are now going to bed, and help all the little children who are now playing in the sunshine while we sleep, to have a happy day."

And not long ago I came unexpectedly to the house of a friend for dinner and was greeted at the door by her little daughter in a gay kimono, who said something which she told me meant "How do you do?" in a language I had never heard. For dinner I was fed with rice and various delicious mysteries. It turned out that I had arrived on Japanese day! From early morning this little girl had lived as nearly as she could like the little girls of Japan. She had eaten something approaching the kind of food they eat; she had learned a phrase or two of their language; she had invited her little friends to lunch and played the games of the children of Japan; and when she went to bed I listened to a delightful story in which cherry blossoms and kites were mingled. And she told me that whenever I came to her house on Saturday I should find she was some other little girl altogether. She expects that by the end of the year she will have lived around the world.

Taking hints like these from one mother here and another mother there, and with the idea of helping yet other mothers bring up their children to feel at home with any people and in any land, I have collected, as a part of the educational material of the National Council for Prevention of War, the stories, songs, pageants and games of other lands, bibliographies and collections of posters. This is a part of a catalogued folder of material which the National Council sells for one dollar, but the material for children is sent free to any one who wishes it, from the Council headquarters at 532 Seventeenth Street, N. W., Washington, D. C. Not only are we eager to send out the material which we have, but we are eager also to have criticisms and suggestions for new material, and we will put to good use any ideas that mothers who are working along this line will send us.

"The kindergarten educates the will. It leads the child to choose good in obedience to a command from within, rather than a command from without. This is the backbone of personal character, and this, with its almost synonyms, self-government and liberty under law, is the backbone of American citizenship."

If your child is not having the privilege of kindergarten training, write to the National Kindergarten Association, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York, for information and leaflets on the subject.

THE DESERT PLACES.

L. C. Cummings.

Often our lives seem to be planted alone as in a barren desert where nothing can grow. Yet we are told God can make the very desert blossom as the rose and cause springs of water to start up out of its sandy wastes.

We do not need to be transplanted into a different field, in order to yield the fruits of life, but right where we are with just the adverse circumstances surrounding us, if we have faith, God will make His sun to shine upon us, and His dew to enrich and transform our greatest hindrances into the chiefest and most blessed means of our growth.

We may rest assured, whatever our environment, that God's infinite grace will be brought to bear upon us, though seemingly the weakest of His creatures, who, with submission to His will and perfect trust in His power, work on faithfully, even in desert places, and look to Him to give the increase.

The secret of contentment in all conditions is the Word of God to those "that wait upon the Lord." The soul that waits upon the Lord is the soul that trusts and which is surrendered to him; who by spiritual sight perceives that though the valley in which his life is cast, may be shrouded in fog, the mountain tops are ablaze with the bright sunshine of hope and promise.

From the lowliest station and the humblest duties, the soul shall mount up and find a way of escape upward. "For they that wait upon the Lord and do His work shall renew their strength. They shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; and they shall walk and not faint."

Thus even the desert places of our lives may be made to blossom and bring forth good fruit; and thus may the heart that every trust forever sing and feel as though it had wings; knowing that whatever tomorrow brings, it is His will and thus is best and blest.

Where Was He?

"Is your father at home?" I asked a small child on our village doctor's doorstep.

"No," he replied; "he's away."

"Where do you think I can find him?"

"Well," he said, with a considering air, "you've got to look for some place where people are sick, or hurt, or something like that. I don't know where he is, but he's helping somewhere."

And I turned away with this little sermon in my heart. If you want to find the Lord Jesus, you've got to set out on a path of helping somewhere, of lifting somewhere, or lessening somebody's burden, and lo! straightway one like unto the Son of Man will be found at your side.—Exchange.

Help us, O Lord! with patient love to bear

Each other's faults, to suffer with true meekness;
Help us each other's joys and griefs to share,

But let us turn to Thee alone in weakness.

For the Young Folks

The Winding Road.

Each of us daily walks along
The winding road of life
Some dark, some sunny spots we find,
Some happiness, some strife.
We know not, as it winds along
Just what each turn will bring,
But all along the road we'll find
That if we laugh and sing
And to another traveler call
In happy tones and cheery,
The way will not seem near so long
Nor we so tired and weary,
And when we're near the end and feel
We can no longer roam,
We know the last turn in the road
Will bring us safely home.

The Duke of Do-Better.

The Duke of Do-Better was a boy who always had holes in his stockings. Do-Better was the name of the castle in which he lived, although why he should live in a castle by that name no one could guess. For he did not do better! No, indeed, he usually did worse.

The Duke had great trouble with his stockings. In fact, he had so much trouble that it was necessary that three women keep busy every minute. One of these women was the Royal Stocking Knitter. All day her fingers were busy with the four gold knitting needles, as she knitted the Duke's stockings. The second woman was the Royal Stocking Mender, who all day darned holes over the gold darning egg. The third woman was the Royal Wash Woman, who all day washed stockings in the gold wash-tub.

You may think it strange that the Duke needed so many stockings, but he would no sooner put on a pair of clean stockings than they would become soiled or torn from climbing the castle wall or falling into a mud puddle. So the poor Duke spent most of his time changing his stockings. Finally he thought of a good plan. He sent messengers throughout the land to place notices which read:

"Half of the Castle of Do-Better to any one who can make the Duke a pair of stockings that will not wear out or get muddy."

The kingdom was certainly a busy place after that. Never before had there been such a clicking of knitting needles in all the land.

Finally, the day came when everybody was to take the stockings they had made to the Duke. There were white stockings and black, long stockings and short, thick stockings and thin. But all these the Duke handed back, for all would wear out or get muddy.

So every one went home, except three boys. One was the son of a carpenter, the second was the son of a glass blower, and the third was the son of a gold miner.

The carpenter's boy had brought a pair of wooden stockings for the Duke. The Duke tried them on, but found them very stiff. They were heavy and more like boots than stockings, but he wore them and went out to play.

As usual, he was not gone long until he fell down in the mud. "These stockings are no good," reported the Duke. "The mud sticks to them."

So the carpenter's boy went home.

"Try my stockings," begged the glass blower's boy. "If you fall in the mud with them, walk through the waters of the fountain, and your stockings will be as clean as new ones."

"Great!" exclaimed the Duke. "They are exactly what I want."

So he put on the bootlike stockings and started forth. But soon he stubbed his toe and fell down. The glass stockings broke into a million pieces.

So the glass blower's boy went home.

Then the gold miner's little boy asked the Duke to try on the gold stockings, for dirt would not stick badly to them, and they would not tear. But they were so heavy that the Duke could not walk in them.

So the gold miner's boy went home, and the duke sat down on the castle steps and almost cried.

Suddenly some one said, "Please, Your Honor," and near the Duke stood a boy.

"I have come to tell you," explained the boy, "that there never was a pair of stockings that would not get muddy or wear out. But have you ever tried to be careful with your stockings?"

"Certainly not," replied the Duke; "why should I?"

"It might be that the Knitting Woman gets tired knitting stockings, even if she does have gold knitting needles. And the Mending Woman may grow tired darning stockings, even if she does have a gold darning egg. And the Wash Woman may be, oh, so tired washing stockings, even if she does have a gold wash-tub. If you are careful, your stockings will last twice as long, and you will not have to change them nearly so often. I have tried it, and it works."

"How can I do it?" asked the Duke.

"Why," answered the boy, "don't fall into all the mud puddles you come to, and don't climb stone walls and tear holes in your stockings."

"Great!" laughed the Duke. "I never thought of that."

"I am glad," said the boy. "Good-by."

"Oh, wait," called the Duke; "you are to live at the castle and own half of it."

"No, thanks," smiled the boy. "My own home is called Do-Better because from day to day, with everything I do, even to saving my stockings, I try to do better."—Gladys C. Carpenter.

Florence Nightingale.

One day some years ago a young girl was walking along a road by the river-side. She was Florence, the daughter of Mrs. Nightingale, who owned a beautiful home in the neighborhood. She had been born in Florence, a city in Italy, and was named for this city. Florence means flowers. Don't you think it is a pretty name?

Before she had gone very far she saw an old man, a shepherd, whom she knew well. He was sitting by the roadside and she could see that he was distressed about something.

"What is the trouble?" asked Florence. "Tell me, quickly; maybe I can help you."

"It is my dog, Miss Florence. Wicked boys have been throwing stones at him and have broken his leg. Now, my sheep are scattered all over the hill, and without the dog's help I cannot get them together."

"Poor Sandy," cried Florence, already almost in tears. "Where is he?

Let us see if we can help him."

The old man did not move. "It is no use. The poor dog is beyond your help. We can only put him out of his suffering."

"No, no!" said Florence. "Sandy must not be killed."

They found the dog lying on a bed of straw made for him by the shepherd. But he was whimpering with the pain in his leg. Florence stroked his head and spoke quietly to him so he would know she wanted to help him. Then she examined the leg.

Presently she said, "I don't believe that any bone is broken; certainly not the large one."

Then she told the shepherd to bring water and cloths. The wounded leg was soon washed clean and bandaged up.

This was the first patient of Florence Nightingale, who was afterwards known all over the world as the famous nurse of the Crimean War. She saved the lives of many wounded and sick soldiers. In every war since that time there have been other nurses who tried to follow her.

She was sometimes called the "Lady of the Lamp," because late at night she would take a lamp and go about the hospital to see that all the patients were as comfortable as possible. When the men were suffering and could not sleep they loved to see her coming with her lamp. They knew she would stop and speak and do anything she could for them.

In St. Paul's Cathedral, London, there is a monument to this famous nurse. She is shown with one arm slipped under a soldier's pillow raising up his head so he could drink from the cup of water she holds to his lips with the other hand.—Presbyterian of the South.

Mrs. Robin Goes House-Hunting.

"I don't care," pouted Mrs. Robin. "It does seem as if I might have the kind of a house that I want. It is the very first nest that we have ever built and I am sure that no house could be too fine to hold it."

"But, my dear," said her mate, much worried, "who ever heard of a bird's having a bright red house? Besides, the smell of paint might make you sick. Let us ask Mrs. Tomtit, who is making her nest in that dear little house across the way, what she thinks about the red house."

As they came closer the robins saw that Mrs. Tomtit's house was made of a small log, hollowed out, and then wired together again. There was a small hole just large enough to make a front door for the Tomtits.

"Good morning," called Mrs. Tomtit. "How lucky that you have come early before all the good houses are gone."

"Yes," said Mrs. Robin, "we thought that we would have to nest among the branches. How did there happen to be so many houses?"

"Well," said Mrs. Tomtit, "for many years my family has built a nest in a woodpecker's hole in a hollow tree which stood on this spot, but this winter the tree blew down. Robert, the little boy whose yard this is, set this house up on tall iron props just where the tree had stood, and we found it waiting when we came. Now, Harold, who lives over here," and she pointed one wing toward the house on the right, "and Jack, who lives over there," pointing toward the left, "saw Robert's birdhouse and wanted to build one too. Harold built that bright red one with a little porch and steps. What bird did he suppose would ever be senseless enough to want a house whose brightness would attract all of its enemies?"

Mrs. Robin hoped that she didn't look as foolish as she felt, and Mrs. Tomtit went on: "But wait until you see Jack's house. It certainly is a model."

They all flew over into the next yard and saw a house made of plain boards, high up in the apple tree.

"See how the roof slopes to shed rain," explained Mrs. Tomtit. "Jack has even remembered to put a broad piece of tin around the trunk of the tree as protection against cats."

The robins set up housekeeping in Jack's house and soon had some warm bedding in the form of a nest. While she was sitting on her eggs, Mrs. Robin just couldn't help casting longing glances at the pretty red house, but as the season wore on and it was still for rent, she saw that no bird would be so unwise as to risk their lives of her babies just for show.

One day when she was flying home with a nice, fat caterpillar for her little ones, Mrs. Robin saw a wicked-looking cat standing on the roof of the red house, and her heart beat fast until she reached her own snug home and saw every one of her babies safe and sound, waiting for her with their mouths open.

"How glad I am that we chose this dear little brown house!" she said. "It has made such a safe home."—Christian Observer.

Madam Robins Afternoon Tea.

One afternoon
In the heart of June—
The very brightest, bluest weather—
Some of the songbirds came together,
They met at Madam Robin's, you see,
In the top of a breezy maple tree,
For she'd asked them to an early tea.

All were dressed
In their very best;
Mr. Jay wore an azure vest;
Mrs. Sparrow and Lady Wren,
The one in brown and the one in yellow,

Sluttered merrily in, and then Came Sir Bobolink—jolly fellow!
Timid Miss Phoebe and pert Miss Thrush
Followed Lord Oriole spick and sprightly;

Next the Finches with rustle and rush,
And Parson Blackbird beaming brightly.

And there were others, a score—
Or more,
All in the very merriest mood, too;
And there arose such a patter,
And chatter, and clatter,
That those not invited
Were soon quite affrighted,
For nobody knew what on earth was the matter,
Or what such a babel of talk could allude to.

But nothing alarming
Heard those overhead, so
They found it quite charming,
And each of them said so;
For they'd all been South, and they hadn't met
Since the autumn time with its chill and wet.

So this was all that the babel meant;
They were asking each other with rapt intent,
"Where and how was your winter spent?"

A Real Adventure in the Country.

"Don't you love to live in the country?" asked Mary Marjorie as she and her little cousin Jane set out for a walk to the woods.

It was May, and Mary Marjorie had just come to Uncle Henry's farm to spend two weeks with Jane.

"Oh, I like it well enough," replied Jane, "but sometimes it's lonesome. There isn't any one to play with or anything to do."

"Why, I think there is no end of things to do. You're always running into adventures in the country." They were nearing the pasture now, and just beyond that was the edge of the woods.

"Maybe some people are," said Jane, "but I've had only one adventure in my whole life, and that was the day I went into town to see you and we went to the circus."

"But you have surely had a cow chase you?" asked Mary Marjorie.

Jane shook her head. "Our cows are all tame," she said.

"Or a bee sting you?" pursued her little cousin.

"That's not an adventure," said Jane soberly.

"Did you ever meet a dwarf that gave you three wishes?"

"No, I never met one that gave me even one wish. I never met any at all."

They walked on in silence for a few minutes. They were near the woods now.

"Anyway," commented Mary Marjorie, "I just bet we have some kind of adventure before we get back to the house."

"Maybe so," answered Jane, but it was plain to see that she was doubtful.

The words had scarcely been spoken when Mary Marjorie stopped quite still and opened her mouth in astonishment. "What's that?" she cried, pointing to a brown bird sitting on a nest on the ground by the pasture fence.

Jane drew nearer to her cousin and smiled delightedly. "Sh!" she whispered. "I think it is a brown thrush's nest. Father says that they build their nests on the ground. I have looked and looked for one, but this is the very first time that I have really seen one with my own eyes."

"Isn't she a dear?" whispered Mary Marjorie.

"Do you suppose she will hatch out some little brown thrushes by and by?" asked Jane.

"Oh, I hope so!" cried Mary Marjorie.

"When we go home let's ask father if he will let us have the little birds for pets."

"Oh, yes, let's do," agreed Mary Marjorie. "We are having a real adventure after all, aren't we?"

Jane admitted that they were.

When the two little children went home and told about the nest with the bird on it, Jane's father said that they were undoubtedly right and that it was the home of a brown thrush that they had seen. But when they asked him to let them keep the little ones for pets he said that brown thrushes did not like to be caged. Mary Marjorie declared that she thought the birds should have their own way about it. Besides, if they were not caged, they would build nests of their own the next year and make adventures for other little girls.

"For it certainly was a real adventure, you know," said Mary Marjorie.

"Yes, I think it was," Jane admitted. —Youth's Companion.

Stains.

One day Ruth came home from school with three stains on her pretty white dress. When mother saw them, she said:

"You may get them out yourself. I'll tell you how."

So Ruth rubbed the cocoa stain in cold water. That disappeared. Then she poured boiling water through the strawberry stain. The red turned to pink, then faded away. The ink stain was hardest of all. Mother gave her something in a bottle that banished the ugly black. Some drops from another bottle kept the acid from eating the cloth.

It is easy to take stains out of cloth, but do you know how to take stains out of thoughts?

There is the quarrel stain. Your playmate does something that you do not like. Soon there is an ugly, brown stain on your friendship. You can make it disappear by pouring on the water of remembrance. Think of all the fun you have had together and of all the kind things which your playmate has done. Away will go the quarrel stain.

Some stains are very hard to get out if you let them get old. There is the bad word stain. It is hard to get that out if you keep thinking about the words or even repeating them. Take them out at once. Make yourself think of the last Sunday's Golden Text or your favorite stories whenever those words want to say themselves over.

Whenever you make a thought stain, see if you can remove it as quickly as the boiling water faded the strawberry stain.—Dew Drops.

What the Toy Bunny Did.

"Your baby isn't as nice as ours," said Julia. "Ours can talk, and your's can't."

"Ours will pretty soon," declared Marian loyally. "I know she could now, if she wanted to."

But Marian could not help worrying about what Julia had said. Baby was so dear and sweet, and her bright eyes were so quick to notice everything, but she did not try to talk.

Marian had been begging for a pet rabbit, but father said there was no place in their yard to keep it, so that very night he brought her instead a big toy rabbit with a candy-box opening in its head. Marian thought that was even better than a live rabbit; and as for baby, in all her small life she never had been so excited about anything. She cooed and squealed and laughed. "Pretty! pretty!" said Marian, and "Pitty, pitty!" said baby after her.

"Oh, mother, the baby said a word!" cried Marian, and away she hurried to tell Julia.

Julia came back home with her to see the wonderful rabbit, and there sat baby still looking at it and saying: "Pitty! pitty!" when some one else said it first.

"Now she is as nice as our baby," laughed Julia.—Sunbeam.

Sleep Song.

Two little beds, and the sun goes down
Pulling the darkness over the town.
Two little beds, all soft and white,
And one little moon that sails the night.

One little moon and two little beds
For two little sleepy, sleepy heads.
One little bird, head under its wing,
Fast asleep where the branches swing.

One little bird and two little heads
Pillowed deep down in two white beds.
One little song, "Tick-tock, tick-tock,"
Sung by a sleepy, sleepy clock.

One little clock with one little song,
"Nick-neck, nick-neck," the whole night long.

One little song, and deep in their beds
Two little, dear little, sleeping heads.

MRS. SARAH KENNON BAKER.

Entered into the joys of Paradise on Saturday evening, July 5th, at 6:25 o'clock, at her home in Richmond, Virginia, SARAH KENNON BAKER, widow of Frederick W. Baker, at his death business manager of the Southern Churchman, and daughter of Commodore William Conway Whittle, of the United States and Confederate States' navies, and Elizabeth Beverley Sinclair. A brother and sister, Judge Stafford G. Whittle, late President of the Virginia Supreme Court, and Gilberta S. Whittle, survive her. "Steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

MRS. SALLIE RIDLEY LEWIS.

SALLIE RIDLEY LEWIS was born at Rock Spring Plantation, in Southampton County, Virginia, on October 23, 1856; the youngest child of Robert Ridley and his wife, Anne Blount. She was twice married, first to Mr. John J. Long, Jr., of Halifax county, N. C., and secondly, to Dr. Henry W. Lewis, of Jackson, N. C., who survives her. She is also survived by three sons and two daughters.

Attractive in person and personality, she won friends wherever she went, and by her adherence to high ideals, and living up to them, she bound them to her by ties of friendship and love. It was her's to grow old gracefully and to have friends among young and old.

To those who knew and loved her, her life and example meant much, and life will be scadder by her going. She represented a type that is fast passing from among us, and life was richer and fuller from having known her.

She fell asleep at her home, in Jackson, on the 25th of June, 1924, and was laid to rest among many loved ones and friends of her earlier life on the following afternoon, in the churchyard adjoining the Church of the Saviour, where for forty years she had been one of the most devoted workers and worshippers.

"The golden evening brightens in the West;
Soon, soon to faithful warriors cometh rest;
Sweet is the calm of Paradise the blest."
Alleluia.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

good work of establishing the Society so firmly in the District was present and presided at the meetings.

On Sunday, June 8, Whitsunday, Bishop Tyler dedicated two memorial windows in the Sanctuary of Gethsemane Cathedral, Fargo. The windows, which are in an excellent antique style, represent the Annunciation and the Resurrection, and are on either side of the central "Christus Consolator," a memorial given by Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Akeley for their son. The windows are in memory of Mr. Edmund Freeman, a young man who sang in the choir of the Cathedral, and was closely interested in the work of the parish; and of Mrs. W. H. Barnett, who, for many years, was one of the most beloved workers in the Cathedral Parish. The work of the Girls' Friendly Society was commenced under her care, and continued her chief interest until her death. The Bishop preached the sermon and emphasized the lives of service and devotion which the windows so beautifully memorialize.

In connection with his rural Church School work, the Rev. C. W. Baxter, of All Saints' Church, Valley City, organized a rural Church School at the school house at Grand Prairie, N. D., and will also conduct services in the school house there. There are six confirmed persons residing in the vicinity. New Church Schools have been started at Belcourt and Kenmare as the result of the work of the Home Department. Services are held fortnightly in Enderlin and there are now thirty baptized members and fifteen confirmed members residing there that have been found by the Rural Dean. Bishop Tyler preached the baccalaureate sermon at the State Teachers' College at Valley City on the Sunday after Ascension. All Saints, Valley City, observed the forty-second anniversary of the Consecration of the church on May 28.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Lancaster, Pa.: The English stained glass windows were unveiled and dedicated in St. John's Church, Lancaster, recently, by the rector, the Rev. Henry Lowndes Drew. The windows were presented to the church by the family of the late George W. Tomlinson, in his memory. The subjects of the windows are: "The Lord's Supper" and "The Transfiguration of Christ." The windows have been placed on the north side of the nave, and were painted in London, England.

The Problem of the Evening Service.

Nearly every clergyman finds the evening service on Sundays and week days more or less of a problem to be solved, if at all, only by awakening of a sense of duty on the part of "the faithful few," by the use of a more powerful counter-attraction for the masses. In many parishes the week-night service has been dropped altogether, except in special seasons.

The substitution of an open discussion on some topic of live interest, for the conventional sermon, has been found of great help in providing an attraction more powerful than those which keep people away from church, in addition to making more intelligent Churchmen.

The Rev. Edward M. Frear, Chaplain of the Church Students at Pennsylvania State College, has been using this method at State College for some time, and with marked success. After a hymn, and a collect or two, he reads a chapter from some stimulating book; last year it was, "The Good News," by the Rev. Dr. Bernard Iddings Bell; this year, it is "The Rising Tide of Faith," by the Rt. Rev. Neville S. Talbot, Bishop of Pretoria. After the reading, the subject is open for discussion, during which outstanding points are clinched. Then, while a hymn is being sung, he vests, and closes with a short form of evening prayer.

The plan is worth serious consideration, and even trial, where present methods are not producing satisfactory results.

St. Gerald's Church, Thirteenth and Market Streets, Harrisburg, lately known as Hillside Mission, has received a gift of two adjoining lots on Herr Street, twenty by one hundred and twenty feet each. The exterior of the church has been resheathed and shingled with asbestos shingles; and arrangements are being made for the painting of the woodwork, and the protection of the grounds with a fence or hedge. On Whitsunday seventeen were present at the Church School session, and three were baptized at the service following.

Mont Alto, Pa.: Bishop Darlington visited the Mont Alto Sanatorium recently, and administered Confirmation to eight candidates, six in the chapel, and two in the infirmary, presented by the Chaplain, the Rev. Howard G. England. The religious antecedents of those confirmed is as follows:; one, Church; two, Presbyterian; one, Reformed; three, Methodist; and one, Roman Catholic. An automobile roadway has been laid through the spacious front lawn on the Chaplain's House, and a cinder path constructed from the front entrance to the porch. The path will shortly be concreted.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Word has just reached me of the death of Mrs. B. D. Taylor (Mary Allen) in Atlanta, on June 16. She was a native of Virginia, and her body was put in God's Acre at Bedford. Mrs. Taylor saw a notice in the Southern Churchman in the early days of the beginning of the Episcopal Home for Girls. Work for homeless girls fired her imagination and she became one of our earliest regular contributors. She knew no diocesan bounds for her, and her helping hand has always been relied on since. She passed through much suffering in these years. She was sustained by a living faith and love. And their peace and blessing have come in promotion to the higher service.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. J. M. Maxon, D. D., Coadjutor.

St. Peter's Parish, Columbia, Tenn., laid the foundation stone of a parish house on July 10. It was very nearly the ninety-third anniversary of the laying of the cornerstone of the first St. Peter's, Columbia, by Bishop Meade of Virginia; the same stone was used, it having been restored from the use made of it when the present church was built in 1860, and it bears the two years, 1831 and 1924.

The rector, the Rev. H. K. Douglass, officiated, and there was a large gathering, including many visitors. The Rev. Dr. Dandridge, rector of Christ Church, Nashville; the Rev. P. A. Pugh, rector of the Church of the Advent, Nashville, and the Rev. George O. Watts, formerly rector of St. Peter's, Columbia, but now in Clarksville, were among the speakers.

We are theological—are we Christian? We are clever—are we good? We talk about Christ—do we live Christ? We defend the gospel—do we exemplify it? We speak with the tongues of men and of angels—have we love? How do we take rebukes, slights, misconceptions, misrepresentations?—Joseph Parker.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Russell L. Strang, of Appleton, Minnesota, has accepted appointment as Missionary Canon at Calvary Cathedral, Sioux Falls, to assist in the work among the young people and to have charge of neighboring missionary work. It is hoped to make the Cathedral a real center for missionary endeavor and plans have been made to effectuate this purpose when Mr. Strang takes up the new work on September 1.

During the summer months two of South Dakota's candidates for Orders and students in the General Theological Seminary will be in charge of vacant mission posts in that district. Mr. St. Clair Vannix will be in charge at Mobridge, Mr. Robert D. Crawford, a son of former United States Senator and Governor of South Dakota, the Honorable Coe I. Crawford, of Huron, will take the Redfield-Gettysburg Mission.

The Rev. Dr. John D. Skilton, of Roslyn, L. I., is the preacher during July and August at the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany, Philadelphia. The rector, the Rev. Dr. David M. Steele, is engaged with open-air services on the Church Farm at Broomade.

The Rev. Dr. Thomas S. Cline, rector of Grace Church, Mount Airy, and recently called to the chair of homiletics in the General Seminary, New York, preached at the open-air service July 13, on the Parkway at Twenty-third Street, under the auspices of the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mary, of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

Chaplain Ayer, of the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia, is taking the services at St. Paul's Church, Aramingo, during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Edwin J. Humes, who is taking a Mediterranean trip.

The Rev. Alexander McGill and Miss Katherine Stephanie Bradford were married in Nanking, China, on June 26.

The Rev. Gilbert Darlington, a son of the Bishop of Harrisburg, and Treasurer of the American Bible Society, has just returned after a six weeks' absence in England, Germany and France, on business for the Society.

The Rev. Howard G. England, Chaplain of the State Sanatorium for the Treatment of Tuberculosis, Mont Alto, Pa., conducted a mission, lasting a week, at St. Basil's Church, Dewart, Pa.

The Rev. Charles E. Niles, of Sharon Springs, N. Y., has accepted appointment by Bishop Darlington as Vicar of Kulpmont and adjunct missions at Cole Run and Natalie, beginning his work on July 1. The Rev. Mr. Niles is a son of the late Rev. Charles Martin Niles, D. D., who for a number of years before his death was rector of the Church of the Ascension, Atlantic City, N. J.

After a little over two years' ministry in Mansfield, Tioga, Lawrenceville, and Mount Pleasant, the Rev. Andrew Harper has resigned to take up work in another diocese. His leaving occasions much regret, for his unfailing courtesy, and deep spiritual devotion won respect and affection among those with whom he was brought into contact.

The Rev. Carleton DeCastro Beal, recently ordained Deacon, is to be in charge of All Saints', Williamsport, until October 1, when he will return to the Philadelphia Divinity School to finish his studies.

Chaplain Thomas E. Swan, Corps Area Chaplain, is visiting all Army Camps in New York, New Jersey and Delaware in order to make contact with the Civilian Clergy adjacent to these stations. These visits are made pursuant to directions from the Chief of Chaplains and also orders contained in the new Army Regulations pertaining to Chaplains.

ORDINATION.

On Thursday, July 3, at the Church of the Good Samaritan, Parker, South Dakota, the Rev. Thomas E. Hall, formerly of the Congregational ministry, was made deacon by the Rt. Rev. Hugh Latimer Burleson, D. D., Bishop of the district. Dean Woodruff, of Calvary Cathedral, Sioux Falls, presented the candidate and the Bishop preached the sermon. Mr. Hall has been since September last in charge at Parker and Hurley.

On the Mount

Not always on the Mount may we Rapt in the heavenly vision be;
The shores of thought and feeling know
The Spirit's tidal ebb and flow.

"Lord, it is good abiding here,"
We cry, the heavenly Presence near;
The vision vanishes; our eyes
Are lifted into vacant skies.

Yet hath one such exalted hour
Upon the soul redeeming power,
And in its strength through after days
We travel our appointed ways;

Till all the lowly vale grows bright,
Transfigured in remembered light,
And in untiring souls we bear
The freshness of the upper air.

The Mount for vision—but below
The paths of daily duty go,
And nobler life therein shall own
The pattern on the mountain shown.

—F. L. Hosmer.

INTENSIVE INSTRUCTION

Intensive instruction, given by experienced teachers, is the ideal, and the advantage, of what is known as the "small college" type of education.

Hobart College has always adhered to this ideal, by giving its students the benefits of small class and laboratory sections, competent teachers and close attention to their individual needs; and by offering them only sufficient freedom in the choice of studies to develop their individual abilities.

Among authoritative bodies endorsing Hobart's instructional methods and equipment are the New York State Board of Regents and the Association of Colleges of the Middle States and Maryland. The highest possible endorsement of the Hobart system is the success of Hobart students in professional and graduate schools, and in all walks of life.

Applications for admission to the 103rd class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"These mortal bodies are but the rude scaffolding of the bodies that shall be."

The devil never throws any stones at a man on the fence.

Some for release from service give their self.

But he most freely gives who gives himself.

Every man has a right to be himself. He ought not to be dominated, mastered, by any other except God.—Bishop Gore.

He who knows only how to enjoy, and not to endure, is ill-fitted to go through such a world as this.

"He knows and loves and cares,
Nothing this truth can dim,
He does the very best for those Who leave their choice with Him."

We wear the love of those about us like an every day garment. It is only when we lose it, that we know the world is cold.—Mary A. DeVere.

Changeful the world, at best,
Yet doth the Christmas chime.

Tell of abiding rest,

And love outlasting time!

—D. Baines-Griffith.

We come into the Mount not only to speak, but to listen. How seldom we wait to hear what God the Lord will speak! And yet the most important part of prayer and not what we say to God, but what God says to us.—Samuel Chadwick.

Jesus came to reveal the Father; the Holy Spirit, has come to reveal Jesus to the world. But who shall reveal the Holy Ghost to the world? The men and women with whom He deals.—Gipsy Smith.

"Without physical light, you have a low form of physical life; without that light which cometh from above, you will have a low form of moral and spiritual life. You can breed owls and bats in the darkness, but to have eagles you must have the sunlight."—Bishop J. E. Dickey.

There's part o' the sun in an apple,
There's part o' the moon in a rose.
There's part o' the flaming Pleiades
In every leaf that grows.
Out of the vast comes nearness.
For the God Whose love we sing
Lends a little of His Heaven
To every living thing!

—Selected.

Do not do in thought the act to which you are tempted. Avoid the least thought of it. The thinking has its immediate bodily effect and has its immediate tendency to pass into act.—Henry Churchill King.

Steadfast and still, nor paid with mortal praise,
But finding amplest recompense,
For life's ungarlanded expense
In work done squarely and unwasted days.

—James Russell Lowell.

SIX PER CENT AND SANITY

We once heard an admirer of England asked what he thought was the secret of England's greatness. His answer was enigmatic, for he replied: "Six per cent." Of course, he spoke in parable. Any investment that pays more than six per cent means increased risk, and possible total loss. A man has to sit up nights with a ten per cent investment. If his investment turns out to be a paying one, he may get rich for a time, but he is henceforth a plunger and liable to take a header at any sudden turn of affairs. English thought, English politics, English capital are not plungers. So far as we know, philosophies in England are the only philosophies that know their own grandfathers.

The leaders of French thought are brilliant performers, but it is the skill of the performer that holds the allegiance of the crowd. When he dies, it is his literary skill—flashes of genius, swift as light, that he bequeaths to the world. He has charmed, and memories of the charm linger like impressions made upon the brain by the music of a voice or the interpretative vitality of a great actor.

Germany is the home of philosophies or rather the centre of the philosophy industry; for philosophies are made in Germany. They do not develop, but are constructed with infinite care and astounding ability. These philosophies are always complete systems. They have been largely exported. America has been one of the best customers. But the business of making philosophies must go on, and about every ten years one of these complete systems it put out of business and another takes its place. It would be interesting to visit a museum in which these philosophies could be studied. It would be a very different thing from a History of Philosophy, for the making of such histories is an industry by itself. Before the war our Universities in America counted it a matter of pride that they furnished the latest fashion in philosophy imported from Germany. A curious phenomenon used to be observed in America. One familiar with changes of thought in German Universities and who had at the same time a memory for dates, could make a fairly accurate guess as to the year the man who aired his defensive infidelity, had graduated from some American University. Germans read philosophy after they leave the University; comparatively few Americans do. In Germany a man discards the old complete system when his University discards it. Not so in America. The university graduate continues to wear the philosophy taken in or taken on at the University to the end of his days, and many such continued to wear proudly a habit of thought that long years before had been discredited and flung aside by those who exported it to America.

English philosophy, especially its religious philosophy, is to our mind the sapest and most wholesome philosophy that the world has ever known. It does not presume to solve all the problems of thought. It is continuously producing opposites, but it carries you somewhere. It is continually pointing the way out into the world of action. It is creative because it begets a deed.

Coleridge is typical of the great line of English philosophers. In a time when men's minds were still reeling from the shock of the French Revolution and reverence was the only impiety, he became the prophet who proclaimed the sanctity of ancient truths and preached the veneration for traditional sanctities. To Carlyle fresh from his bath of blood in studying the French Revolution, Coleridge was the true father of the High Church party and had begot the "spectral Puseyisms, monstrous illusory Hybrids and ecclesiastical Chimeras which now roam the earth in a very lamentable manner," but there was a younger son, represented by Maurice and Kingsley, Frederick Robertson and Tennyson. To our mind the High Church party has ever seemed but a cult whose peculiar passion it has been to preserve the ancient structure. As self-appointed guardians of the antiquities, every individual antique seems of great value simply because it is antique. Some day when the house of faith is being made ready for the ingathering of the children of men, much which they have preserved will be found to be of inestimable value; but the rest, if it be retained at all, will be valued as curios are valued, as expressions of a passing mood, significant of a time and surroundings utterly unlike our own.

The Church in America is today being torn by the strife of Creeds. It is noisy, exciting and absorbing. It has been going on actively, but with little noise in England for more than a generation. The most forceful presentation of Modernism that we know is in a series of sermons preached by Abbot at Oxford forty-five years ago. The trouble with us today is that doubt has a vocabulary and is using it in negative criticism of the Creed. Faith is handicapped by the need of a vocabulary. To our mind, faith is contact; grace, the assurance of God's approving presence in our best endeavor; miracle, the play of infinite creative life through a prepared medium; and immortality, the liberation of life into a medium of finer conductivity than matter.

There has just come to our desk the July issue of "The Pilgrim," a review of Christian Politics and Religion. It is edited by William Temple, Bishop of Manchester. After reading it through, we think we are a little nearer to comprehending the secret of England's power; for its pages contain the best expression of a virile faith in the Incarnate Son of God that we have been privileged to meet within the covers of a book in many a day.

ONE THING WELL DONE

How often it is that God grants to some man a vision of the Truth; discovers for him a hitherto unnoted principle of life; endows, as it were, his spiritual intelligence with a special gift of perception. Thus enriched and convinced, the man lets the truth escape in idle vaporings, nourishing the thought that if he had a field of operation large enough and adequate equipment, he could establish the principle; prove it before the eyes of men so conclusively that it would become a part of the moral consciousness of the race. Thinking thus, he does nothing. Such a man has failed in loyalty. If he had but tested the truth in his own limited surroundings, and had let his own home or his own community be his laboratory, he would have forged a link in the chain of life. No man alone can establish the one convincing truth that shall convert the world. He can, however, prove that the principle he has discovered will work in a particular case. All the world will interest itself in a principle that works, and an increasing number will put it to the trial, till at last the many times tested truth will be recognized as a law of life.

The Austrian peasant boy, Mendel, who became a monk and finally Abbot of Brunn, with no larger field of observation than the cloister garden began to study heredity in plants. He chose the common pea as a subject for experiment. With infinite patience he stuck to his task, and in 1865 published a little pamphlet telling what he had learned. His work passed unnoticed for twenty-five years until in 1900 three men of understanding happened to see it. Immediately they recognized that here was a key to a locked chamber of life. One thing done well within the walls of a garden, and a new science was born, which if its hopes be fulfilled, may enable man to wipe the word chance from his contemplation of a better world, and open new channels for the creative life of God.

Religion in Universities

Dr. Walter Hulihan, President of the University of Delaware, in a recent report to the Board of Trustees discusses the need of a Chair of Religion at the University and asks the board to take the matter under consideration.

How Education Became Impractical.

"Our early American colleges were founded to teach religion and thus to prepare men for citizenship and the active ministry. Harvard, for example, was founded in 1636 to save the churches from "an illiterate ministry"; Yale in 1701 to prepare young men "for public employment both in church and in state." Until a little after the middle of the last century religion continued to be one of the chief subjects taught in practically every higher institution of learning. Then, with the deeper study of Nature, came the sciences and scientific method. Ever since they have been regnant in our American colleges and universities. They have brought manifold blessings to mankind and have infinitely more to contribute, but they cannot fill the gap left when the study of religion was either quietly dropped from the college curriculum or relegated to a secondary place.

"This silent but fatal transfer of emphasis in modern education has been due primarily to three causes; dogmatism, sectarianism, and materialism. Unfortunately the teachers of religion at first refused to adopt the tested methods and to accept the positive results of scientific investigation. In clinging to its old dogmatic methods and to a philosophy formulated when the Ptolemaic system was still universally accepted, they committed a fatal crime against reason and the youth of America.

"To this crime and especially to the intense sectarianism of the period are largely due the prohibitions found in the constitutions and laws of most of our states against teaching the sectarian interpretation of religion in tax-supported institutions. These prohibitions were just, but in popular thought, and therefore in the minds of legislators, religion was identified with divergent Creeds and belligerent denominationalism. It was inevitable that this perversion of religion should be placed under the ban in all but strongly denominational colleges.

"Deprived of the inspiration of sane religious instruction education became increasingly utilitarian and materialistic. The rich contributions of science, which at first were largely physical, and the quick mastery of the vast natural resources of America fostered these materialistic tendencies. The air was saturated with materialism. Following the example of their elders students naturally elected the courses that promised material success. In college and university circles religion and ethics were largely neglected or despised.

"It was not until the close of the last century that the consequence of this wrong emphasis in education began to be generally recognized.

The Turn of the Tide.

"The real turn of the tide came when exact scientific methods began to be applied to the study of the history, literature and philosophy of religion. This movement appeared in the more liberal colleges during the last quarter of the Nineteenth Century. At first it was bitterly opposed by sectarianism and by the champions of the old dogmatic theology, but gradually its reasonableness and its practical results began to be appreciated. Today it is heartily approved and supported by most of the leading churches of America.

"The responsibility of teaching religion to the youth of America rests the more heavily today upon the schools and colleges because the home is failing to do its part. It is failing in large measure because the parents do not have the required knowledge. We are beginning to realize that through the schools the future parents must be trained, if the home itself as to be rehabilitated. Our problem carries us, therefore, to the very foundations of our modern civilization."

SPIRITUAL POWER.

If we are to have a better world, if anything is to come out of these political agitations about an International Court and a League of Nations, if we are ever going to have a warless world, if child labor is ever to be abolished, if we are ever going to have our civilization and our culture adorned with those virtues of fellowship and friendship and brotherhood and peace and good will, which are the central principles of the Christian religion, it will only be because men take these political and economic problems and put them on a religious foundation and attack them with religious passion.

It is right here that our Twentieth Century religion exhibits a conspicuous weakness. The weakness consists in assuming that there can be a religion of power without personal contact with its source. Religion is not altogether unpopular nowadays. There appears to be a revival of interest in it. Popularity, however, often goes hand and hand with superficiality. It is quantitative rather than qualitative. It does not reach up high enough for its inspiration nor draw deep enough in its application. The power that runs the street cars of this city comes from contact with the power house. People think they can have power without establishing contact with Christ, through the Church which is the power house of the Kingdom of God. Now, brethren, it cannot be done. Easy-going amiability and pious sentimentality are not religion. The Christian religion has as its center an Incarnate God. It has its Bethlehem, its Gethsemane, its Calvary, its empty tomb. This living Christ at its center and these stupendous facts and experiences which radiate from Him are the very heart of the Christian religion. Without contact with this source our religion will not convert us or the world.

SERMON ON RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Delivered to Members of the Geneva Summer School, Sunday, June 29, in Trinity Church, Geneva, New York,

By the Right Reverend G. Ashton Oldham, D. D.

Bishop Coadjutor of Albany,

Student Pastor of the Geneva Summer School.

Text: And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man.—S. Luke 2:52.

THESE words tell us all that we know about the eighteen silent years of the childhood and youth of Our Blessed Lord. They tell us the whole story. They depict the ideal development of the Child of God—growth, physically (stature), mentally (wisdom), morally (right relations with man) and spiritually (right relations with God). They afford us a standard, surprisingly up-to-date and in accord with modern pedagogy and psychology, which should be the aim for the training and education of every child.

True education—by whatever name it is called—has but a single aim, the development of the individual in right relation to his environment. Secular education deals with only part of this environment—nature and man. It therefore needs to be supplemented by the development of right relations with that other part of every soul's environment which we call God.

Our public schools are unable to deal adequately if at all with the child's relations to God. Whether this is a good or bad thing is of no concern just now. The chances are in this country that it never will be changed and, even if it should be, we must deal with the present situation as it is. The public schools do not teach religion and therefore, if our children's education is to be completed, some agency must. This is both the manifest duty and opportunity of the Church, both for its own well being, for the welfare of the state, and indeed, our whole present day civilization and culture. The Church must betake itself earnestly to this task. It is its most important and imperative duty.

Secular education alone is and always has been a failure, due in a large measure to its limited aim and scope. Of this we have abundant instances, ancient and modern. The Spartans of old were trained only in their duties toward the state, and Sparta became a despotic socialism. Education for the Athenians included the arts of music and literature as well as patriotism, but because it omitted the appeal to the conscience which only religion can supply the Athenians became a nation of refined liars, so that "the liars of Athens" became a proverb.

The striking modern illustration is, of course, Germany. Here was a nation the most highly trained in science, art and industry, and yet because religiously it had substituted the valor of Valhalla for the meekness of the Nazarene it produced a nation without a soul and became a menace to mankind. Of course, these are not the only instances, but they are the outstanding ones and they serve to illustrate the fact that so-called "secular education" alone is woefully inadequate if not positively dangerous. There is much truth in the statement of the Duke of Wellington that "Education without religion will surround us with clever devils"; and Mr. Benjamin Kidd does well to remind us: "Physics with chemistry helping gave us the submarine assassin; chemistry murderous gases, and biology furnished germs to poison man and beast. Yet, these things, devilish as the use to which they were put, were not in themselves necessarily evil; the anthrax germ might have been used as an anti-toxin; the murderous gases to destroy vermin and the submarine even to transport missionaries."

The fact is, the field of knowledge is now so wide and modern man is now in possession of such gigantic forces that unless these are controlled and directed by religious and moral sanction all our vast knowledge may prove a curse rather than a blessing. Just at present the world is hovering on the edge of a volcano. It is not yet apparent whether our modern education will usher in the New Jerusalem, or whether it will result in the annihilation of the civilization and culture which is the product of the centuries. Great powers can only safely be trusted to good men. Consequently the greater our advance in knowledge, the more thorough our secular education, the greater is the need of education in religion.

Let us now turn to our own country. Is all well here? It needs no pessimist, but only one with eyes open to see the danger clouds on the horizon. Selfishness, materialism, frivolity, dishonesty, anarchy in high circles as in law, and a general laxness in conduct and morals are evident on every hand. Indeed it is scarcely too much to say that America has largely ceased to be a Christian nation. Originally it was and technically perhaps still is, but as respects the actions and attitudes of its members today it can more accurately be defined as pagan, for the essence of paganism is not the worshipping of other gods, but the living for this world only, and is not that what vast multitudes in this country are doing today? This is perhaps not so surprising when we consider our religious situation as shown by official statistics. We find that five and one-half million of our people are still illiterate; that twenty-eight and one-half millions under twenty-five years of age have no relation whatever to any Sunday School or Church; that fifty-eight millions altogether are absolutely untouched by the Christian Church. In other words, less than fifty per cent of our population is even nominally Christian. To judge by numbers, then, America is pagan, and, unless the present trend is stopped and reversed, it will not be long before pagan ideals predominate.

"Indeed, pagan ideals already dominate a large section of our country and a goodly portion of our best educated and cultured people. One particular phase of this, the absence of the restraints of a previous generation in the amusements of the young today, was discussed some time ago in The Atlantic Monthly by Mrs. Katherine Fullerton Gerould, who puts her finger unerringly upon the root cause: "The abandonment of religion is probably most responsible of all since it bears a usual relation to most of these other facts. Though our former religion was so strict that it brought about an inevitable and legitimate revolt, nevertheless when we, as a social group, threw over religion, we threw over, probably without meaning to, most of our every day moral sanctions."

Many of my friends are not religious at all, although they are moral. But they were nearly all brought up in strict religious forms; and while their brains have discarded the dogma, their characters have none the less been moulded by fairly firm Christian ethics. Whether they will be able to pass that ethic on to their children without the dogma remains to be seen. We are enduring more and more in America the influence of people who have broken deliberately or violently with any religious law; and you cannot knock away the props and still keep the structure. You cannot make the Ten Commandments potent by dwelling on their inherent fidelity. If there is no Divine command back of them, they lose all power over the man who finds it more satisfactory to break them. For better or worse, our Western civilization has been built upon the Christian religion; and if the Christian religion decays, many accidents will happen that will puzzle the politicians.

"All of these signs of the times warrant serious reflection and should result in energetic action. The difficulties admittedly are great, but so is the opportunity. What should be our plan of action? How and where shall we begin? After the battle of Sedan when the great German General Von Moltke was riding in triumph to Paris he is reported to have said, "It is the Prussian schoolmaster who should be given credit for this." Wellington has also told us that "the battle of Waterloo was won on the fields of Eton and Rugby." The recent war was on Germany's part the result of a comprehensive plan of education carried out with typical German thoroughness; and similarly the splendid victories and the crusader spirit of our American boys was the result of their training in American ideals of liberty in the public schools and Christian schools and Christian ideals of service and sacrifice in the Churches and Sunday Schools of the land. Not a Church or Mission Chapel but had its honor roll and scarce one which has not some blue stars turned to gold.

Another striking example of the fruits of education is to be found in the Far East. Not many years ago a writer produced a book entitled, "The Unchanging East," but the ink was scarcely dry before his entire thesis was disproved. Within the past two decades changes have come over India, Egypt, China and notably Japan, such as have taken centuries in the West. Says Mr. Benjamin Kidd in "The Science of Power," "Within the space of less than two generations Japan has passed through the whole interval which separates feudalism from modern conditions.

In this space of time a change in general habits, in social and mental outlook, and in national consciousness was accomplished as by the wand of a conjuror."

"How have all these vast changes been brought about? Simply by education. Second, an educational system based largely on science may become a positive menace to the world, and thirdly, if education is to lay hold of the motives and forces that shape conduct and create the ideals of Christian citizenship, room must be made for a real program of moral and religious education." Though the methods used by the Prussian and Japanese educators have not been ideal, nevertheless they command profound respect. If the educators of America could agree to similar means in less than two generations they could permeate our nation with the pure religion of the Son of God as effectively as Germany became permeated with militarism or Japan with the scientific spirit.

But where shall we begin? The answer is clear. Little can be done with the older folk to whom all is utterly hopeless. But for the young, for every one under thirty, it's grand—the greatest time in the world's history to be born into. We must begin with the young and what multitudes these are! The first draft disclosed about twelve million young men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five and the second draft many more. These are the men who are going to be leaders in business and the professions and rulers in our government within a short time. They are the ones who will shape our future institutions. Below them are many millions of boys and girls growing up to take their places and it is not too much to say that the activities of these young persons will shape our institutions and direct the destinies of this land for possibly centuries to come. How heavy is our responsibility and how equally great our opportunity!

Somehow we must see to it that these young persons grow not only in stature and wisdom, but in favor with God and man. They must not only have every facility for developing splendid bodies and alert and well-stored minds, but they must also learn how to use these bodies and minds for the welfare of their fellow men and the glory of God. Nothing less than this will suffice.

Moreover, we must begin with the very young. Educators assert that the first seven or eight years of a child's life determine whether he is to be religious or not. And if a child passes the age of adolescence—about twelve—without having been touched by religion, the chances are against his ever being influenced by it. It would seem clear, then, that the Church's chief task is really with the little ones who receive so much of the Master's attention and Whom He commanded should be allowed to come unto Him.

If for a decade or a generation the Church, if it can not perform both tasks, were to neglect or even abandon much of its work for adults and address itself with all its power and resources to training the coming generation, both the Church and the world would profit in the end. Here is the greatest missionary field in the world and it is already ripe unto the harvest. Others see this, if we do not, and are already taking advantage of it. The Socialist School, the "Red" Sunday Schools, the schools of every cult and "ism" are striking evidences of the wisdom of many of their adherents. Can the Church of God do less? Here is the place for Christian laymen to invest their money if they would secure the largest possible spiritual returns and here is the place for the Church to expend her time, her energy and her prayers if she would reap an abundant harvest.

The story is told of an old Roman general who lay dying. He loved Rome and had labored and fought for her all his life long. Now he was perplexed as to her future. His colleagues endeavored to console him. They said, "We are brave. We love Rome, we will defend Rome." But the old man, seeing that their time was short, too, remained unconsoled. Then came his warriors who said likewise, "We are brave, we love Rome, we will defend Rome." Again he told them that they too were mortal and that ere long their day would cease. Then came a band of the youth of the city saying, "We are brave, we love Rome, we will defend Rome." More hopeful now he deigned to smile and command them, but still he could not get out of his mind the thought of their departure and wondered what would happen to his beloved Rome then. At last came a group of little children from the streets of the city who had caught the patriotic spirit of their elders and who voiced their sentiments, "We are brave, we love Rome and we will defend Rome." And with that exhibition of the eternal childhood of the race, tears of joy started from the old man's eyes and with a shout of relief and confidence he cried, "Rome is safe, I go in peace."

THE HISTORY AND DEVELOPEMENT OF THE SOCIAL SERVICE WORK OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES

The Reverend Jos. M. Waterman, A. B., B. D., Baltimore, Md.

PART 2.

The Origin and History of City Mission Work of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. (From City Mission Publications, New York City.)

THE first public occasion on which the notice of our Episcopal Community was invited to the subject of a City Mission Society was in June, 1831, at the anniversary meeting of the Male and Female Missionary Association of Christ Church, New York City. It was pointed out that our Church was not reaching the "middle classes of mechanics and artisans and the like, to say nothing of the poor and neglected." A meeting was called for September 15 of the same year "to devise the necessary measures preparatory to the organization of an Association for the support of a City Mission."

Its origin was to do one thing only: "To provide free sittings in Mission Churches for a large number of Episcopalians and others disposed to become members of the Church, who at this time are virtually excluded from parish churches, families of poorer mechanics, merchant's clerks, journeymen, apprentices, domestics, and others unable to pay for sittings, besides strangers, emigrants, etc."

At this first meeting the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society was founded. It was the first organization of its kind in our Church. The Convention of 1831 recognized this society by canon as the Diocesan agent for missionary operations within the city. Three missions were started in 1831-1834. The first two missions forged ahead rapidly and in 1840 at the Mission Church of the Epiphany, one hundred and six were confirmed, which Bishop Onderdonk said was the largest Confirmation he had ever held. Six Sunday Schools were started in primary schools with theological students in charge.

By 1847 the parish churches having assumed the care of their poorer parishioners, and in some cases building chapels, withdrew their supporting funds from the City Mission Society, which in turn had to dispose of its three mission churches. The Society wound up its affairs and ceased to exist for some years. However, it had aroused the Church to its duty to the poorer classes of the city population, a care and oversight which have never been relinquished. While the present City Mission Society is the legal descendent of the one described it has changed in character and its work now is the Mission to Public Institutions. How did this change of character occur?

In 1847 the Rev. William Richmond, rector of St. Michael's and his assistant, the Rev. Thomas Peters, inaugurated the Mission to public institutions in the following manner. They agreed that each should take daily as much time as would be required for daily services at the church and devote the time to visiting the poor and holding services for the spiritually neglected in institutions or the poorest parts of the city. In 1849 it was definitely organized into the Mission to Public Institutions, with weekly services at various hospitals and asylums. In Bloomingdale Asylum, where Dr. Richmond had held services weekly since 1832, he undoubtedly began the first services of this sort in the world, i. e., to insane. By 1864 the work had become so large that it seemed desirable to place it under the charge of an incorporated organization immediately responsible to the Bishop of the Diocese. So in this year the mission to public institutions went out of existence and the City Mission Society, supposedly dead since 1847, was technically revived.

Through the efforts of Mrs. Richmond, wife of Dr. Richmond, the House of Mercy was established in 1854, and in 1863 was placed under the charge of the Sisters of the Holy Communion. The following year Mrs. Richmond organized the Home for Homeless Women and Children, called St. Barnabas' House. These Sisters soon left this work and a new Sisterhood of the Good Shepherd was organized. Here was developed the oldest day nursery in the City of New York.

In March, 1866, the Executive Committee decided to assume charge of mission work in the Tombs and other city prisons, a work which has continued uninterruptedly until the present. In 1867 the work of the Society was carried on by four chaplains in regular stations and three missionaries at large. These worked in over thirty public and semi-public institutions.

It was finally decided that an active head was needed to overcome financial difficulties. The office of superintendent was created, and this office was filled in 1872 by the Rev. Curtiss T. Woodruff. In 1881, the fiftieth year of work, it was free from debt. No work undertaken had been given up and the one great principle of the society—the care of neglected and unthought of—remained unchanged. During the sixteen years of leadership of Mr. Woodruff the Society was placed on a sound business basis and made wonderful progress in all directions. His successor, Dr. Mackay-Smith, tried to consolidate the society with the archdeaconry, believing it was not so much a society as a Committee of Churches. Legal difficulties as well as public opinion was against this move.

In 1887 work was undertaken among the French and Spanish. The following year the society took over work among the Italians, which had been done for some years at San Salvatore Mission. This work is now carried on in a new church built in 1902.

Organization and Work of City Missions at the Present Time.

In 1920, the department of Social Service began its work under the direction of the Rev. C. N. Lathrop, as Executive Secretary. Two years later this department organized the division of City Missions. At present this organization consists of four officers and thirty individual members, all of whom are City Mission Executives in various dioceses. This organization aims to act as clearing house for information and to correlate all City Mission work.

The first National City Mission Council adopted the following definition and preamble regarding its work:

"It is understood that by the City Mission idea is meant that type of work in the Protestant Episcopal Church, whose function it is to express Christ's love and remembrance to His neglected, forgotten and straying sheep, by bringing the services, sacraments and pastoral ministrations, and where necessary, social welfare aid to people of our cities and ports of entry, particularly to those who are isolated in public and private hospitals, reformatories and other institutions; to conduct agencies of social helpfulness, to promote social justice, to aid in establishing better conditions of living, and also where the organization of the city or diocese indicates its advisability, to institute missionary work, and to carry on the work of Parochial Church Extension."

"In its simplest form and almost always in its origin, the City Mission consists of a City Missionary; that is an ordained minister, who, under the direction of the Bishop, devotes himself to the pastoral care of persons, primarily to those of his own communion, but by no means limited thereto, in institutions, hospitals, homes, asylums, reformatories and in prisons. Out of these contacts are established relationships with the families or friends of those to whom he ministers. In these connections or relationships we have the connection between strictly City Missionary work and a certain amount of family welfare work developing out of the same.

There are no two of our City Missions which have developed along identical lines; they all differ from each other in some respects. New York, for example, has a superintendent in charge and by far the bulk of its time and work is devoted to pastoral care in the institutions of New York. It has no defined relationship whatever with the Cathedral Foundation. In Boston the major work of City Missions is that of Church Extension. Its organization is under an Archdeacon. In Philadelphia the City Mission is directly commissioned by the Convention of the Diocese. As to New York it is governed by a Board of Council. The Philadelphia Board of Council is nominated by the Convention through the Standing Committee; the Bishop is its President. In Chicago from the beginning the City Mission has been a part of the Cathedral enterprise. The staff consists, almost entirely of the Cathedral Chapter." (Dr. Jeffery's Book, "The City Mission Ideal.")

In Baltimore the work is in direct charge of an Archdeacon. While in Washington the work is under the direction of a superintendent and staff directly under the Bishop of Washington. In Virginia the City Missionary in Richmond also acts as missionary for the diocese.

The magnitude of the work accomplished is indicated by the following extracts from annual reports.

The New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society reports for the year 1922:

Staff—Superintendent and eighteen clergy, one lay chaplain, twenty-eight full-time, salaried workers, twenty part-time salaried workers.

This staff labored in forty hospitals, prisons and City Homes and five chapels. A summary of its work in these shows: Number of services, 3,607; aggregate attendance, 236,437; Holy Communion—public 923, private 1,928; Communions made, 21,306; Confirmations, 248; Baptisms—adults 264, children 927; Marriages, 65; Burials, 5,666; Sunday-school Teachers, 44; Pupils, 855.

In addition to all this, much work was done at Ellis Island and also work of several departments such as Fresh air and Convalescent work, Social service department, good-will industries, probation department.

Dr. Jefferys reports the work of the Philadelphia Mission for nine months of year, 1921, as follows: "When I was hungry you gave me 1,972 grocery orders, 575 Christmas dinners; when I was thirsty you gave me 16,497 milk orders, 2,500 ice orders; when I was homeless, in institutions, in hospitals and in need, you paid me 4,506 relief visits, 33,204 pastoral calls and held for me 2,544 religious services, and brought me 3,590 Bibles, Prayer Books, periodicals, etc., and got me jobs 246 times; when I was ill-clad you clothed me with 345 pairs of shoes, 5,788 garments and warmed me with 125 coal orders, and 50 oil stoves. When I was sick and feeble you brought me medical aid and sick diet 310 times. You received me into your home for convalescents 279 times; into homes for consumptives 329 times. You took me to the circus 325 times, you gave me summer outings 357 times. When I was in prison, you always came to see me; you brought me the Church, you helped and looked after my family; you owned me a human being and you forgave me."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

DR. WARD'S TRUTHS AND FACTS.

Mr. Editor:

After reading in the issue of July 19 your excellent editorial, in which it was set forth that although we knew nothing of the force we call "Life" apart from its forms, but that the study of those reveals a great deal about it, I turned to Dr. Ward's article on "Conservatism and Progress" and read to my dismay, "Back of every article of the Creed there is a great underlying truth, but there is no fact, as the compilers of the Creed believed, so far as at least five articles are concerned." He may mean no fact at all, or he may mean that the facts are not what the compilers thought they were.

If he means the first then the reply is that as in the case of Life so in the case of Truth, we are obliged, as you said, to have the concrete forms in which it is imbedded or enclosed, in order to perceive and understand anything about it. Facts are to Truth what forms are to Life.

But evidently he means that the facts are not those the compilers believed. Then what are they? If he takes away one set he must supply another. Now I know these hazy speaking theologians and the way to do is to try to get them to be definite. Very luscious and very lovely are their vague suggestions, but I complain loudly that in the instructions they give me, a poor seeker, they cannot be induced to embody their truths in any set of facts.

Here is my trouble: Christianity rests on the Resurrection. That implies death. The Resurrection occurred three days after death, then what was the condition of soul and body during those three days? Remember, Dr. Ward, that "Back of every article of the Creed there is a great underlying 'truth,'" and I must ask for Scriptural support for it. Science cannot answer these sorts of questions, and Philosophy won't. Possibly Dr. Ward may say that the Bible doesn't. Still "every article" has "a great truth." Dr. Ward knows it well enough to discard the belief of the compilers. Let him tell us all he knows, so that we can judge. There are suggestions that this article in the Creed be stricken out, but few if any that set forth a substitute.

And so with the rest of the five articles, which he says have "underlying truth," but either "no facts" or wrong facts.

Mr. Editor, I am so sick and tired of the vagueness of modern theology I don't now what to do. The Doctors of Divinity just will not specify what is what. The Higher Critics are the most fanciful and erratic writers the world ever knew. They "feel after" a truth and "about" a truth, but they are appalled every time a conclusion suggests itself. We cannot go on living this way. The present haze in the regions of Fatherhood and Brotherhood will soon make every craft afloat prefer the banks and reefs of Calvinism, dread by Dr. Ward, just so they can steer a definite course.

I am not afraid of Science. According to recent teachings, matter and force are reciprocal, and as long as one lives the other must. So, too, suns and nebulae. Eternity looms before us from three directions—Religion, Philosophy and Science. The full thought of Eternity can scare a man to death all by itself. The Sovereignty of the Master mind on any line of reasoning involves awful thoughts. If the gladness of a Gospel breaks the terrors by its reminders of love, we must not maltreat the whole situation.

It is not a far cry from the discussion of Life and mechanism to that of Personality and mechanism. Somehow Life has resulted in Personality, a thing made real and actual to us, both by thought and feeling. Come on then, ye Scientists, and tell us about Personality. Your study of matter and force taught us about Eternity. Your study of Life taught us about a creative power—at least a power that makes natural laws its slave. Dip into the regions of Personality, ye Servants of the Master-mind, and give as is your custom something crisp and definite, and not as these hazy theologians; something too namby-pamby for use, i. e., truth? incapable of embodiment in words.

Mr. Editor, the reflex use of very minor difficulties as to modern and ancient ideas of dissent and ascent, of place and state, of physical and mental or spiritual joy and happiness, in order to bring something to bear on the topic of the day—the passing topic of a very short day, is hardly fair or useful. The question of Virgin Birth depends so greatly on other things that I dislike to see such a wide wandering from the critical point. That point is Personality. It is too large a question to bring up in this letter, but, after all, the doctrine of Virgin Birth is all that saves for us the Doctrines of Divine Personality. On this point Science cannot but be our friend and is!

Dr. Ward says with force, "A worthy idea of God is of supreme importance"; and he says this after wondering that this matter did not make as great a stir in circles of theology as that of the Virgin Birth. But what if the doctrine of the Birth is necessary to a worthy idea of Christ? Is not that idea too of supreme importance? Precisely because the modernist belittles Christ, Christians try to defend Him. Having believed His Personality Eternal, they dread those who claim it was only of Joseph. Dr. Ward doubtless shares that mortal horror.

Dr. Ward has an ipse dixit worth commenting on. He says: "Every doctrine which is not capable of expansion and growth is doomed." But manifestly if a doctrine rest on a fact it must ever remain logical to that fact as long as the fact stands. Prove Joseph as father to Jesus and the Virgin Birth falls of course, but until St. Matthew's and St. Luke's Gospel are discarded our faith must rest on the facts as there given. But it is almost a crime in these days not to kowtow to Higher Critics, even though they themselves despise, each, the others' deductions as is witnessed in this very matter. And still we have the Scriptures with us.

The Great Commission

Missionary work is 'no enterprise of pity in which we of the smug and self-satisfied West take a superior religion like a red apple on a long fish pole and hand it to poor miserable degraded heathen. The best definition of missionary work that I know is found in the Book of the Revelation, where the writer is speaking of the New Jerusalem: "They shall bring the glory and the honor of the nations into it." Missionary work is just that, bringing the glory and the honor of the nations into the Kingdom of God.—P. W. Harrison, "The Charm of the Arab," Internat. Rev. Missions, July.

China Not So Slow.

The vestry of one of the Chinese parishes, St. Paul's, Nanking, has voted to adopt the plan of parish organization set forth by our National Council, five laymen agreeing to head the five departments and choosing their co-workers from the congregation. The clergy have general oversight as previously and with the catechists will advise when called upon. The plan gives more responsibility to more lay people than was possible before. There are possibly other Chinese parishes doing this, though Nanking is the first on record. It is the parish where the Rev. J. M. B. Gill was in charge. The Rev. W. A. Seager is there now.

Minnesota Indian Convocation.

The Ojibwa Indians' name for Bishop Bennett is "Hole in the Sky." They would be interested in Stuart Walker's play, "The Triplet." A triplet is the hole that a sun-beam makes in a shadow. The Ojibwa Convocation in the Diocese of Duluth was a splendid success this year, attended by over four hundred people. The services were in the beautiful new log chapel at Cass Lake, where the dignity and sincerity and the whole spirit of the gathering were an inspiration to the visitors, while the poise and lack of self-consciousness of the Indian women were a lesson to their white sisters.

Sao Paulo Mission.

This front-page revolution recently breaking out in the city of Sao Paulo, Brazil, occurred just after the Brazilian diocesan paper brought news of the Rev. Mr. Krischke's new work there. It will be remembered that Bishop Kinsolving transferred the Rev. George O. Krischke from Porto Alegre, where a self-supporting parish had grown up under his care, to Sao Paulo, to start work in that flourishing city, a promising field which the little Brazilian Church has long wanted to enter. Mr. Krischke writes that Sao Paulo is becoming the Chicago of Brazil. It has miles of paved streets, parks, hotels, 6,000 motor cars, etc. The population numbers 600,000 and is rapidly increasing.

The Japanese catechist from Osaka, working under Mr. Krischke's direction among the thousands of Japanese now in Sao Paulo, has instructed two women and five men whom Bishop Kinsolving confirmed, and Mr. Krischke has baptized twelve other Japanese.

There is an English chaplain with an English Church in Sao Paulo. Mr. Krischke is a Brazilian.

As usual, the first effect of a revolution in our newspapers is educational, and we learn from the New York Times that the State of Sao Paulo is one of the richest in all Brazil. It produces two-thirds of the Brazil coffee crop, and Brazil produces three-fourths of the world's supply. The City of Sao Paulo is nearly four hundred years old, founded in 1554.

John Keble's School.

It has been an interesting experience to read in the Church papers lately a letter signed "Charlotte Yonge," and the letter itself is of marked interest. The Church School at Hursley, where John Keble taught for thirty years, has been condemned. Either the sum of 3,000 pounds must be found for a new Church School, or the local education authorities will provide a secular institution. Last year's observance of the ninetieth anniversary of the beginning of the Oxford Movement served to emphasize the place of honor held by John Keble. It is likely that many who feel grateful to him will be glad to share in providing for a continuance of Church instruction in his school. Miss Charlotte T. Yonge, 6 Clifton Terrace, Winchester, England, is receiving donations. When the Sisters who founded our St. Andrew's Priory in Honolulu, left home for that work they spent their last night in England in the Keble rectory.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Editor.

THE WILL FOR PEACE.

We believe it is one of God's laws that every calamity brings with it a corresponding compensation.

It is difficult for us to recognize at close range that the compensation is in proportion to the catastrophe, but in the course of time, which is God's perspective, it usually is.

During the slaughter, destruction and horrors of 1914-15-16 and 17 it seemed that nothing could repay to the world the damage that was being wrought to property, lives and human hearts, but out of that carnival of material and human wreckage something is emerging that will some day be worth the price it cost.

We say that this "something is emerging" because it is not yet fully developed by any means.

We might call what we have in mind "a world viewpoint." It is big and vague, and rather intangible, but it is gradually taking shape and form.

For the present, there is one specific thing that feeds this child born in the throes of a planet's anguish and that one thing comes to us as the direct result of the war, though in opposition to it.

The chief source of nourishment for "the world viewpoint" is world days. There are two of them—the Sunday nearest to July 28 and Armistice Day.

On these two occasions practically all humanity is thinking in terms that reach beyond national limits and attain to the vision of Christ when He told us to pray "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven."

Fortunately, these two occasions have been grasped by the Christian Church as golden opportunities to direct the thought of mankind toward God in the asking of His greatest gift, "Peace on earth and good will toward men."

Peace! A warless world is the one thing that is the really paramount issue, on which every nation can concentrate, and for which all prayers can be offered, and are offered on these two days in the year.

It is coming!

It may sound fantastic, but we believe that these two days are worth all the grief and destruction of those four horrible years, because they present a definite time of the concentration of thought and prayer and desire for peace.

The use of these days on which to will for peace are more important than the world courts or the League of Nations machinery, which is what world courts and the League of Nations are, will follow, but the very best piece of machinery will be ineffective without the desire for peace.

The adoption of the plan set up in the League of Nations has sometimes been compared to the ratification of the Constitution by the several States and it is worth while to remember that, although the Constitution went into effect, and remained in full operation for more than half a century it did not prevent war, when the North and South abandoned the "will to peace" and decided to fight. We were enthusiastic for the entrance of the United States into the League, and we are still. But it is conceivably possible that had we ratified this agreement with a narrow, and more or less unwilling majority in the Senate, and, if our policing of the world had been, first, to protect Poland from Russia, then to rescue Greece from Turkey, and later to shelter her from the wrath of Mussolini that the shibboleth "entangling alliances" on the tongues of such alarmist irreconcilables as Reed, of Mr. Watson of Georgia, in the Democratic party, and Johnson and Borah in the Republican party, would have been so effectively vociferated throughout the country, as to have caused a withdrawal from the pact after its ratification.

Again we reiterate that we are for the League of Nations, but in view of the fact that the Republican party has discarded it in its platform and that the Democratic party did not dare to come out unconditionally for it, although urged to do so in the most eloquent speech that was delivered in the New York convention from a man closely identified with President Wilson and his administration, we believe that it is well nigh a forlorn hope for some years to come.

Let us not lose hope, however; there are other forces working for world peace.

The first and most important of these is the creation of public sentiment to abolish war. We have two shining precedents before us; the first is doing away with duelling. We do not always appreciate that this has only come to pass within the last half century, and that it was still a common practice in many places less than fifty years ago. Our second encouraging precedent is no less than 3,500 miles long. It is the unfortified border line between Canada and the United States, an unprecedented thing in history that has maintained peace between two energetic, ambitious peoples, in spite of boundary disputes and tariff discussions.

Two other forces of a very different nature working toward world peace are aircraft and poison gas. The purpose of war is to bring death to the enemy. These new methods of accomplishing this end are described as follows by one who knows:

"Death as a portable instrument has been taken out of the mud, off the roads, out of the hands and off the backs of soldiers. It has been re-routed, to paths above the earth, just as intelligence, which couriers used to carry on foot or horse, was routed through the air with the invention of the telegraph and radio.

It will, hereafter, be the duty of airplanes to carry paralysis and death to capitals. That inevitably makes war a new thing. To bring all military, political and financial momentum to an end, to produce the inertia of death at the military, political and financial nerve centers of the enemy by one rapid attack of airplanes, that is the simple problem of the military experts of today.

Distance will mean little. No city can long remain inaccessible. Even the United States, bulwarked by oceans, presents no unsolvable problem to the military men. The simplest minded citizen can draw his own picture.

A fleet of submarines comes to the surface twenty miles off the shore. The hatches are opened, and the sea planes are assembled on the decks and loaded with gas bombs. The flock takes flight. An hour later Washington is smothered. The main buildings most likely to contain the President, his Cabinet, the heads of the War and Navy Departments are flooded with the poison gas that means death if it touches the skin. Gas masks won't help. And so everybody in that city who has been working below the sixth stories of the buildings is dead.

And meanwhile, the financial district of New York City has been wiped out in the same way."

Both of these death dealing agencies are being made more perfect every day, thereby adding a practical as well as an ideal incentive to the will for peace.

OLD PARISH IN THE COUNTRY

Anniversary of the Founding of Elizabeth City Parish

THE Three Hundred and Fourteenth Anniversary of the establishment of Elizabeth City Parish, the oldest continuous parish in the history of American Christianity, was held in St. John's Church, Hampton, Va., Sunday, July 20.

The present St. John's Church, built in 1727, is the third church in the parish, the first church being constructed in 1629.

The service was read by the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, rector, assisted by the Rev. A. S. Freese and the Rev. J. K. M. Lee. A detachment of the Soldiers' Home Band assisted the choir. The address was made by the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia, who took as his text, "God is our refuge from one generation to another." A large crowd attended the service in spite of the rain.

The Rev. Charles E. McAllister, the rector, has written the following history of the church:

"The forefathers of our English Christianity after setting up a Cross at Cape Henry made their next stop at the site of the present city of Hampton, then an Indian village called Kecoughtan. Captain John Smith gives a quaint yet interesting description of the place: 'The houses are built like our arbors—of small young springs (sprigs) bowed and tied and so close covered with moss or barks of trees, very handsomely, that notwithstanding either wind, rain or weather, they are warm as stoves, but very smoky, yet at the top of the houses there is a hole made for the smoke to go into right over the fire.' He writes in 1608: 'Six or seven days the extreme wind, frosts and snows caused us to keep Christmas among the savages where we were never merrier or fed on more plenty of good oysters, fish, flesh, wild fowl and good bread, nor never had better fires in England than in the warm smoky houses of Kecoughtan.'

"After a disastrous experience at Jamestown, the colonists returned to Kecoughtan and took possession in 1610, from which time dates the history of the Church in Hampton. The Indians were driven away and the colonists evidently occupied the site of the ancient Indian village.

"The foundations where the service Sunday will be held show the location and size of the first church. The Rev. William Mease was the first rector from 1610-1620.

"John Rolfe tells us that in 1616 it was a place of twenty inhabitants, who seemed to be more industrious than those who remained at Jamestown, and were as a consequence reaping more of the fruits of their labors. In 1616 William Tucker and William Capps represented Kecoughtan in the House of Burgesses and petitioned that body for a change of name. An old chronicler says, 'The year in the House of Burgesses when Jamestown was twelve years old, I guess, some people in pious frame of mind, took a spite at Kecoughtan's name, and suggesting some other names, they made their grudges to old King James, and so the king found a new one, for the fine section and all around'. The name Kecoughtan does not appear in legal documents from this time. The new name Elizabeth City was called after the daughter of King James I.

"About this time the whole number of settlements in Virginia were included in four great corporations of which Elizabeth City was one. This corporation was co-extensive with the parish. Among the early ministers was one James Stockton, who enjoyed the distinction of being, says President Tyler, of William and Mary College, 'The earliest exponent of the idea that the only good Indian is a dead Indian.' Stockton had warned the settlers of the impending massacre of 1622, and aside from the animosity toward the Indians he was apparently a godly and human man.

"In 1623, there lived within the bounds of the parish the first English couple married in Virginia, John Layden, a carpenter, and Anne Burras, a ladies' maid. To whom was born, the first white child in Virginia and baptized in the parish. Virginia Layden was the first English child born in America after Virginia Dare.

"It is interesting to note that when Governor Harvey assumed office on January 18, 1636, he read his new commission in the Church at Elizabeth City.

"A second church was built at Pembroke Farm, about one mile west of the present site of St. John's, somewhat about 1660. This church was built of wood and its foundations have been thoroughly identified. Among the tombs there are Admiral Neville, Thomas Curle, Peter Hayman and the Rev. Andrews Thompson, all before 1700.

"The existence of the present town of Hampton is legally dated from 1691. In 1716 we are told that the congregation was holding services at the Court House. The church of 1667 now being too far away it was decided to build a new church within the limits of the town of Hampton.

"It is of record that a 'Court held Jan. 17, 1727—Present, James Walker, Joshua Curle, James Wallace, Wilson Cary, justices: Mr. Jacob Walker and Mr. John Loury were appointed to lay off an acre and a half of ground at the upper end of Queen street for the building of a church thereon.' This land joined the lot of one Proswells and is the same lot upon which the present church buildings stand. The minister and church wardens of the parish, together with the aforesaid court, entered into a contract with a Mr. Henry Cary to furnish him with wood from the school grounds at the rate of six pence per load to burn bricks for the church.' The bricks were to be English bricks, that is to say, of the shape and character of those made in England. Hence, we suppose arose the fiction long indulged in, that the church and other early colonial buildings were built of bricks brought from England. Until a few years ago there was a large hole in the church yard wherein, it is said, the bricks were made and burned.

"During the American Revolution the belfry was struck by lightning and the royal coat of arms was hurled to the ground, much to the delight of the patriots who saw in this a divine approval of their cause. When Hampton was sacked and burned by the British under Admiral Cockburn the church was desecrated and turned into a barrack. The church began to fall into decay, although a few loyal souls still held as a congregation. In 1827 under the leadership of Bishop Moore, the old walls once more were covered with a roof and the church maintained. During the War Between the States the church was burned along with the other buildings in the community by those loyal to the cause of the Confederacy. Only the walls were left standing, but the services of the parish were conducted at Old Point, at the Court House and in Patrick Henry Hall. In 1869 under the administration of Chaplain McCarthy of the United States Army the church was again restored.

"During the rectorship of the Rev. John J. Gravatt work was started in the neighboring town of Newport News, which has since developed into the strong parish known as St. Paul's in that city. Emmanuel Church, Phoebus, is also a daughter of old St. John's Church, Hampton. Special work among the Negroes of the town began by Dr. Gravatt in 1889 and has developed into the work of St. Cyprian's Church, Hampton. In 1905, with the help of the assistant, the Rev. G. F. Rogers, the work of the church known as Grace Church, Newport News, was undertaken.

"The Rev. Charles E. McAllister, M. A., present rector of the parish, is the forty-second rector in continuous succession. The church possesses the oldest Communion Plate in America. Alexander Brown, author of 'The Genesis of the United States' and of 'The First Republic of America' says of the old plate: 'The cup and small patent of May, 1618-19, are the most ancient, and may be considered the most precious relics in our Church in America.' The vessels used by the Rev. Robert Hunt at Jamestown perished most likely in the Jamestown fire. The handsome Communion vessels at Williamsburg are of a later date, the earliest being marked 1661. The service at St. John's, is dated by the hall mark 1619 and inscribed as follows: 'The Communion Cup for St. Mary's Church in Smith's Hundred in Virginia.' Around the margin of the patent is inscribed 'If any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever (Po. 6).' Smith's Hundred was a large plantation between the Chickahominy and the James Rivers. After the Indian massacre of 1622, these Communion vessels were awarded by the court at James City to South Hampton Hundred Church. This is undoubtedly the present Elizabeth City parish and St. John's Church, Hampton, being the parish church of South Hampton Hundred."

The other service at St. John's were Holy Communion at 8:45; Morning Prayer and sermon by the rector at 11:00.

Church Intelligence

Conference on Evangelism Takes Forward Step.

The findings of the Conference on Evangelism held at Northfield, Mass., June 24-26, have just been announced.

In this place, hallowed by memories of Dwight L. Moody, the conference of denominational secretaries for evangelism, together with other evangelistic leaders, reached decisions which should have far-reaching influence upon the life of all the Churches of the country.

One of the most significant results was the decision to enter unitedly next fall upon a program of increasing Church attendance. The plan has two main objectives; first, to re-interest the absentee Church member who does not take Church attendance seriously as a duty; and, second, to secure the attendance of every possible person in the community who is not now a member of the Church.

The first Sunday in October is suggested as a day for the simultaneous launching of this program throughout the country. This day was chosen because some of the denominations had already selected it as a time for their own special emphasis.

The conference also gave special attention to plans for developing a fall evangelistic program by the pastors and laymen of the churches. During recent years, the period in the spring just preceding Easter has come to be generally accepted as a time for concerted emphasis on evangelism. It was felt that a similar plan needed to be developed for the fall, culminating in a definite attempt to lead men and women into the Church. This would be the climax of the proposed campaign on Church attendance.

The findings of the conference, as unanimously adopted, are as follows:

Proposed Fall Program on Evangelism.

1. Churches and pastors should know their fields. To this end we urge that wherever possible there be a survey of the field this autumn sufficiently thorough to result in a list of the names of all in the community who ought to be reached by the Church. Where there is more than one Church in the community the survey can be made co-operatively, each Church receiving the names of those who express a preference for it or are its normal responsibility. If a Survey is not undertaken, there should be at least an assembling of as many names as possible of people in the community who are not members of any Church, placing these names on a prospect list. Such names can be secured from the various members of the Church, the Sunday School, public school lists, etc.

2. There should be in every Church this autumn a special period of "friendly visitation" in the homes of the community, carried on by a group appointed for that purpose, designed to enlist fresh interest among those who are already Church members, and to invite to the Church those who are not.

3. We commend the growing practice of holding a Church "Rally Day" in the fall, on which day special attention is given to securing the attendance of all in the community, and seeking to interest them in the life and work of the Church. There is special advantage in a concerted observance of this day. In view of the fact that the first Sunday in October is already observed as "Rally Day" among many Churches and Bible Schools, we suggest the observance of this date as widely as practical, with Sunday, September 21, or any time in the intervening two weeks used as a visitation period.

4. Every Church should have a definite plan for extending to every unchurched person in the community a personal invitation to become a member of the Church. This plan should not be a plan of the minister alone. His part is to inspire men and women to desire to do the work of personal evangelism and to organize his members in a systematic way for a definite personal evangelistic program. We commend the plan of setting aside a special period in which those outside the Church will be visited by laymen and urged to become Christians.

There should be at least a brief period of training for those who are to carry on this program of personal evangelism in the local Church. Such services by laymen will result not only in securing permanent accessions to the Church, but also in enriching the religious experience of all who participate.

5. We believe that there should be a definite attempt on the part of all Churches to secure an autumn ingathering, planning just as specifically for this as for the ingathering in the pre-Easter season.

The following resolution, adopted by the conference and conveyed to Dr. Charles L. Goodell, who served as the host of the conference, expressed the common judgment as to the value of the gathering:

That we express our deepest appreciation to the Federal Council for their gracious hospitality during the Retreat and that we express our deep desire to have another Retreat next year if such can possibly be arranged.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

The Piedmont Convocation will hold its Fall Meeting at Emmanuel Church, Rapidan, Tuesday, October 7.

There will be a Laymen's Conference meeting held at St. Margaret's School, Tappahannock, Va., of all the churches and missions in the Rappahannock Valley Convocation on Tuesday, August 5, beginning at eleven o'clock, for the purpose of forming a laymen's organization in this Convocation. Able laymen speakers will be present, and all laymen are cordially invited to come from each of the forty-three churches and missions. Come, let us reason together.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D.

The preacher at the open-air service at the Washington Cathedral on Sunday, July 20, was the Rt. Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Bishop of the Diocese of New York. Bishop Shipman was the preacher also at the eleven o'clock service at Trinity Diocesan Church.

The Rev. R. L. Wolven, of Epiphany Parish, conducted the sunset service at Holiday House, the vacation home for girls under the auspices of the Girls' Friendly Society, on Sunday, July 20. These services are held every Sunday afternoon during the summer months.

The opening of St. Agnes' School in Alexandria, Va., will be of interest to the neighbors across the Potomac who are interested in Church Schools.

St. Agnes' School will be operated under the Church guidance in the old George Mason High School building and students of any denomination may enroll. Only day students will be enrolled the first year, but it is expected that boarding pupils will be taken later. Courses from primary grades through the second year of high school will be available. This school will be under the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Virginia, and the Rev. William J. Morton, of Alexandria, is a member of the board of trustees.

The building and installation of the new organ to be placed in the new Gunton Temple Presbyterian Church is under the direction of Edgar Priest, Washington Cathedral organist. Mr. Priest is engaged also in the consideration of plans and specifications for the organ to be placed in the great Washington Cathedral, for which $100,000 has been given for the cost of the organ.

M. M. W.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Camp "Robert Hunt," the Diocesan Camp of Southern Virginia, is now under construction, and we hope to have it ready for use early in August. It will be available for boys and girls and young men and women for periods of seven days. Our plan is to have the Camp used by boys one week and girls another week.

The Rev. Philip Tilghman and his wife have been engaged as Camp Director and Camp Mother, and all correspondence as to reservations should be addressed to him at 517 Law Building, Norfolk, Va.

The camp will remain open until September 15.

Emmanuel, Powhatan.

On the sixth of August a service of great interest is to be held in this church, when the rector, the Rev. C. E. Stewart, is to be ordained priest. The ordination will be by Bishop Tucker. The Rev. Beverley B. Tucker, Jr., D. D., of St. Paul's, Richmond, will preach the sermon, and Archdeacon Ribble will present the candidate.

Cumberland Parish, Lunenburg.

For the summer months these three churches at Victoria, Woodend and Kenbridge are again under the care of Mr. Reginald Davis, a "second-year" Seminary student. He is to return next summer after ordination, according to an understanding with the Bishop, as permanent rector.

In order that plans for the new $300,000 building for St. Luke's Episcopal Church, Norfolk, may go forward without delay a strong drive is being made to raise $3,000 immediately to pay an architect to draft plans during the summer.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial Window in St. John's, Bedford.

This illustration of the memorial window, "The Resurrection," represents one of the most beautiful windows recently completed by the Lamb Studios, of New York. This window was unveiled Sunday, June 8, in St. John's Church, the Rev. W. A. Pearman, rector, of Bedford, Va. The window is over thirty feet in height above the main entrance of the church, and brings out in unique fashion the two Gospel stories of the early visits to the sepulchre Easter morn. The memorial is to all the old members of the parish, contributions for which were received from all sections of the country, and the window bears this inscription, "To all the Saints who from their labors Rest," and underneath the two side panels the word, "Alleluia," appears. St. John's Church celebrated its seventy-fifth anniversary last September, so that the erection of their new church and the dedication of this noble memorial may be taken as part of the diamond jubilee. The window was designed and executed under the personal supervision of Charles Rollinson Lamb.

Executive Board.

The regular day for the monthly meetings of the Executive Board of the Diocese has been changed from the third Friday to the second Thursday in each month. Also the hour has been set at 10:30 A. M. This will give opportunity for the various departments to have short sessions just before the Board meetings.

Additions to Diocesan Department.

The Rev. Karl M. Block, D. D., of Roanoke, the Rev. Churchill J. Gibson, of Lexington, and Mr. M. A. Smythe, of Roanoke, have been appointed Associate Members of the Department of Religious Education, and Dr. Block has been elected Executive Secretary of the Department.

Valuable Workers Leave.

To the deep regret of all those who knew them best and were most intimately acquainted with their work, Miss Mabel Hicks and Miss Miriam Cochran have found it necessary to sever their connection with the mission work at Dante and to return to their homes in Massachusetts at the end of June.

During the time they spent at this important point in the coal fields in the southwestern part of this Diocese these ladies have rendered invaluable services as assistants to Deaconess Maria P. Williams, who is in charge of the local work under the Rev. H. H. Young, Dean of Associate Missions.

Miss Hicks first came to the Diocese as a volunteer worker, spending about ten weeks at Keokee in 1917. After the completion of her training at the New York Deaconess School, she spent the summer of 1918 at Dante. She then spent a short time in her home State and returned to Dante in November, 1918, since which time she has been a member of the mission staff there, specializing in religious instruction and work among young people, in both of which departments she has been eminently successful.

Miss Cochran spent the summer of 1921 as a volunteer worker at Grace House-on-the-Mountain. Since July 1, 1922, she has been located at Dante, where she taught music in the public schools. She made her home, however, at the Mission and rendered splendid assistance in its work.

Both of these ladies will be greatly missed in the community and the Diocese which they have served so faithfully and well.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Bishop.

A national memorial of Bishop White will be erected at Valley Forge in connection with the Washington Memorial Chapel. The memorial will be a Sunday-school building, as Bishop White was the Father of the American Sunday School. The Bishop White National Memorial Association, of which Bishop Tuttle was the first president, is back of the movement. The work will be done through a national commission, made up of diocesan representatives. The Association has published an attractive booklet telling of Bishop White's difficulties and accomplishments in his work for the youth of America.

The Bishop of Pennsylvania has fixed October 10-19 as the dates within which the diocese will conduct its intensive campaign with a view of raising its quota of approximately a quarter of a million dollars for the Japan Reconstruction Fund.

There is both strength and weakness in the fact that this great diocese, by a similar campaign held this spring, successfully raised over a million dollars for the Philadelphia Divinity School; weakness, in that it puts a strain on the diocese in its giving capacity, and its workers in their resources; on the other hand, there is tremendous strength in the realization that we did it successfully once and we believe we can do it again, even within the year.

The diocese feels that it has a position of responsibility in the fact that it is, we believe, the first of the big dioceses to hold such a campaign for this purpose, and that it will be followed in November by quite a number of other important dioceses who will look to us to set the pace. The sum of $250,000, which we have set as our goal, is the usual one-tenth of the whole which the Diocese of Pennsylvania is accustomed to assume. The majority mind of the diocese appears to regard the matter as one of very great importance and privilege. There is the finest kind of feeling of confident optimism.

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

The third meeting of the Executive Council of the Diocese of Western North Carolina, was held on July 22 at Trinity Parish House, Asheville, with the Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. Junius M. Horner, D. D., presiding. The following constitute the various departments: Missions, the Rev. S. B. Stroup, the Rev. A. S. Farnum, Dr. P. R. Moale; Religious Education, the Rev. J. W. C. Johnson, the Rev. C. P. Burnett, the Rev. W. G. Clark, Mr. F. P. Bacon, Mr. Haywood Parker; Social Service, the Rev. W. G. Clark, Mr. W. L. Balthis, the Rev. A. G. B. Bennett; Publicity, the Rev. A. G. B. Bennett, Mr. Haywood Parker, the Rev. A. W. Farnum; Finance, Mr. Vance Brown, Mr. W. L. Balthis, Mr. Michael Schenck.

The Department of Religious Education reported having arranged for a Summer School to be held at Valle Crucis, August 23-29. The faculty will include Miss Mabel Lee Cooper, Dr. William Sturgis, of New York, Dr. H. W. Starr and Dr. Walter Mitchell, of Charleston.

Bulletin No. 41 on Diocesan Publicity, issued by the National Council, was discussed and upon motion definite action was proposed for the next meeting of the Bishop and Council.

At the preceding meeting matters of interest were: the congratulations proffered the Rev. S. B. Stroup, Secretary of the Council, on his parish, the Church of the Ascension, Hickory, becoming self-supporting; a report on the Lake Kanuga property, as a proposed site for Church Assembly grounds; and endorsement of the drive in this diocese for Thompson Orphanage, in Charlotte, a tri-diocesan institution.

At present the Diocese of Western North Carolina has the largest staff of clergy in its history, comprising thirty-seven clergymen.

The budget for the Diocese for the ensuing year will be prepared at the next meeting, which is scheduled for September 4, at Trinity Parish House, Asheville.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Robert Wilson, M. D., D. D., died at his home in Charleston on July 21. Dr. Wilson served parishes in Maryland before coming to this diocese, and had studied medicine before going into the ministry, and had written several books on religious subjects.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, D. D., Coadjutor.

St. John's, Ensley, and Grace, Woodlands: The Rt. Rev. Dr. C. M. Beckwith, Bishop of Alabama, administered confirmation and preached at 11 A. M. on Sunday, June 20. And on the afternoon of the same day at 4 P. M., laid the cornerstone of what promises to be a handsome stone building, of about four or five times the capacity of the old wooden church of Grace Parish, Woodlawn, a suburb of Birmingham. Carl Henckell, rector. The rector, together with the rectors of St. Mary's and St. John's, severally, assisted the Bishop, who made a ten-minute talk much to the point, based on the postulate that there were two basal institutions that money could not build, the Home and the Church.

Ministers of the several churches of Woodlawn walked in the procession and joined in the service.

UPPER SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Bishop.

The First Teacher Training Conference of the Diocese of Upper South Carolina closed a most successful session of two weeks, on July 13. This conference was under the direction of the Diocesan Department of Religious Education, of which the Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, is the Chairman. The Conference was held at "Camp Capers, at Etowah, near Hendersonville, in the mountains of North Carolina: It followed immediately upon the Young People's Camp, which was carried on on the same site.

The conference was small, as the total enrollment was less than fifty, but the work done was most encouraging and the spirit of the faculty and scholars was all that could be desired. The success of this year is causing the Diocesan authorities to look forward to larger enrollment and still better work during the summer of 1925.

The Staff of the Camp consisted of the Bishop; the Chairman of the Department of Religious Education; the Rev. A. R. Morgan, assistant director of the Conference; Mrs. Frank N. Challen, Dean of the Woman's Department; Miss Theodora Young, Registrar; Mrs. J. Q. Davis, Treasurer; and Miss Laura Ebaugh and Mr. Francis Steadman, who were the Recreational Directors.

The faculty consisted of the Bishop of the Diocese and the Rt. Rev. Theodore DuBose Bratton, D. D., Bishop of Mississippi; who, together, held the Bible Hour each day; Mr. Leon Palmer, Superintendent of the S. C. Sunday-School Association, who delivered two addresses on Church School Administration; the Rev. Thomas P. Noe, who conducted a most instructive class on the Prayer Book; Miss Annie Morton Stout, a member of the Seawannee Summer School Faculty and Director of Religious Education in Calvary Church, Memphis, Tennessee, and who was our distinguished visitor and able instructor in two classes each day—one on "The Pupil," and one on the Christian Nurture Series; Mrs. William P. Cornell, Headquarters Secretary, who led a class on "Missions in the Church School"; Mrs. M. B. Hutchinson, the Chairman of the Department of Religious Education of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary to the National Council, who held a normal class on "The Teacher," in a most helpful way; Mrs. Alexander Long, who showed most conclusively what an opportunity for religious education exists in the University town, where the Church School is properly organized for service; Miss Theodora Young, the Diocesan Supervisor and President of the Church School Service League, led a training class on the work of the League and Miss Edith Main, the consecrated Mission worker of St. Timothy's Mission in Spartanburg, gave most interesting and helpful demonstrations of hand work in the Church School.

The courses on the Pupil and the Teacher, and that on the Prayer Book were Credit Courses, and the workers of the Diocese are being urged to take the necessary examinations that will make them "Accredited Teachers" with the National Department of Religious Education.

No report of the conference would be complete without a most affectionate mention of the Rev. John Chapman, the brother-in-law of the Rev. Mr. Pendleton, and a missionary to Kyoto, now on furlough in this country. To Mr. Chapman the conference owes a debt of real and lasting gratitude, for his charming personality and spirit, as well as for his most interesting talks on the mission field of Japan.

The daily routine of the camp began at six A. M., when the rising whistle blew. At 6:30 the campers gathered on the Assembly Hill or on the front porch—according as the weather permitted—for morning prayer and a short and helpful address. Seven o'clock was the breakfast hour, this was followed by the "policing" of the camp and the consequent "inspection" of all quarters. The Conference sessions began at 8:45 and lasted till 12:45. Dinner followed, then a rest period and recreation. The evenings were devoted to addresses, and to programs of both serious and diversional natures.

The general atmosphere of the conference was one of serious and reverent purpose, and the Diocesan authorities feel that a new day has dawned for the workers in Religious Education in the Diocese of Upper South Carolina.

NORTH TEXAS.

At a meeting of the Council of Advice, July 13, Bishop Howden presiding, the Rev. R. N. MacCallum, rector of St. Andrew's, Amarillo, was elected president of that body and Mr. Henry S. Gooch secretary.

St. Andrew's Parish Church of Amarillo was consecrated by Bishop Howden, who is temporarily in charge of the District of North Texas, on Sunday, July 13. There were in the chancel the rector, the Rev. R. N. MacCallum, the Rev. E. C. Seaman of Gadsden, Ala., a former rector of St. Andrew's, the Rev. R. E. Brock of Clovis, N. M., the Rev. L. L. Swan of Clarendon, and the Rev. E. H. J. Andrews of Plainview. The senior warden of the parish, Mr. H. W. Galbraith, read the Instruments of Donation and Endowment, and the Rev. R. N. MacCallum the Sentence of Consecration. An inspiring sermon was preached by the Rev. E. C. Seaman from the answer of Our Lord to His parents: "Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's House?" Mr. Seaman had much to do in former years in the work of building up St. Andrew's and is greatly beloved in North Texas. Twenty persons were confirmed at this service, and several others at the night service, at which Bishop Howden preached.

A number of memorial and thank-offering gifts have recently been made to St. Mark's Church, Plainview (the Rev. E. H. J. Andrews, priest-in-charge). These include a beautiful silk Church Flag for processional purposes, presented by Miss Jane Ely, of Elizabeth N. J., in memory of her sister, Florence; an oak reredos from the workshops of R. Geissler, Inc., of New York; a white marble font, the gift of Judge and Mrs. Meade F. Griffin; and a silver baptismal shell, a thank-offering of the parents of two children baptized on Easter Day. A brass processional cross has also been promised and is being selected. Other gifts are in prospects.

Old Delaware Church Celebrates Anniversary.

The two hundredth and seventh anniversary of St. James Church, Stanton, Del., was celebrated on July 25. The Rev. Ernest A. Rich, rector, celebrated the Holy Communion at 7 A. M. At 10:30 o'clock the celebrant and preacher was the Rev. Joseph H. Earp, rector of Immanuel Church, New Castle, Del., the Mother Church of all the Episcopal Parishes in Delaware. At 3 P. M. addresses were made by the Rev. R. P. Mathews, D. D., rector of St. Thomas' Church, Newark, and Mr. John S. Goohe, the venerable secretary of the Diocese of Delaware, and treasurer of its Executive Council. A pageant entitled, "The Little Pilgrim and Mother Church," was presented on the lawn of the church, under the direction of Miss Frances Hagner and Miss Isabelle Wagner, of the Bishop's Diocesan staff.

A luncheon was served under the trees on the lawn of the church at noon by the ladies of the parish.

St. Andrew's, Wilmington, Makes Improvements.

Through the generosity of some twenty parishioners four years ago St. Andrew's Church, Wilmington, Del., acquired a rectory, upon which the parish has this summer made extensive improvements. The Church and Parish House have likewise been repainted and repaired. Seven years ago the parish house was built, representing an investment of $55,000, a debt amounting to $25,000 has now been reduced to $2,600. Gifts of new lighting system and new Prayer Books and Hymnals throughout the Church have just been announced. The church floor has been recarpeted and pew cushions recovered. With these improvements the whole property of St. Andrew's Church will be in better condition than for many years.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., Coadjutor.

Old St. John's. An interesting service was held Sunday afternoon, July 20 at St. John's Church, Brooke County, the first in twelve or fifteen years. St. John's is the first Episcopal Church in this section of West Virginia, built on the western side of the Allegheny Mountains. The first building, a log church, was erected in 1792 by the Rev. Joseph Doddridge, who lived in Wellsburg or Charleston, as it was then called. Mr. Doddridge exercised an itinerant ministry as well as performing the offices of a physician in this, then sparsely settled, country. He initiated the Episcopal Church in Steubenville, Wheeling, Wellsburg, West Liberty, Moundsville and established the Parish of St. James in Ohio. The present structure, called St. John's, still in good repair, was consecrated by Bishop Johns of Virginia in 1849. It is said to have cost $1,000. Bishop Meade, of Virginia, and Bishop Chase, of Ohio, at intervals visited St. John's, as also Bishops Peterkin, Gravatt and Strider of West Virginia. The death of old members, the removal of many, the building of the town of Follansbee, four miles to the west, and the establishing of the church there led to the discontinuance of services at St. John's. On this Sunday afternoon, despite the heat, the church was filled to the doors by people of different faiths, from many surrounding points. The Episcopal choirs from Wellsburg and Follansbee combined for the occasion. An eloquent sermon was preached by Bishop-Coadjutor R. E. L. Strider and the service was read by the Rev. C. G. Cogley of Christ Church, Wellsburg. Every one was delighted with the service in this old church and expressed a desire for another.

In the evening Bishop Strider visited the Church of the Good Shepherd. Follansbee for the second time in six months, preached and confirmed several men.

PITTSBURGH.

On Sunday morning, July 20, at 11, in St. Stephen's Church, Wilkesburg, Pa., Mr. John Stanley Taylor was presented for ordination to the diaconate by the rector, the Rev. William Porkess, D. D. The special preacher for the occasion was the Rt. Rev. Alexander Mann, D. D., the Bishop of the Diocese. The sermon was of such a high order as to be in complete harmony with the greatness of the event. There was an exceptionally large congregation present, including a delegation from the Laymen's Missionary League of the Diocese, the latter forming a part of the procession. Dr. Porkess, in addition to presenting the candidate, also read the Litany and assisted the Bishop in the celebration. Mr. Taylor was presented by the vestry of the parish with a silk cassock, girdle and set of stoles. An exquisite linen surplice was given him by St. Stephen's Altar Guild. The candidate-elect begins his ministry immediately as the rector of Trinity Church, Rochester, Pa. Mr. Taylor, for seventeen years, filled the position of instructor in the heat treatment of steel, at Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburgh. As a worker in connection with the Laymen's Missionary League, he holds a rare record, his length of service registering eighteen years, averaging three services a month, visiting eighteen different mission stations, in many cases more than once, and also with visits on various occasions to some of the city parishes. It is of special interest to note that the performance of this League work has meant covering 19,008 miles and ministering to congregations aggregating 12,960. And it has always been a work of love, for he has borne entirely his own traveling expenses. On October 1, 1923, Mr. Taylor was appointed by the rector of St. Stephen's as Lay Assistant, and served in that capacity up to his ordination. He is the second man from this parish to enter Holy Orders during Dr. Porkess' rectorship. A third man is now in one of our Seminaries and a fourth goes to St. John's College, Greeley, Colorado, in September. These four men are the real fruit of a parish that is characteristically missionary spirited, regularly sending in its missionary funds, month by month, with the same promptitude as the payment of the rector's stipend. And further, a parish that, for several years, has emphasized Religious Education, through a well organized Church School, and also standard giving on the part of a number of parishioners.

A remarkable instance of long continued and devoted service in Sunday-school work has lately been brought to light in the Church School of St. Peter's Parish, Uniontown, by the death of Miss Selina Fenn, who, with her sister, Dinah, had from early womanhood been connected with Sunday-school work there, as teachers and officers. When shortly after the celebration of her eighty-ninth birthday, Miss Selina was reappointed Treasurer of the Sunday School, which position she had occupied for a long period of years, she demurred at accepting the responsibility because of increasing age and infirmities, the authorities insisted she continue as long as her health permitted. Miss Dinah, who is now eighty-seven years of age, was obliged to retire a few years ago on account of failing health.

The Conneaut Conference for Church Workers.

The Conneaut Lake Conference for Church Workers of the Dioceses of Pittsburgh and Erie was held at Conneaut Lake Park, from July 7 to July 18. This was the eleventh annual conference. The Rt. Rev. Doctors Alexander Mann and John C. Ward acted as Chaplains. The Rev. E. J. Owen, D. D., of Sharon, was Chairman, and Miss Charlotte F. Forsyth, Executive Secretary. The Rev. T. J. Bigham was Registrar for the Diocese of Pittsburgh, and the Rev. Harold Jenkins for the Diocese of Erie. The Rev. Robert N. Meade, D. D., was Dean of the Faculty.

The courses given were on "How to Teach," by the Rev. Rodney Brace, of Canonsburg; "Church School Ideals," by the Rev. James L. Ware, of Warren; "How to Tell Stories," by Mrs. T. J. Bigham, Pittsburgh; "How to Run a Church School," by the Rev. Dr. Robert N. Meade, of Pittsburgh; "How to Train the Devotional Life," by the Rev. Dr. W. F. Shero, of Greensburg; "The Church School Service League," by Miss Charlotte E. Forsyth, Superintendent of Religious Education in the Diocese of Pittsburgh; "Handwork," by the Rev. and Mrs. Herbert Jukes, of Pittsburgh. Under the subject of Social Service, there were courses on "Rural Sociology," by the Rev. Dr. G. Walter Fiske, of Oberlin College; and on "Pastoral Care and Social Service," by the Rev. J. C. H. Sauber, Social Service Secretary of the Diocese of Pittsburgh; and "The Church and Foreign Born Girls" and "The Church and its Girls," by Miss Dunn and Miss Woodward, from New York. Under the head of Missions, there was a course on "China," by Miss Margaret Marston, Field Secretary for Religious Education in the Diocese of Massachusetts; and a course on "Methods of Auxiliary Work," by Mrs. W. W. Wishart, Diocesan Head of the Girls' Friendly of the Diocese of Pittsburgh.

For the Young People, Bishop Mann had a class on "Why I Am a Churchman." There was a special course on "Religious Drama," looked after by the Rev. Messrs. Ware, Roberts and Hatch, and Miss Mildred Leach, and Pageantry by the Rev. Lester Leake Riley, of Pittsburgh.

There were conferences for the clergy by Bishops Ward and Mann, with a daily round table for clergymen. The Rev. Dr. Loaring Clark, of the Field Department of the National Council, was in attendance, and held conferences on the Nation-Wide Campaign, and made missionary addresses at the evening sunset services. A special course on "The Work of Altar Guilds" was given by the Rev. Walter N. Clapp, of Pittsburgh, and the Conference Choral was under the care of Mr. Harold Phillips, organist and choirmaster of Trinity Church, Pittsburgh. The Rev. Donal Kent Johnston, of Uniontown, gave a series of addresses in the evenings on "Psychology."

Classes were held from nine to one o'clock, and the afternoons were given over to recreation, which consisted of swimming, bathing, canoeing, golf, tennis, dancing, and trips around the lake in launches. There were three moonlight rides on the lake which proved very enjoyable.

The Holy Communion was celebrated by Bishops Ward and Mann on alternate mornings, and the Sunday morning service at eight was preceded on Saturday night by a service of preparation conducted by Bishop Ward. Christ Church, Meadville, the parish nearest to Conneaut, invited the Conference to attend the Sunday morning service there, and provided two trolley cars for transporting the people. The sermon was preached by Bishop Mann.

The registration at the conference was as follows: Diocese of Pittsburgh, 125; Diocese of Erie, 131; outside the Diocese, 8; total, 263. This is the largest enrollment the Conference has ever had in the eleven years of its history.

During the Conference a movement was inaugurated to provide a suitable portable altar for the use of the conference at its religious services, and gifts were made for that purpose. The altar is to be of wood, carved and ornamented with color and gilding, and provided with candlesticks to match, and an altar cross, to be known as "The Conference Cross"; and is to bear the inscription, "To the Glory of God, and in Loving Memory of Bishop Whitehead." Bishop Whitehead for many years presided over the entire territory Collect for Seventh Sunday After Trinity.

Lord of all Power and Might, Who art the Author and Giver of all good things; graft in our hearts the love of Thy Name, increase in us true religion, nourish us with all goodness, and of Thy great mercy keep us in the same; through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Collect for the Transfiguration of Christ.

O God, Who on the Mount didst reveal to chosen witnesses Thine only begotten Son wonderfully transfigured, in raiment white and glistening: Mercifully grant that we, being delivered from the quietude of this world, may be permitted to behold the King in His beauty, Who with Thee, O Father, and Thee, O Holy Ghost, liveth and reigneth, one God world without end. Amen.

The Shining of His Presence.

"He was transfigured before them: . . . His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light."—Mark 9-2.

My soul was stricken in sorrow,
Great fear oppressed my heart;
I prayed: and He gave me a vision.
A mountain, high, apart:

A mountain, cloud-enfolded
(Through clouds, pale glories shine:)
And One stood transfigured before me,
My Lord—my King Divine!

In His face, as the sun in its brightness,
Love, grace and power are seen:
His garment, as light in its whiteness
Is like no earthly sheen.

O Christ! for me transfigured!
Adoring, I kneel at Thy feet,
Ah, who am I, that such glory
Such rapture, my eyes should greet?

Thou dost show me Thyself, my Saviour,
Thou hast given my spirit sight;
In an hour of dread came the shining,
The flash of Thy raiment white!

And there falls in benediction
A Voice from the mountain apart:
"My Son, My Beloved, is with thee,
O child, give Him all thy heart!"

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

Strife Among the Disciples.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

The departure from Bethany would be late. They, therefore, went through the valley below Olivet, Valley of the Shadow of Death, about dark. Symbolism so obvious, even to us, would not be lost on Him. They then went up the hill into the city. Ancient cities were dark. A dish of oil with a lighted rag in it was their best indoor illumination, and little or no light came out of doors. The Paschal full moon, however, ballooning up into the heavens, promised a silver night.

When they reached John Mark's house they trooped up the outside stairs to the guest-room. "And there arose a contention among them which of them was accounted greatest." Such a contention, when people are seating themselves at a dinner-table, takes the form of a dispute as to place. At its end we find Judas occupying the most honorable, John the next, and Peter the humblest of all. We infer that the contest arose between Judas and Peter, that the two most honorable places were originally assigned to Peter and John, and that Peter and John were the two who prepared the feast. This seems the only formal meal at which Our Lord was ever host. At any rate, it was the first Passover supper at Jerusalem. Place therefore seemed to them important, as foreshadowing their relative positions in His coming Kingdom.

Judas had already judged Our Lord, decided that He was a hopeless failure unless assisted, and determined to drive Him into a corner. He would force Our Lord either to save Himself or to perish, much as we kill a wounded animal or pull down a tottering wall. That his plan should not be suspected it was imperative that Judas should seem anxious for the chief place.

Simon Peter could not bear this. All knew something was wrong with Judas, though not its ghastliness. He would not permit that Judas should recline next Our Lord. Judas necessarily insisted. Simon Peter's primacy, if there were any, except that he was captain of the boat, was vague and shadowy. The one definite official position was the treasurer'ship.

Judas was "a devil" and had been so for a year, and "Satan had entered into him," twenty-four hours before; yet Our Lord, by mentioning twelve thrones made a last offer unmistakably apply to him. The necessary inference is intermittent possession. The devil was not always in him. Judas' treachery was not yet irrevocable. He might draw back and remain one of the twelve, occupy one of the thrones and judge one of the tribes. If, as we think, he could not repent, it was still right that he should have this opportunity, that the fact of his having lost the power to repent might be made plain. If, as many hold, the glimmering of penitence remained, then here, as elsewhere, the New Testament is the Book of Lost Opportunity.

Of course, from Judas' point of view, promises are cheap. The offer was only a promise. Our Lord watched him a moment and then the meal began.

Now this is tragedy. Nothing in Greek drama approaches it. Nothing in world-literature touches it. If Judas' soul were not lost before, it was lost now, and Jesus, knowing all, must suffer his close presence, the Saviour with the Lost.

TO THOSE WHO FOLLOW HIM.

The two letters that follow have been sent us for publication. To any one who follows Him. Whose hands touched them in healing when none other would go near, the work among lepers must especially appeal. All contributions, however small, will be gratefully received and acknowledged by Miss E. P. Meriwether, Treasurer Richmond Branch Leper Mission, 2346 W. Grace Street, Richmond, Va.

George Hodges is a leper who lived near Richmond. He is now living at U. S. Marine Hospital, in Louisiana. George is a Greek.

April 15, 1924.

Dear Mrs. C.:

I have received your postal card, it date March 15 last. I was very glad to hear from you and glad you are well, and excuse me for not answer your, because ill at time, and than the doctor his trying some new medision et makes me very sick for few days, and I jist getting better now, and the Doctor say de that the new tretemente do me good, and some of the other patie'nts has take the medision, it do them a good. And the contractor bilding up the new house I guess bout June, with they going to pot up, and give my best regard to Mr. Clarke and Miss Meriwether and to Dr. Levy and to all the friends. I am close with very best wishes of a good luck to yours and to all the friends.

GEORGE HODGES.

Kwangju, Korea.

Dear Mrs. H.:

I cannot tell you how much I appreciate your nice long letter and the interest you have in our work here. It has been a long time since you wrote me, but I am sure you have remembered the work we are doing for the lepers. One of the most delightful parts of this work is the fact that we find so many good friends in the U. S. A. who help us in every way.

There are many things I could tell you about the lepers but I hope to see you before long and tell you personally about this work here. Our family of lepers has now grown to 575 and we could at any time increase it to 1,000. They are here every day begging to get into the colony and we have to turn them away. When there is snow on the ground and the lepers come leaving blood behind them one finds it mighty hard to say no, and just because we do have to say that the work grows harder all the time. If I had time I could write a small pamphlet every month and I know now of many things I would like to tell our friends, but with more work than I can do all the time I find it quite hard.

There is nothing I desire more than the prayers of those who love Him and who when they pray have power with Him. We have to fight the devil out here in the open where he has reigned supreme for thousands of years and I believe it is harder than at home. However we know that our Saviour fought him in the wilderness and when we find ourselves in the wilderness with the devil we have Him Who has all power in His hands.

Your friend,

J. KELLY UNGER.

Summer Vacation.

The warm days have come on, and the lure of the woods and the water will have its customary effect in drawing people away from the city on Sunday. This has become so much a recognized matter that our consciences utter hardly a protest against such use of the one day in the week which we call holy. Oftentimes when people are forced to excuse their actions, one meets the rejoinder that it is quite possible to worship God in the woods and by the streams as well as in Church. Now no one denies the possibility of such worship, but any sensible person will deny the fact. As a matter of fact, people do not worship when they are in the woods on Sunday. They spend the day in such pleasures and recreations as are good for the tired mind and body, but which have but little impression on the spiritual life and do not bring one into conscious relationship with the Divine Being.

This, after all, is the meaning of worship; that one comes consciously and deliberately into the presence of God, with such acts of adoration, thanksgiving, and petition as are the expressions of one's attitude to the Heavenly Father. This God wants of us as the parent wants the feel of the childish arms and the sound of the childish voice in the simple words of love and affection. Sunday is the one day that God has asked that we should give in special recognition of His claims. Civilization, we believe, cannot disregard this the Divine claim without peril to its own spiritual life.

Many of our people go into the country for the summer, and it is not often convenient for them to come into town for the Sunday services. In such a case, if there are no other facilities, the father should be the priest in his own household and; with Prayer Book in hand, should lead the devotions of the family. Such a practice would relieve the summer of that feeling of Godlessness which marks it when there is no corporate recognition on the part of the family of their religious life and character.

On the other hand, there are many not so fortunate as to possess cottages in the country, and for whom Sunday is, perhaps, the only day of recreation. In this age of work and worry and overstrain, some relaxation is necessary. Many can get it only on Sunday. But here, too, it should be the recognition that recreation to be properly recreation should go deeper than to touch merely the mind and the body. It must touch the spirit as well.

The conclusion of the whole matter is this: that those who are in cottages out of town attend some service of the Church if possible, if not that the father of the family read service in his own household. And for those whose work makes Sunday the only day of recreation, let it be their rule to be in Church at least once. This would sanctify the day, give spiritual refreshment, and make more keen the enjoyment which would come in the woods or on the water.—Seattle Churchman.

CHINA, A COUNTRY OF CONTRASTS.

Frances L. Garside.

The old (centuries old) and the new; great wealth and inconceivable poverty; a telegraph office on one corner, and on the other a man reading aloud to the throngs who cannot read for themselves, and get their bit of news of the world in this old, old fashion; a modern hospital on one side of the street and on the other families living where spirits are invoked to affect cures; down the street a playground with girls in low-heeled sensible shoes and an adaptation of the mid-dy suit, running, leaping and swinging from bars; peeping through the gate at them, a girl with bound feet.

"Life in China," writes Miss Ruth A. Hoople, secretary for the Young Women's Christian Association, in Tsinan, "never loses its zest. Each day brings its adventure and its problems and unsolved questions. Our neighborhood is full of them."

The little street down which she passes to reach the Y. W. C. A. headquarters is lined with little one-room shops, where the owners live, as well as preside over their wares. The houses are very tiny, made of mud and straw, with bare earth for the floor and so crowded are these little places that the Buddhist shrine, with its candle and incense, hangs high on the wall, for there is no room on the floor. In winter these little homes are so cold there is great suffering, but in summer the family live out of doors, doing both the cooking and the washing in the courtyard.

"The women know us," continues Miss Hoople, "and rise and bow as we pass along the street. The women are working hard on sewing which they take in regularly. While we talk their fingers are busy putting fast, neat stitches in coarse blue cotton garments, for in order to make ten cents a day they must keep steadily at work. One sewer who has lived in Tsinan two years finds the difference in thimbles a hindrance. She was used to a piece of wood held in the palm of her hand. Now that it is worn out she has had to get the more sophisticated city product, a wide ring, that fits on the second joint of the finger, and her finger tip is sore because she can't get used to it."

Sometimes on fine days these women take their washing to the river, and this makes them too tired to come to the Y. W. C. A. classes at night, but even because hard work and lack of strength often prevents attendance at the classes, twenty-two pencils were given as prizes to the girls and women who had missed class only three times since school began a few months ago.

To earn these pencils it was necessary to come to school five nights a week; six of the girls work in hair-net factories which meant they had to walk back after work, sometimes missing supper in order to be in class. They walk about a half hour every night and morning in order to reach the place of employment, getting to the factory at six in the morning, and not leaving till six at night. Many of the neighbors of the Y. W. C. A. in Tsinan have bound feet, even the little girls. "They can't get husbands otherwise," is the reason given, and the proportion is very great, perhaps ninety out of a hundred. This is one of the many strange contrasts in China—women with bound feet and who are willing to bind the feet of their babies come to these classes and at one session recently a woman had to take her crying baby home, but came running back on bound feet so that she would not miss any part of the lesson.

An important part of Miss Hoople's work is to convince the sick that they may be healed if they will only go to the hospital, but it requires much coaxing to convince them. One girl who works in the hair-net factory was run down, and the doctor ordered cod liver oil. She had to see the family. They were not convinced; they must consult with the grandmother who lives in the country, and this was the status of the incident when Miss Hoople wrote. One woman in the neighborhood is very sick, but she keeps her sewing on her bed beside her and manages to raise herself up a few hours every day that she may do a little work. She refuses to have medical care; she is not young enough to believe that there is anything new in the world. It is on the young who are getting a wider vision that the hope of China depends.

There are babies everywhere in China; houses are so filled they overflow into the streets and mothers bring them to classes, to committee meetings and to regular association classes, "So we keep on hand old magazines and blunt-end scissors," writes Miss Hoople, "and rag dolls to amuse them with. They are so sweet! We see all sorts of possibilities for day nurseries and kindergartens and Sunday Schools till we want to stop doing everything else and specialize in babies. But there isn't time to do all the things one dreams."

Revelations.

A wee wind flower,
Reclining on a woodland bed
Its fragile life by beauty bred Reveals God's power.

A quiet strain,
The evening vesper of a thrush
God's voice that echoes through the hush,
That Love shall reign.

A crooning breeze,
That stirs the leaflet hearts to song,
Instills new life and makes them strong Majestic trees.

A bright-eyed star!
That clasps the misty twilight fold
With pin point fire of twinkling gold,
God's gate unbar.

A tiny prayer,
The lisping of a little child,
With trustful eyes, with soul so mild,
Naught seems so far.

How great God's gifts,
His tender Love for all mankind,
His thoughtful care with Hope combined,
Each life uplifts.

Thoughtful For Others.

A ragged woman was crossing the corner of a public park in London, where the children of the poor are accustomed to play, many of them barefoot. A burly policeman stationed on the corner watched the woman suspiciously. Half-way across she stopped and picked up something which she hid in her apron pocket. In an instant the policeman was by her side. With gruff voice and a very threatened manner he demanded:

"What are you carrying off in your apron?"

The woman seemed embarrassed and refused to answer. Thereupon the officer of the law, thinking that she had doubtless picked up a pocket-book, which she was trying to make away with, threatened to arrest her unless she told him at once what she had in her apron.

At this the woman reluctantly unfolded her apron and disclosed a handful of broken glass. In stupid wonderment the policeman asked:

"What do you want with that stuff?"

A flush passed over the woman's face, and then she answered simply:

"If you please, sir, I just thought I'd like to take it out of the way of the children's feet."—Presbyterian.

For the Young Folks

How To Be Happy.

Are you almost disgusted with life, little man?—

I'll tell you a wonderful trick
That will bring you contentment if anything can—

Do something for somebody, quick!

Are you awfully tired with play, little girl?

Wearry, discouraged and sick?
I'll tell you the loveliest game in the world—

Do something for somebody, quick!

Though it rains like the rain of a flood,
little man,

And the clouds are forbidding and thick,
You can make the sun shine in your soul,
little man,

Do something for somebody, quick!

Though the skies are like brass overhead, little girl,

And the walks like a well-heated brick,
And our earthly affairs in a terrible whirl—

Do something for somebody, quick!

What Mary-Margery Found in the Sky.

The reception was the dullest thing Mary-Margery had ever attended. There was absolutely nothing to do after she had shaken hands with a long row of beautiful ladies whom she did not know. Father and Mother were talking busily, so Mary-Margery wandered into a room which was not lighted, and looked out of one of the long windows.

She had been there quite a while, when she heard a rustle behind her, and turning around, she discovered a man sitting in a deep arm-chair. She started to go out, when the gentleman stopped her.

"Do you like receptions?" he asked. "Well," replied Mary-Margery doubtfully, "I like some parts of them."

"I don't like anything about them," declared the occupant of the chair. "I would like to know what you find in all this to like."

Mary-Margery laughed. She saw in the dim light that the gentleman was quite old, and maybe just a trifle cross. "I like to wear this dress," she said, holding out a gauze ruffle of rose-color and silver. "And I like to wear these," she added, looking at her dainty pink slippers.

"Is that all?" asked the old man. "Will you promise not to tell?" demanded Mary-Margery.

"Cross my heart!" he declared. "Well," said Mary-Margery, going near enough to whisper, "I like the ice cream!"

"My dear young lady, I beg your pardon!" said the gruff old man, rising. "I will see if we can't manage something of the kind."

They could see the table in the next room, pink ices in tall glasses, surmounted with bright red cherries, lavender ices covered with candied violets, and the most fascinating silver dishes of macaroons and tempting little cakes of all colors. When the old man started to walk, Mary-Margery saw that he was very lame.

"Do let me get them!" she begged impulsively.

The man looked down at the eager little face. "Very well," he said. "Tell the lady in blue velvet at the table, that you wish two ices, one for yourself, pick out the color you like, you know, and one for Mr. Nelson. And say that Mr. Nelson wants a whole plate of those crackers."

"Ah!" said the lady, when Mary-Margery had stated her errand, "is he eating ice cream?"

"He hasn't yet," admitted Mary-Margery, "but I think he's going to."

And he did. "I thought may-be you'd like a pineapple one," she said, as she moved some books to make room for the glasses. The old man took a macaroon and fell to thinking.

"Say, do you want to see something really interesting?" he asked suddenly.

"I'd love to," agreed Mary-Margery, taking the last pink spoonful.

"Do you think you can creep very quietly with me out of that window, and in at the back door again?"

Mary-Margery thought she could.

"We don't want anyone to ask where we are going," explained the peculiar old man, opening a long window softly. Hand in hand, they tip-toed down the verandah. They stole in the back door and listened. The maids were all in the butler's pantry.

"Now, dash!" said the gentleman.

And together they "dashed," as well as the lame foot would allow, up two flights of stairs until they reached a locked door in the hall. The old man turned the key and let Mary-Margery in.

The room was small, with a roof and sides of glass. Overhead was the dark, peaceful sky, sprinkled thickly with twinkling stars.

"Isn't this lovely!" breathed Mary-Margery. "I never saw the stars in the house before."

"No?" said the old man. "Would you like to?"

"Yes, I don't know a thing about them."

"Let me teach you to find the Great Dipper," said the old man. "We'll sit here and look directly North. Just now the Dipper is nearly right side up. Do you see the four stars which make the dipper, and three, the handle?"

"The handle is busted," giggled Mary-Margery.

"Yes, as you justly observe," agreed her new friend solemnly, "the handle is busted. Now, just at the—"

"Bust?" suggested Mary-Margery.

"Exactly! Look sharply at that star, and you will see that it is a double star."

"Oh, yes! A tiny star right above it?" asked the little girl.

"That is the Arabian test for eyesight," explained the gentleman. "Now, to find the North Star, we call the two front stars in the Dipper 'Pointers', because they point almost to it. The North Star is the tip of the handle of the Little Dipper."

"Does the Little Dipper come down from that, upside down?" asked Mary-Margery.

"Good!" cried the old man. "I will give you a rough sketch of the two Dippers so you can find them tomorrow night at nine o'clock."

"Aren't they there at any other time?" asked Mary-Margery.

"Well, the dipper is there, but it is sometimes upside down. But during October and November, you will find it right side up, around eight or nine o'clock." Just then there was a step on the stairs.

"Douglas, we've been looking for you everywhere," said the blue velvet lady, severely.

"We'll be right down," said the old man. "I want to meet this child's father and mother."

"This is the first reception I ever enjoyed," he said to Mother, when he was introduced. "I wonder if I could come over and observe the stars with the young lady some time in the future?"

When Mary-Margery was tucked safely into the motor to go home, she asked who the old man was.

"Don't you know, darling?" demanded Mother. "He hates talking to people, and he shuts himself up in his room studying, but he is Douglas Nelson, the most famous astronomer in America."

"Then let's let him come," said Mary-Margery, hugging her precious sketch. —Christian Observer.

Mid-Summer Song.

The world's aflame with joy and love,
The earth below, heaven above,
All things in earth, in sea, and air,
Proclaim a loving Father's care.

His love lilts in the bird's sweet song,
As through the air he skims along;
His love shines in the lily's hue,
In clouds, and in the sky's deep blue.

The waters now are full of glee
Lakes, rivers, and the mighty sea,
Agleam with light, proclaim His praise
Who blesseth all our nights and days.

We thank Him for the world so bright,
For each fair day and starry night;
For birds and trees, and grass and flowers,
Which happy make our Summer hours.

We would His loyal children be
In faith and perfect charity,
With grateful hearts now let us sing;
May all the earth with praises ring!

Why Leo Was Called Home.

Leo filled the wood-box, and did the few other chores that fell to the share of the second boy in the family; then he hurriedly dressed for school. He did not wait for his brother and sisters that morning, for he wanted a game of ball before nine o'clock. He was in the full enjoyment of his sport when Charles and the others appeared. Charles came directly to him and said: "Mother wishes you to come home at once."

The ball was in Leo's hands. He stared blankly at his brother.

"Wh—what is the matter?" he stammered.

"Nothing."

"Anybody sick?"

"No."

"But why does mother want me?"

"I don't know," Charles answered; "she merely gave me that message for you."

The Lee children were trained to obedience. Leo had no thought of doing otherwise than his mother bade him. He dropped the ball, relinquished the game with a sigh, and with a word of explanation to his comrades he was off.

Home was a half-mile away; slowly he traversed the road over which he had sped so lightly a few minutes before. It had never seemed so long. As he drew near the house he saw his mother standing by the big table stirring ginger-bread. She looked up with a smile, a kind, cheery smile, that had nothing in it to put a boy who was on the verge of crossness still more out of humor.

"Oh, yes," she said gently, "you left your coat on the floor of your room, and I thought it would be better for you to come home and hang it up."

It was said as quietly as if it were a most natural thing to ask him to walk a mile to put his coat in its proper place.

Leo sped upstairs. His room was in perfect order except that the coat was lying just where he had thrown it.

This was not the first offense of a like nature. Oh, no! many were the reprimands he had received for tossing aside his garments and leaving them where they chanced to fall. He had always pleaded, "I didn't think!" or "I forgot!" Then it would slip his mind until he was caught in a similar error. Now he hung his coat in the closet, and then he went slowly downstairs.

"Is that all?" he asked of his mother.

"Yes," she said, pleasantly, "that is all." He turned to go.

"Wait a minute," she called. "Here is a hot ginger-cake for you. It will taste good on your way back."

Leo took the cake gratefully, and thanked his mother. It did taste good, and, moreover, it seemed to dispel the little cloud that had settled upon him. By the time he had reached the school-house he was his happy self again.

Leo is now a man, and, telling me the story, he said:

"That was a good lesson to me. I never again forgot to hang up my coat."—Emma C. Dowd.

Looks.

When I came to my little master's house from my kennel in the country, I was four months old. Mr. Wilson, my little master's father, was standing at the front gate with little master in his arms.

"For mercy's sake, John," said Mr. Wilson to the man who brought me in the automobile, "that dog's nose looks like a last year's pumpkin! His face certainly doesn't recommend him. You couldn't have found an uglier one, could you?"

Of course that kind of talk didn't make me feel very good, but a real fellow doesn't talk back to his elders. So I just kept still and hung my head a bit, thinking that I might be sent back to my old home if I looked sorrowful.

But, no, sir, the little master wouldn't have let that be, even if Mr. Wilson had really meant what he said about me. Little master said, "Bow Wow!" and stretched out his little hands to me.

From that moment I knew I had a friend in little master. I decided at that time, too, that I'd make Mr. Wilson feel that I wasn't such an ugly fellow, even if my face did have wrinkles in it like those of a pumpkin.

My opportunity came very shortly. Mr. Wilson walked out upon the lawn one morning with little master in his arms. As he came to where I stood, near my kennel, he said: "Looks"—he had called me Looks from the very moment of my arrival—"take care of little master a moment." Then he placed him down by me, while he went out to talk to the ice-man.

Little master waddled along on his shaky legs toward the rear of the house. He waddled along, until he came to a place where men had been making an excavation for a cistern. The great hole in the ground had been roped off, to keep any one from falling in. But little master was so small that he went right on, under the ropes.

I felt powerless, for I was chained to my kennel. Thoroughly frightened, I turned to look for Mr. Wilson. He was now returning from the front, I could see; I saw too that he noticed what little master was doing. He looked white, and stopped short soon, throwing up his hands in horror.

"Well," I thought, "if he doesn't do something, I must. Little master is pretty close to that hole." So I shouted at the top of my voice, "Bow! Wow!"

What do you think little master did? He turned around, and waddled right back towards me, saying, "Bow! Wow!"

Mr. Wilson was running towards us now. When he had reached us, he snatched little master to him and hugged him tight. Then he turned to me, his face all wet with water, and made his voice husky as he said: "Looks, you're ugly. But looks don't count, bless your heart."

After that, he patted me so much that I was sure he loved me. But still, I haven't been able to fully understand his talk. For how could he say, "Looks don't count," when I had saved little master from falling into that hole? It seemed to me that I had counted a great deal. What do you think? What do you think he meant by "looks don't count"?—Presbyterian Banner.

THE LITTLE POET'S CORNER.

For the Southern Churchman.

For a Grandmother's Birthday.

Shirley Adair Frederick, age 11.

I think 'twould be fine
To be seventy-nine
If I were as jolly as you,
I think 'twould be nice
To be thirty-eight twice
And another year more or two.

I think 'twould be great
If I could relate
All my feelings on paper like you,
And if I could live
And be able to give
All the pleasure and comfort you do.

Then I think 'twould be queer
Some one not to cheer
In battles of life to be won,
Then I'd know in my heart
I had done well my part
And at last hear the Master's "Well done."

THAT'S WHAT I'M HERE FOR.

It was very early in the morning at the great Union Station when a worried looking woman reappeared at the information desk. "Will you tell me again, young man, just what you said about my train? I'm mixed on it!"

"Yes, ma'am, it comes in on track five. It is ten minutes late." Donald gave these facts with the pleasant charm of manner that made him a general favorite.

"Ten minutes late? Did you say ten minutes?" the woman was back at the desk in a few moments.

"Yes, ma'am, just ten minutes—it lost that at Harrisburg. It will probably not lose any more time. That train seldom is late."

"And which track did you say? Track four or five?"

"Track five, ma'am." Donald's voice was as pleasant as before.

"Say, how do you manage to keep the smile from coming off?" chuckled a youth standing near, as the woman turned away. He came up close to

Donald, and spoke in a confidential undertone. "Asked the same questions over and over, didn't she?"

"Oh that's nothing—sometimes they get confused—specially women in a big station like this. And it's what I'm here for—to answer questions!"

A moment later, his own business done, the second youth, Jack by name, was hurrying to his own place behind the information desk at Wheeler & Fimple's Department Store. He had been bitterly chaffed at the restrictions and humdrum quality of his work. Only that morning at the early breakfast table he had uttered a few caustic comments on the general public—and an unflattering opinion as to its general intelligence.

"It's about the last position I'd have chosen," he had finished bitterly to his mother. "Of course, Mr. Pell said there'd be other chances for me later, and knowing father as he did and all that, you'd think—" Jack had stopped, with a sombre look in his eyes.

He was still thinking of Donald's courteous patience when he went to his own place at Wheeler & Fimple's at nine o'clock, and somehow, without half realizing it, he was soon imitating Donald's pleasant manners, in his dealing with the customers who stopped at the information desk. It was a special bargain sale—so the store was crowded. The clerk who shared the duties of the information desk with Jack had been called away to another department for the morning.

"They told me that specials sold today are not returnable," a woman complained in a rather high pitched voice; "but I don't think that's fair! How can I tell whether my niece will like the dress I pick out for her? And I'm not even sure of her size!"

Jack would probably have turned her off with a brief statement that it was a rule of the store, if the memory of Donald's pleasant face had not been with him. With that memory before him, he spoke courteously and with a smile.

"But you see the goods are so reduced in price for quick sale that we have to have some such rules. I believe it is a general rule in most stores for special sales."

"Well now, mebbe it is," the woman conceded. "Perhaps if I could get word to my niece about the colors and sizes that would help," she ruminated. "Where can I get to a phone, young man? Oh, inside one of those little cubby holes, is it?" And she departed to make room for the next person desiring "information."

"Lots of silly folks you meet, don't you?" remarked a man in the course of the morning, who had been preceded by a bewildered woman who had required minute and thrice repeated information in regard to the suburban deliveries. "Don't you get kind of sick of it?"

"Oh it's what I'm here for," Jack answered, "you see, folks get sort of mixed up and confused—especially on a rush day like this."

"Well, you're good natured about it—I'll hand that to you."

Somehow full as the morning proved to be, Jack made his way to the cafeteria at noon in a less wearied and disgusted state of mind than was usual with him on bargain days. He was not particularly analytical so it never occurred to him that his effort to keep outwardly pleasant through those morning hours had had their wholesome psychological effect. He did not realize that the curling of the lips in a smile is very apt to produce a smile in the heart. Mr. Pell, the floor manager, to whom Jack was indebted for his posi-

"Well, how goes it, Jack?" he inquired pleasantly. "All right, sir," responded Jack. "Busy morning for Wheeler & Fimple's, wasn't it?" he added with a smile.

"You're right it was, and by the way, I heard a good word for you today—an old aunt of mine who was in from the country told me that the young man at the information desk was very kind and polite to her. She doesn't go shopping very often, and she's rather shy, too. Wish I'd known when she first came in, but evidently you looked after her. She said she got so mixed up about the deliveries she had to ask you the same questions over and over—you must have thought she was half-witted, she said, but if you did, you never showed it. That's the right spirit, boy," added Mr. Pell kindly.

There was a mixture of embarrassment and pleasure in Jack's answering smile.

It was easy to go through the long, hot afternoon, with Mr. Pell's pleasant words ringing in his ears.

But Jack, who was an honest-hearted boy, made up his mind then and there that he would take as his motto for all the days to come, "That is what I'm here for!"—Bertha Gerneane Woods.

I'll lay me down, and take my rest,
For Thou wilt give me what is best.
Thou'lt guard me through the silent night,

And shield me in the long day's fight.
But if I suffer trial or ill,
I'll bear it, as it is Thy will;
For as fire purges gold from dross,
So souls are cleansed by sorrow and loss.
Thus, Father, give me strength to say,

Marriages

LUNDQUIST-MORRIS.

The Church of the Ascension, Norfolk, Virginia, was the scene of a very beautiful wedding, Saturday afternoon, July 19, at 4 o'clock, when Miss Helen Defebaugh Morris, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Henry Morris, was given in marriage by her father to Albert Edward Lundquist, of New York. The Rev. Robert Benton, officiated in the absence of the rector, the Rev. J. Scott Meredith.

Obituaries

Hancock: MRS. MARY A. GOULD HANCOCK was born in Truro, Cornwall, England, on January 12, 1844, passed into life eternal in Maquoketa, Iowa, June 27, 1924.

"He giveth His beloved sleep."

MRS. LUCILLA CARMICHAEL.

A telegram received from Wilmington, N. C., on July 23, 1924, announced the death of MRS. LUCILLA CARMICHAEL, who was before her marriage Miss Lucilla Wallace. She was in her eighty-seventh year. Mrs. Carmichael was the only daughter of the late John Hooe Wallace and his wife, Mary Nicholas Gordon Wallace, both of Fredericksburg, Va. Of seven brothers, one alone, Judge A. W. Wallace, survives her. Like her mother she lived a long and useful life, exemplifying all the ideals which mark the life of a noble Christian woman of a generation now passed away forever. "Strength and honor were her clothing, and her children's grand-children can rise up and call her blessed."

She was the widow of the late Rev. James Carmichael, D. D., a native of Fredericksburg, and was buried in Wilmington beside her husband.

MRS. LOU EMMA MONTGOMERY.

MRS. LOU EMMA FAUNTLEROY MONTGOMERY passed into life eternal on July 7 at Colonial Beach, Va. She was the daughter of the late Moore Fauntleroy, Garland and Elizabeth Priscilla Cook, and was born at Warsaw, Va., September 12, 1843. She had three sons and five daughters who survive her. Her sons are J. H., of Buckroe Beach, Va.; Murdock, of Warsaw, Va.; and Virgil, of New York City. Her daughters are Mrs. E. A. Semple, Hampton, Va.; Mrs. A. B. Chandler, Jr., Fredericksburg, Va.; Homozelle, Colonial Beach, Mrs. Theodora Vene-mann, Riverdale, Md.; and Mrs. Robert Hardin Deaderick, Winston-Salem, N. C. Funeral services were held at St. John's Church, Warsaw, Virginia.

Mrs. Montgomery was a true mother in Israel. She was a woman of strong, upright character inherited from a heredity of integrity and firm dependence on God. The untoward circumstances of life did not discourage her or dim her faith. For years the care of a large family of young children and a sick husband rested upon her. At the death of her husband she was able to give her whole time to her children and she faithfully toiled and prayed and believed, until each one was placed in life as it seemed to please God. Each one will remember the mother who loved and served, and each, doubtless, will inherit the will to do as the mother did, and each will have the faith in Christ that sustained and cheered and gave the final victory to one whose life was a humble offering to God.

JOHN MORTON PALMATIER.

At a special session of the Vestry of St. James' Church, Buffalo, N. Y., a Committee, composed of Messrs. Atkins, Andrews and Moores, was appointed to prepare and present Resolutions upon the death of Mr. Palmatier, one of the Wardens, and the following were reported and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That, in the passing into Paradise of Mr. John Morton Palmatier on July 10, St. James' Parish has lost a most valued member, and we, his associates on this Board, desire to place on record our sense of the esteem in which he was held by us, and the great loss which we have thus sustained.

Mr. Palmatier has been connected with this Parish nearly thirty-eight years, and soon after he joined it he was elected a Vestryman, and his membership on the Board, either as Vestryman or Warden, continued until his death. He often represented the Parish as a Delegate to the Convention of the Diocese.

His whole heart was always interested in the welfare of the Parish, and it owes much to his wise counsels and his ready hand. In spite of his arduous secular duties, which to most men would have been considered a sufficient excuse for declining active parochial work, he was for many years a faithful and successful teacher in the Sunday School, and also the President of the Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

While we mourn our loss, we thank God for his good example, and we extend to the bereaved members of his family our heartfelt sympathy.

Resolved, That, This Minute be spread upon the Records of the Parish, and published in the next issue of THE MESSENGER, and in the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN, and that a copy of it be sent to the family.

W. J. ATKINS,
G. H. ANDREWS,
A. A. MOORES, Committee.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

now known as the Dioceses of Pittsburgh and Erie, and was deeply interested in the work of the conference, so it was thought some sort of a memorial linking his name with the work would be appropriate.

The conference throughout was characterized by devotion to the instruction a good attendance at the strictly devotional services, and a wonderful spirit of fellowship.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

More than two hundred and seventy-five delegates, representing more than one hundred Episcopal Parishes in the Dioceses of Michigan and Western Michigan, were enrolled in the Michigan Summer Conference which has just concluded a ten-day session at Hillsdale College, Hillsdale, Michigan.

Judged from every past standard the conference was the most successful ever held and it now ranks as one of the larger summer conferences of the Church.

The faculty, this year, included a long list of men and women, expert in various phases of Church work. A special group of courses for Church School teachers were offered, chief among them being: "Child Psychology" and "The Christian Nurture Series," under the direction of Miss Mabel Lee Cooper, New York City, Field Worker of the National Department of Religious Education of the Episcopal Church. Miss Juliet Allein, of Memphis, Tenn., had charge of several courses for teachers in kindergarten and primary methods. In this same department courses were led by the Rev. Mr. Sargent, in "Church School Administration, and by Miss Edith Maurice, of Detroit, in the work of the Church School Service League.

The Rev. Lewellyn D. Caley, D. D., of Philadelphia, in addition to leading a course on "The Life of Christ," gave a series of illustrated lectures of the History of the Episcopal Church.

Dr. Charles L. Dibble, of Kalamazoo, author of a recently published book, "A Grammar of Belief," widely used in the universities of the country, lead the course in "The Faith and Modern Thought," relating largely to the nature and validity of religious belief and the relations between doctrines and scientific laws.

A course in mission study based on the mission work of the Church in China was led by Miss Laura Boyer, assistant education secretary of the Woman's Auxilliary of the Episcopal Church. How to work with the foreign-born was discussed by the Rev. Dr. Henry Spoer, who recently came to the Diocese of Michigan as director of foreign born work after twenty years' residence in the Near East.

The Rev. Harold Holt, of Portsmouth, Ohio, and Miss Ella Charls, Executive Secretary, Church Mission of Help, Diocese of Southern Ohio, took charge of several courses in social service work. Miss Madeline Hicks, one of the Executive Secretaries of the Girls' Friendly Society, New York City, led courses in Church pageantry and drama.

Three courses in Church Music were directed by Dean P. C. Lutkin, of the Northwestern University School of Music, Evanston, Illinois. Dean Lutkin is regarded as one of the greatest living authorities on the music of the Episcopal Church in this country.

The Rev. Frederick C. Lauderburn, of Pittsburgh, and Miss Florence Lukens Newbold, of New York City, had charge of several courses for young people, while Bishop Page and the Rev. Mr. Woodroffe led discussion groups for Episcopal clergymen in parish problems and organization.

The Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop of Michigan, acted as Chaplain and devotional leader of the Conference, and he was assisted each day in the early celebrations by clergy representing the various dioceses represented at the conference.

Another special feature this year at the Conference and given on the closing day, was the pageant entitled "Vigil." This was arranged and directed by Miss Madeline Hicks. It displayed, in no small degree the remarkable progress made in presenting religious truths by this means.

A full program of recreation, including swimming, tennis, games, camp fires, a stunt night and a "conference ball," was arranged by a committee of the young people attending the conference.

The Rev. Gordon M. Reese, Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, was present at the Conference, and, during the week-end, gave a special series of talks to the young people. J. D. Alexander, of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew National Staff, was also present and spoke to the delegates.

The officers were as follows: Conference Chaplain and Devotional Leader, the Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D.; Chairman, Rev. G. P. T. Sargent; Dean of Women, Mrs. James H. McDonald; Dean of Men, the Rev. R. W. Woodroffe; Dean of Young People's Department, the Rev. Henry Lewis; Counselor for Young Women, Miss Joyce McCurdy; Counselor for Young Men, Norman Lilley; Special Conferences and Meetings, the Very Rev. C. E. Jackson; Treasurer, the Rev. A. M. Ewert; Business Manager, Charles O. Ford; Publicity, I. C. Johnson; Housing and Local Arrangements, the Rev. H. G. Stacey; Book Room, Miss Delia Warriner; Assistant Director, the Rev. A. N. McEvoy.

Closing, the Rev. R. W. Woodroffe, rector of St. John's Church, Detroit, was elected by the Committee to be chairman of the 1925 gathering, which will probably be held July 1 to 10, at Hillsdale College.

COLORADO.

Rt. Rev. I. P. Johnson, D. D., Bishop.
Rev. Fred Ingley, Coadjutor-elect.

The Church Art Commission of the Diocese of Colorado at its last meeting unanimously resolved that this commission express its deepest appreciation of the services rendered by that great architect, Bertram G. Goodhue, and its sense of the irreparable loss which this country has sustained in his death. They wish to express, too, their appreciation of the cordial interest and cooperation in Church Art, always shown by him; and also by Henry Wynd Young, the notable designer and worker in stained glass, who has also died recently. This Commission repeatedly called upon both these artists for help in the exhibitions of Ecclesiastical Art, which it was assembling, and their response was always one of glad interest and valuable assistance.

October 8 to 12, 1924
Albany, N. Y.

The registration fee is $2.00 for Seniors, $1.00 for Juniors.

Add to it the splendid inspiration and spiritual growth that are bound to come from and through the Convention, and you have surely sufficient reason for coming to this Convention, even at the expense of something else.

The clergy generally are urged to call to the attention of the men and boys of their parishes the advantage of attendance, and to make an earnest effort to assure that their parishes are represented.

Opportunity

This I beheld, or dreamed it in a dream:
 There spread a cloud of dust along a plain;
 And underneath the cloud, or in it, raged
 A furious battle, and men yelled, and swords
 Shocked upon swords and shields. A prince's banner
 Wavered, then staggered backward, hemmed by foes.
 A craven hung along the battle's edge,
 And thought, "Had I a sword of keener steel—
 That blue blade that the king's son bears—but this Blunt thing," he snapped, and flung it from his hand,
 And lowering crept away and left the field.
 Then came the king's son, wounded sore bestead,
 And, weaponless, and saw the broken sword,
 Hilt-buried in the dry and trodden sand,
 And ran and snatched it, and with battle shout
 Lifted afresh he hewed his enemy down,
 And saved a great cause that heriote day.

INTENSIVE INSTRUCTION

Intensive instruction, given by experienced teachers, is the ideal, and the advantage, of what is known as the "small college" type of education.

Hobart College has always adhered to this ideal, by giving its students the benefits of small class and laboratory sections, competent teachers and close attention to their individual needs; and by offering them only sufficient freedom in the choice of studies to develop their individual abilities.

Among authoritative bodies endorsing Hobart's instructional methods and equipment are the New York State Board of Regents and the Association of Colleges of the Middle States and Maryland. The highest possible endorsement of the Hobart system is the success of Hobart students in professional and graduate schools, and in all walks of life.

Applications for admission to the 103rd class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

No man can give his best service while he has not first given his heart.

Whenever a man gains a victory over himself God has helped him.

Do the things you know are right. Let alone the ones you are in doubt about.

"We are leading a crusade, not to take a sepulchre, but to take a world."

"I gave up all for Him," said John Calvin, "and what have I found? I have found everything in Him."

Too seldom do we tell Him of our blessings. Only when sorrows and trials come do many seek Him.—Lutheran.

Light other people's lamps. A bright Christian is a ray shot from the throne of heaven into this dark world.—Cuyler.

Jesus is for the world, all of it, not for a delighted group hidden away somewhere from the clashing experiences of humanity.—Lutheran.

Jesus, for cleansing from all sin,
Jesus, for peace, Thy peace, within,
Jesus, for strength the race to win,
I look to Thee.

Rev. C. D. Gilkeson.

Life is like a bank. If you have not an account in the bank you will not get much out of it, and if you have an account but are always drawing out, you will get a letter saying that your account is overdrawn.—James Reid.

Only be steadfast; never waver,
Nor seek earth's favor,
But rest.

Thou knowest what God wills must be
For all His creatures, so for thee,
The best.

"Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." Utter that sentence about Christ and you have measured the length and breadth and the depth and the height of the Christian religion. But say everything else about Christ and leave that sentence of John out and you have omitted what is great and distinctive in our holy faith.

It were to be wished the flaws were fewer

In the earthen vessel holding treasure,
Which lies as safe as in a golden ewer;
But the main thing is, does it hold good measure?

Heaven soon sets right all other matter!

THE AFTERMATH OF WAR

The word math means a reaping. The aftermath is the second reaping of the hay the same season. In the simpler civilization of our Saxon ancestors there was an unwritten but inexorable law of the fields, viz.: "The math belongs to the lords of the land, but the aftermath shall be the people's."

The phrase "aftermath of war" is common enough, but it is not often that a phrase current in ordinary speech carries so large a lesson upon the back of a metaphor. It is hardly, however, a metaphor to speak of the great war as the reaping. Never before in history has Death's sickle moved through a wider swath. This reaping was done at the bidding of the lords of the land. It was a war of governments. It was the inevitable and logical conclusion of autocracy.

During the war and since, men have been asking themselves if the egoism of the State represented by a majority in democratic countries may not be as intolerable as the egoism of absolute authority vested in an individual. The frequent jest heard in democratic lands that the trouble with the world was that the ancient belief in "the divine right of Kings to govern wrong" still kept more than half the world in darkness, has been changed to a jest that bites even deeper into the heart of things. Today men have begun to talk of "the irresponsible majority."

People who tremble at the theological unrest, and clamor for fixedness of interpretation and an immobile faith, fail to realize that the great problem confronting the world today is to find a new definition of authority and to provide sanctions therefor. In England, which to the American mind has always been the home of conservatism, the people are discussing freely questions that here in America we have not dared to face squarely. In England men are asking themselves whether the State (which means the governmental majority) can establish its right to be the supreme claimant of the citizen's loyalty. The dominant party in the Church of England no less than the strong and growing body who call themselves Guild-Socialists have put the question bluntly: "Is a man justified in surrendering an opinion believed by him to be just and true at the bidding of an irresponsible majority whose one title to authority is power?" Here in America we are asking the same questions in different terms. Labor Unions through their chief representatives are saying not only to Congress, but to the courts: "Hands off. We are many millions in number, but our affairs are our own. Touch them not." The large organizations, which, while disclaiming political allegiances, are trying to control the direction of legislation, whatever else they may stand for, are concrete questionings of the sanctions of governmental authority.

We are told that the next war will be entirely a war in the air. There is already a war in the air. It is just as true in this war as in others that politics make strange bed-fellows. Politics, as the word implies, is the science of citizenship. When the results of scientific investigation escape from the lecture-room into the market-place, then science passes into commerce. This is as true of the study of ideas as it is of motor engines.

We are being told at every turn that this is an age of materialism. To our mind the age is committed to the greatest spiritual adventure in the history of the race. In some form or other the world has always acknowledged the rights of power, and this has been just as true in republics as in monarchies. Today men in all lands are asking whether the "power of right" is not the true source of authority, and whether the rights of power ought not to be done away with unless that power be proved a righteous one.

It seemed to our fathers a great advance in the life of the world when they made good the claim for "the rights of the individual"; but they never freed themselves from the ancient system which based all authority upon power, and when any group of individuals, sufficiently large, pooled their rights as individuals, the old system came back again in the form of the rights of the majority. It is today as much a political heresy to question the validity of the majority's claim to absolute authority as it was before the French Revolution to question the divine right of Kings. For the first time in history the race is deliberately set out upon a spiritual quest. No man can foretell the issue, but that would be a dull soul indeed which did not thrill with the daring of the undertaking.

THE NAMELESS VIRTUE

Aristotle says that there is an intermediate habit of which the extremes are, on one hand, universal and indiscriminate complaisance, which, when it proceeds from motives of interest, is called flattery; and on the other, churlish asperity and contentious peevishness. For this praiseworthy habit there is no term available. It is nameless in Greek. Courtesy and civility suggest, but do not define nor fully describe it.

Montesquieu says that politeness is an accomplishment, born in the atmosphere of the court. It can, he says, hardly be considered to have any moral worth; for it is but a display of fine manners. It is pride that renders a man polite; for one is flattered with being taken notice of for behavior that shows he is not of mean condition and has not been bred among lowly people.

Lord Chesterfield's theory of good manners makes them but a polish put upon common acts whereby their value to the owner is greatly enhanced.

Lord Bacon, who described and labelled so many of the virtues and vices of man, devotes but a few lines to 'the nameless virtue'. It is, he says, "one of many Parts and Signs of Goodness. If a man be gracious and courteous to strangers, it shews he is a citizen of the world; and that his heart is no island, cut off from other lands, but a continent that joins them." On our shelves there are many volumes on ethics. It would be safe to say that hardly a dozen of the many thousand pages in these volumes are devoted to an exposition of the nameless virtue that dwells somewhere between indiscriminate complaisance and churlish asperity.

Courtesy is the habit of the court. Politeness, the polished seal of careful breeding. Civility the manner of one conscious of privileged citizenship. Not one nor all of these can describe nor define that habit of the soul which brings the balm of healing to the hurts of life, that speaks with tones that soothe the fevered flush of scorn, and reaches out to lift the fallen one and covers the multitude of stains with the mantle of its kindness. This nameless virtue is the habit that love wears as it performs the duties of its station.

The long loose dress worn in the East was, in the case of servants, furnished with a girdle, which, when drawn tight, left the hands and limbs free. This garment was called a "tie-up." St. Peter says in homely, striking phrase: "If ye would serve one another, put on a tie-up."

This world would be a sorry place indeed, were it not for the Men and Women of the Beatitudes wearing the tie-up of service. These are the salt of the earth without whom life would be a flat and tasteless thing. These are the kindly servants of the race carrying love's pollen from life to life. These are the ones whose discerning eye can recognize Christ's kinsmen even though the grime of toil and the scars of sin soil and disfigure, and just because they are the kinsmen of the King greet with kindly smile and welcoming hand, not exacting the tribute due to fine manners, but themselves honored by being privileged to serve the least of the brethren of the Lord of Life.

THE CHURCH AND EDUCATION

J. M. Powis Smith, in The Divinity Student

THE most superficial survey of the history of the Christian Church reveals the fact that its leadership has for the most part been drawn from the educated classes. That history is unthinkable apart from such names as Paul, Augustine, Jerome, Athanasius, Thomas, Aquinas, Martin Luther, Melancthon, John Calvin, Jonathan Edwards, and William Carey—to select, but a few from the long roll of learned leaders. That this was true of the past is true also of our own day. To mention names here would be invidious; but it is a matter of common knowledge that only the educated man can speak effectively to the thoughtful minds in the Church of our time. The great leaders today in every kind of Christian work are the product of our colleges, universities, and seminaries.

Yet the Church and the School have not always been on friendly terms. The early Christian movement was indifferent to education, when not hostile to it. We find traces of that in the New Testament. The disciples were simple men of no learning. Paul, himself a well-schooled man, held learning in low esteem. "Not many wise men after the flesh; not many mighty, not many noble are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise and mighty" (I Cor. 1:26f.). Jesus Himself is represented as saying, "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of Heaven and earth, because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes" (Matt. 11:25). As a matter of fact, the attention of the early Church was centered in the expectation of the speedy approach of the end of the world and upon preparation for that great event. Education was of no value in this connection and was naturally left out of account. The earliest distinctively Christian schools were catechumenical and catechetical, being designed for the training of the converts from paganism in the facts and tenets of the Christian faith. These developed later into the cathedral and monastery schools which continued to be very narrow in their range of interest. There was no attempt to impart purely secular knowledge. At the synod of Carthage in 398 A. D. all Bishops were forbidden to read any pagan literature. This was, of course, due to the fear lest acquaintance with pagan learning should corrupt the Christian mind. Such an attitude prepared the way for the "dark ages." This state of affairs continued until contact with the world of Greek and Eastern thought forced upon the Christian community a recognition of the fact that education was essential to the highest success in a world that showed no signs of immediate dissolution. The successive Crusades had much to do with changing the attitude of the Church toward pagan thought. Closer contact of the Crusaders with the arts and crafts of Eastern lands aroused their interest and stimulated their curiosity. This opened the way for interchange of thought and for the introduction of new ideas and methods of education into Europe.

When the Church finally did turn its attention to education, it went into the undertaking with energy. From the seventh to the end of the twelfth century the monks practically controlled all education. Then followed the period of scholasticism lasting till the end of the fifteenth century, the purpose of which was to harmonize and reconcile religion and philosophy. During this period the great universities of Europe were founded. Whether established by popes, kings, or emperors, these were all controlled by the Church and their faculties were made up almost wholly of either Franciscan or Dominican friars. Of the twenty-one colleges making up the University of Oxford, for example, at least sixteen were founded by clergymen or at the suggestion of clergymen; and the ecclesiastical coloring of the rest is sufficiently evident from the fact that each has the right to appoint ministers to a varying number of parishes.

The situation in the United States was not essentially different until within relatively recent years. All the earliest colleges here were founded under ecclesiastical auspices or by deeply religious men. The spirit of early American higher education is well represented by the inscription from "New England First Fruits" now carved on the Samuel Johnson Gate of the Harvard Yard:

After God had carried us safe to New England
And we had builded our houses
Provided necessaries for our livelihood
Reared convenient places for God's worship
And settled the Civil Government
One of the next things we longed for
And looked after was to advance learning
And perpetuate it to posterity
Dreading to leave an illiterate ministry
To the churches when our present ministers
Shall lie in the dust

The Universities of Columbia (1754) and of Pennsylvania (1755) were not founded under Church control. But for Columbia, at least, the religious motive of its founders is amply attested by the statement of its first president, Samuel Johnson, in 1754, that the University's purpose was "to lead them (i. e., the students) from the study of nature to the knowledge of themselves and of the God of nature, and of their duty to Him, themselves and one another, and everything that can contribute to their true happiness, both her and hereafter." The fact that Hebrew was required for the A. B. degree at Yale until after the War of the Revolution, when it became elective, is clear proof of the dominant religious interest of its founders.

The state universities of our Central and Western States were not due to any conscious opposition to the Church, but to the recognition on the part of the State that it was under obligation to put the best educational facilities within the reach of all the citizens. The failure to include the various branches of religious literature and history in the curricula of the state universities was not due to lack of desire so to do, but to the practical impossibility, owing to the wide range of denominational variations, not to mention Jews and the like, of providing instruction in those subjects that should be acceptable to all the people. Incidentally, and with no such purpose in the minds of their founders, the state universities have exerted a very direct and beneficial influence upon the Church colleges. For the greater resources at the command of the state institution enable it to equip and maintain a high grade of instruction and force the average denominational college to do its utmost to keep pace with its more favored rival.

The first general law establishing schools on this continent was passed by the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1647; and this was closely followed in 1650 by a similar law in the Connecticut Colony. The somewhat involved preamble to the Massachusetts law thus states its dominant motive:

"It being one chief object of that old deluder, Satan, to keep men from the knowledge of the Scriptures, as, in former times, keeping them in an unknown tongue, so in these later times, by persecuting them from the use of tongues; so that at last the true sense and meaning of the original might be clouded and corrupted with false glosses of deivers; and to the end that learning may not be buried in the graves of our forefathers, in Church and Commonwealth, the Lord assisting our endeavors. . . .

To that end an elementary school was prescribed for every town of fifty families and a Latin school for every town of one hundred families. Professor Paul Monroe says that "previous to the latter part of the eighteenth century, it was religious motive that controlled in education (in the United States). Consequently only when the Church and State were closely united and when the Church desired to carry out some general scheme of education, did the State attempt to develop and control systems of public schools. . . . These early systems of public or free schools were largely due to the religious devotion of the New England people and to the practical identity of Church and State."

This means that the influence of the Church dominated the educational policy of the state.

During this long period of the Church control of education things went smoothly as long as the educator stayed within the limits set for him by the ecclesiastic. But whenever the teacher or investigator stepped outside the limits ordained for him by the Church, he was in danger. If the scholar discovered and taught anything that conflicted in the slightest degree with the theological system of his day, he found himself confronted by ecclesiastical opposition, which not infrequently went to the point of persecution. The horrors of the Spanish inquisition, perpetrated under the auspices of the Church, are a black spot in the history of the Church. The bitterness of spirit called forth by the scientific research of Galileo, Darwin, and Huxley, should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of the Church. The cases of W. Robertson Smith in Scotland, and of Henry Preserved Smith and the late Charles A. Briggs in this country recall scenes that never should have been. But notwithstanding many experiences of this kind, education has kept on its way and has established its right to live and learn in independence of the dictum of the Church. Indeed, though teachers have been put out of Church schools, their friends and students have in many cases taken their places and the Church that expelled them is now itself under the leadership of their followers. The men who supported and defended W. Robertson Smith, for example, later rose to places of influence and power in the Free Church of Scotland. The Church today is not in a position to dictate to education. Nor will a right-minded Church have any desire so to do. The Church of the present should learn from the experience of the past. Wherever it has set itself in opposition to the progress of truth, it has ultimately met decisive defeat. The Church and the school are rightfully partners in a common enterprise; they are joint members of the great fellowship of interpretation. The late Canon William M. Sanday clearly recognized this fact when, in speaking of the modern interpretation of religious history and experience, he said, "The ultimate goal of modernism is the unification of thought, the fusion of all secular thinking and all religious thinking in one comprehensive and harmonious system."

What is the task of the Church? Is it not to enable people to interpret the world religiously and to live religiously in a religious world? Every religion involves an interpretation of the universe; religion, whatever else it may or may not be, is always an attempt to interpret the universe in terms of God; Christianity seeks that explanation in terms of the Christian God. But to interpret anything correctly, the interpreter must be in possession of all the facts involved in the case. If he is ignorant of, neglects, or misrepresents any fact, his interpretation is to that extent incomplete, or incorrect and misleading.

If this be true it is at once evident that the Church is in a very real sense dependent upon the school. It is the business of education to discover and impart the facts that religion has to interpret.

Religion and education are in the very nature of things inseparable. For the Church to prohibit or restrict in any way the pursuit of knowledge is to imperil her own future; if not indeed to commit suicide. There must be open and free commerce of ideas. The spirit of research must be encouraged and fostered if the Church is to keep alive and alert, able and willing to serve her generation to the uttermost. If the task of the Church is to interpret the world, she must know what that world is and how it came to be what it is. Science in its various branches, such as chemistry, physics, geology, astronomy, astrophysics, botany, and zoology, will enlighten her as to the nature of the physical universe with its fauna and flora; and she dare not shut her eyes to the light coming from these quarters, a lesson that great numbers of Christians have yet to learn. History, as is often said, is man's greatest teacher. We are all her students. The Church has much to learn from her. Particularly rich in instruction is the history of thought; and not the least important for the Church is the history of her own changing doctrine. This cries out aloud in protest against any generation assuming its own interpretation of life and thought to be final, for nothing is more noteworthy in the history of Christian doctrine than the fact that with the changing centuries the Creeds of the Church have undergone corresponding changes. He would be a rash and vain man who knowing this fact should venture to claim final authority for the product of his own thinking or the thinking of his generation.

The Church must always have a vital interest in the welfare of the people. She must furnish social motives for the masses. Out of her must arise movements directed toward the correction of abuses and the righting of wrongs in the social and industrial order. She must speak the word of moral authority to the struggling masses. She cannot keep out of the struggle between capital and labor. It is her mission to point the way of peace to the contestants in the industrial conflict. Nor will it serve to cry "Peace, Peace, when there is no peace." We are told repeatedly that the solution of the difficulty is in the creation of a state of good will in both parties to the issue. But the best will in the world will be ineffectual as long as ignorance holds the right of way on either side. Social and industrial questions today are complicated in the extreme. The various parts of the social and economic structure as a whole are inextricably interinvolved. To touch one is to disturb all the rest. None but skilled physicians should be intrusted with the care of the social body. To diagnose its ills and prescribe effective remedies is the work of well-trained practitioners and cannot be successfully performed by mere social quacks. These social experts should come forth from the Church and work in closest sympathy and cooperation with her. Only if such expert religious and technical preparation be given the social worker can we expect to find the measures proposed for the renovation of the social order both adapted to achieve their purpose and imbued with the truly Christian spirit.

If we turn to the field of political science we find the same imperative need. Never was there a louder call for wisdom and courage in municipal, national, and international affairs than that which is sounding forth today from every large city in our land and from every country the world around. This is no time for an ignoramus in political matters, not even if he be the most kind-hearted and devout of men. The wounds of the body politic, whether national or international, can be healed only by those richly endowed with knowledge of the issues involved and the conditions attached, and dominated by broad humanitarian, Christian motives. It is an obligation resting upon the Church to furnish opportunity and inspiration for this kind of leadership. Without such leadership the Kingdom of God will never be realized upon earth, nor His "will be done on earth as it is in Heaven."

Only within recent decades has the study of comparative religion or the history of religions found a place within our universities. We had been long content to think of the religions of the non-Christian peoples as composed of idolatry, superstition, and ignorance, and so not worth our serious consideration. But today we are beginning to realize the mistake of that attitude. From two points of view our interest has been aroused. The missionary movement in modern times has brought us to realize the necessity of our knowing something of the minds of the peoples whom we wish to win to Christianity. Closer contact with the representatives of non-Christian religions has revealed the fact that there are some principles and points of view common to them and to us. We are striving more and more to establish connecting links on the basis of common interests and ideals. We seek therefore to equip our missionaries not only with an acquaintance with the language of those to whom they

THE HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SOCIAL SERVICE WORK OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES

The Reverend Jos. M. Waterman, A. B., B. D., Baltimore, Md.

PLEA FOR THE SAILOR.

(From British and Foreign Sailors' Society Almanac.)

THE sailor has a very short life. On an average his sea life is only twelve years. On an average over the year six sailors are drowned every night. These are all cases of hurried deaths. His life is one of continual hazard. He is liable any moment to be called to enter into a life and death struggle. The moment he touches shore his troubles increase rather than diminish. He is waylaid by sharks who dare pitilessly to rob him, not only of his purse but his character, his peace of conscience and even his very soul. He suffers greater privation than other men. He leads the life of a stranger and scarcely ever enjoys a home. To him the Sabbath Day brings no Sabbath privileges. The atmosphere in which he moves is usually one hostile to religion. If he has his faults so much greater is his need of religion.

He who came to seek and save the lost is as able and willing to save the sailor as any other man, and when on earth He chose seven of His disciples from this class.

The origin of the Seamen Institute work in New York was an organization begun in 1833 (or 1843, accounts differ), called the "Young Men's Auxiliary Education and Missionary Society. The name was changed in 1841 to "Young Men's Church Missionary Society." This Society had a floating chapel on East River. In 1844 this organization was incorporated under the name of "The Protestant Episcopal Church Missionary Society for Seamen in the City and Port of New York."

Two years later it had two floating chapels, one on East River and one on the Hudson. In 1906 it assumed another and its present corporate name, "Seamen's Church Institute of New York."

"Wood in a neighbor's yard is private property with a policeman's club protecting it. Wood that drifts up onto the beach belongs to the first comer. Findings is keepings."

So the human driftwood that comes in from the sea has always been more or less regarded as public property, but, unfortunately for many years, the only persons interested in claiming it were sneak thieves, who had not courage enough to steal from the landsman, but who found an easy and almost unresisting prey in these strangers.

These crimes established themselves strategically as boarding-house keepers in a tight little ring around the water-front and by a system of collusion with shipping agents welcomed the sailor off his ship flush and sober and shipped him again drunk and broke, with perhaps a mortgage on his next pay day.

In 1851 a group of citizens endeavored to defeat those people on the waterfront who were preying on seamen, by opening a sailor's home on Greenwich Street, which was later taken over by the Society which is now the Seamen's Church Institute and moved to Franklin Square, then to Market Street. Still later it became the Breakwater Hotel for Seamen on Atlantic Avenue, Brooklyn, and, finally, the Seamen's Church Institute at 25 South Street. Those who began the housing of the seamen soon discovered that the open door to a clean, safe lodging was not enough. The despoiling of the seamen had become a means of livelihood for the crimps and no group is going to give up its bread and butter without a struggle.

While cleanliness and protection and a square deal awaited the seamen behind the friendly doors of the mission they were being met at the ships by the boats of the boarding-house keepers and taken to their dives. So the Seamen's Church Institute sent its boat out to meet the ships.

Even this did not equally match their forces against those of the boarding-house keepers, because the men complained that if they stayed at the sailors' home they would not be able to get a ship. To meet this difficulty a shipping bureau was established and the battle for the seamen began in earnest. It raged furiously for several years all up and down the waterfront, during which time Dr. Mansfield's life was threatened more than once. The boarding-house ring knew that if he won they went out of business and they were a desperate class of men. He did win and the old ring is now only a bad memory.

The "Breakwater" provided sleeping accommodations for one hundred and twenty men. It was opened in 1907 and closed in 1913, when the present building was opened. This building has sleeping accommodations for eight hundred and ten men." (From the Lookout.)

Dunnage: It checks baggage or stores it, transfers it to other Institutes or any part of the world where the owner may direct.

Postoffice: It handles his mail by forwarding it to constantly changing addresses.

Rooms and Dormitories: It maintains a home for him ashore, where he can get a comfortable bed at a cheap rate.

Wage Department or Bank: Money may be deposited, or sent to friends.

Educational Opportunities: Instruction is provided to enable and encourage men to rise in their profession.

Recreation and Entertainment is provided at the Institute.

Employment Service is maintained.

Sick Seamen and Medical Aid: United States Public Health Service maintains clinics at several institutes.

Ship Visiting: It is their purpose to visit every ship entering or leaving port.

Missing Men: Lists are circulated to keep in touch with seamen throughout the world.

Religious Work: "Although we consider every phase of our work a practical application of the Christian religion, nevertheless the more formal expressions of religion are never neglected. Services are held in chapels or rooms every Sunday. Bible classes are also held."

Seamen's Church Institute of America.

The formation of this national organization to promote work of the Church among seamen was begun in 1889, when a committee was appointed to investigate the work which should be undertaken. It must be remembered that the effort to organize a national work, was preceded by many years, the work of Church Institutes in many dioceses and ports. The background of this organization will be found in the preceding section entitled, "Service to Seamen."

1904 A Commission was appointed to undertake to co-operate with existing agencies, to foster the opening of new work and to train up personnel for this work.

1907 The Commission reported and urged that an organizing secretary be appointed to carry out the work and that the organization be named as above.

1910 The Provisional Board reported and urged that this organization be constituted auxiliary to the Board of Missions.

1916 A joint board was appointed to serve until 1919.

Seamen's Church Institute of America.

What It Is: The Seamen's Church Institute of America is a national organization, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York for "Promoting religious and social welfare work for the mental, moral and physical development, exclusively of all those who, whether as officers, seamen or boatmen, are employed upon or in connection with the sea, or upon inland waters of the United States of America.

Aims:

1. To initiate and develop in sea ports, lake ports and river ports of the United States, or its dependencies, or elsewhere in the world, wherever needed. Institutes where the men following the sea for their livelihood may obtain lodging, board, safety for their persons, moneys and personal effects, reasonable means of recreation and may be provided also with opportunity for some religious expression.

2. To establish common methods of operation, activities, means of dealing with undesirables, and general standards of conduct and to affiliate where possible with other agencies.

3. To promote the spread of knowledge concerning the needs of seamen.

"The nature of his calling demands that much of his life be spent away from home and family and in strange ports. When in port the sailor is subject to conditions over which he has no control. His loneliness and the reaction which is the natural result of his confinement on shipboard make him the easy victim of those who exploit him and a ready victim to the temptations ever present in a waterfront environment.

These conditions created for the seaman, and not by him, can only be changed when some Christian agency like the Seamen's Institute, wherein he may find safety, comfort and inspiration, is substituted for the resorts wherein he is robbed, and duped, . . . robbed not only of his material possessions, but also of his health, character and even his soul."

Work is now carried on in the following fourteen ports: New York, Philadelphia, San Francisco, Newport, R. I., San Pedro, Cal., Port Arthur, Texas, New Orleans, La., Boston, Mass., Tacoma, Wash., Tampa, Fla., Mobile, Ala., Havana, Cuba, Manila, P. I.

SERMON PREACHED BY THE RIGHT REVEREND B. D. TUCKER, D. D. At the Three Hundred and Fourteenth Anniversary of the Establishment of the Elizabeth City Parish, Hampton, Va.

Psalms 90:1—"Lord, Thou hast been our refuge from one generation to another."

GOD'S ancient people, Israel, with whom were His oracles, and of whom, concerning the flesh, Christ came, turned to History as their great teacher, full of warnings and yet full of inspiration, speaking of God's guidance in all the ways of life, of His mercy and loving kindness, and, above all, of His forbearance, his long suffering with them and their fathers. The Book of Deuteronomy traces the story of their exodus from Egypt, warning them of the consequences of sin, and setting before them the reward of fidelity to God. Two of the Psalms tell the chequered story with graphic power. In the New Testament, St. Stephen, as he makes his defence, gives with a power of marvelous condensation the history of Israel, from Abraham to Christ, points out their failures and disobedience, which had robbed them of their highest destiny, and calls them to find in the Just One, the Christ, Whom they had slain, their hope for the future.

As it was with Israel, so it is with every people, their present is inexorably linked with their past. They have to learn from their own history the great lessons of life.

Christianity itself is essentially an historic religion, and through all its advances and changes, it witnesses to the continuity of the faith. "One generation shall declare Thy works unto another."

We learn, my friends, of God and of Christ, and of their touch with our humanity, not through the philosophies and speculation of men, but through the witness of God's Word, of the glorious fellowship of the Apostles, of the goodly company of the prophets, of the noble army of martyrs, of the spirits of just men made perfect.

This is not only true of the whole period of Christian history, it is true of the short span of that story, as it touches the life of America.

And so we come, today, to this sacred spot, not simply in answer to sentiment, but because it witnesses to the truth of the Psalmist's words, "Lord, Thou hast been our refuge from one generation to another!"

We may welcome, therefore, the increase of interest in these historic places where the story of our people in America began.

Virginia is especially rich in its memorials of the past, Cape Henry, where those first pioneers landed; Jamestown, with its sacred shrine, and this holy site of a Church, where our fathers worshipped more than three centuries ago; old St. Luke's, which still stands across these waters; these are all places where our English civilization, and above all our English Christianity had their beginnings in America, and, therefore, should be dear to our people.

I was struck, when in Japan, by the strong hold of their history on its people. At the beautiful City of Nikko, rich in patriotic memories and associations, I saw three thousand school children, sent there, at the expense of the Government, in order that they might learn the lessons of patriotism which their past taught, and draw from them inspiration for citizenship, for love and for service for country.

And so we come here today, to this hallowed site of one of the earliest churches in America.

It is only in recent years that it has been identified. We owe to that consecrated layman, Jacob Heffelfinger, who has gone to the Church above, but who lingers in our memories, the recovery of this foundation, so long forgotten. Here we can offer to God our praises and our prayers, in the old familiar words of our service, which were spoken by voices which are still. Here, as we read God's Holy Word, we feel that its message to us is the same as its message to those who sleep around us—and this bears its testimony to the faith once delivered to the saints, "Jesus Christ the same, yesterday, today and forever!"

It seems probable that the first Church was here in 1620, and that in its walls, Mease, and Keith, and Cisse, and Bolton, and Fenton, and Stockton, ministered to God's flock. Here may have been baptized that first English child born in Virginia, daughter of John Layden and his wife, Anna, who were the first couple married at Jamestown; Virginia Dare on Roanoke Island, Virginia Layden at Jamestown and Kecoughtan, these two are the leaders of that great womanhood of America, which may mean so much for God and for our country.

This first Church must have been a homely thing, but it, doubtless, surpassed the simple homes in which the people dwelt, for in their hearts, as John Smith said, was the feeling that the stateliest house in every community should be the House of God.

It is helpful to picture these first settlers in Virginia, to learn something of the high courage that guided them across the seas, and above all of their faith in God, and of their realization of the truth which applies to the family, to the community and to the nation, that except the Lord build the House, they labour in vain that build it.

It was in what Tennyson calls "The spacious times of Great Elizabeth," that the thought of claiming this continent of North America for England and for Christ first came to our forefathers. Men like Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, were those who helped to save this broad land for English-speaking people. They were comrades of Will Shakespeare, of rare Ben Jonson, of Spencer, of Marlowe, and of Bacon. They were men of mixed character, with their frailties and their faults. But back of it all they had the pride of race, the love of England and unflinching loyalty to God and to Christ.

It was the sons of this generation who sailed from England in three small barks, whose aggregated tonnage was not over three hundred tons. They made their first settlement at Jamestown in 1607, but a little colony was established here as early as 1610.

The story of that first settlement in Virginia, with all its perils and hardships, is a story of recurring disaster, and, at times, of strife and dissension. What saved it was that back of it all was the realization that the only safeguard for human life was the shelter and the nurture of the Church of God.

They made many mistakes, these first settlers. They were sometimes cruel, harsh, selfish, for those were times which tried men's souls, but the saving power was, the belief in Christ, as shield and defence, and as guide to higher and better things.

It is hard to picture the difficulties with which they had to contend, what hardships they had to endure, what perils they encountered. It required courage and faith to build an English civilization on virgin soil where there were no roots of the past. As we think of what they endured—famine, massacre, isolation—we feel that they were only preserved by their trust and faith in God, because they could say, looking back through the story of their people, "Lord, Thou hast been our refuge from one generation to another."

They came to seek their own fortunes, to extend the domain of old England, but above all, to help to build in a strange land the Kingdom of God.

And so they speak to us, today, from the past, and bid us, as we build for the future to remember that for a high and pure and ideal civilization there is no other foundation than that which is laid, even Christ Jesus.

When they came to this strange land, they brought with them tools and clothing, and food and weapons for defence, things which were needed for a settlement in what to them was a wilderness. But they brought with them also the Word of God, in a tongue which they could understand, that Word which they owed to their fathers, who died at the stake that it might be saved for their children. They brought with them the habit of prayer, the sacraments of Christ's grace, the worship of Mother Church, and priests of God like Hunt and Buck to minister to them in holy things.

They realized that without these things of God, the great adventure would fail. They knew that no nation can really prosper, no family, no society, no life be pure and high except there be the guidance of God and of Christ.

Generations have passed since then. This ancient parish has known many vicissitudes. War after war has battered the walls of its Church, fire has destroyed its interior, famine and poverty have threatened to close the doors of the House of God. But still the Church, which had its feeble beginnings on this site, preaches the Gospel of Christ and cares for the children of God: "One generation shall declare Thy works unto another."

There is something after all in lineage, in ancestry, in inheritance. All the past belongs to you and what you are you owe in no small part to the past. There are names associated with this parish which have their representatives in all parts of Virginia, in a large part of America. The Armisteads, the Hopes, the Seldens, the Fontaines, the Careys, the Tuckers, the Latimers, the Watts, the Mallorys, their blood runs in the veins of our children. They helped to make them what they are. We are all heirs of the past, and, therefore, we must turn back to it, with gratitude to God, for the inspiration of the future.

We thank God for these latter years of prosperity and of spiritual advance. For the ministry of men like Gravatt, and Bryan, and Estill and Carter, and McAllister, with his large vision of the future, who have builded on these ancient foundations, and helped to make St. John's Church known in Virginia, and in the Church at large, as a Church which deems it a privilege to help to extend Christ's Kingdom to all parts of the earth.

As we look at our country, today, with its great place among the people's of the world, leading all nations in wealth, in power, and in opportunity, we can only pray God that He may guide us as a people to seek those higher things which He has revealed, righteousness and peace, purity and love.

There are perils before us, as there were perils before Israel, the perils of selfishness, of pride, of forgetfulness, of God, of the realization that duty and service to God and to man are the highest things in life.

America has a great mission to the world, as Israel had. She can only fulfil it, as she hears the voice of the generations that have gone, telling us that Christ alone is the Way, the Truth and the Life!

We must look to the past and say,

"Lord, Thou hast been our refuge from one generation to another"—

And then we must look to the future and say,

"This God shall be our God forever and forever."

go, but also with a knowledge of their thought-forms, social customs, and religious convictions and hopes. Not only from the point of view of this practical interest is the Church concerned with the study of religions, but also from the point of view of its task as interpreter of the world in terms of religion: "God in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless, He left not Himself without witness" in any generation, nor, among any people. We are finding much to supplement our own interpretation of life among the interpretations offered by other religious thinkers. The Christian philosopher does not ignore the philosophies of ancient Greece; he studies them diligently and learns much from them. The theologian likewise cannot shut his eyes to the religious thought of Persia, India, and China. He must familiarize himself with it to some extent, at least, if only that he may better understand the nature and meaning of his own religious history.

The entire universe is an expression of the divine mind, but it is in man himself that the most intimate and personal revelation of Deity is given. The study of the human mind is therefore of first-class significance and value to religion. Both from the point of view of its task as interpreter of the universe and from that of its practical work as teacher of men concerning the things of God, the Church is vitally interested in the science of psychology. Only in recent years has the full value of this way of approach to the religious problem and task been understood; but today departments or professors of the psychology of religion or of religious education are found in all our leading theological schools. The teacher of religion is surely in no less need of the best pedagogical methods than is the teacher of secular knowledge. He must know something of the nature of the mind that he is attempting to influence, otherwise he is but shooting into the air. The theologian, too, is keenly interested in the findings of the psychologists. Such concepts as regeneration, the freedom of the will, immortality, and the soul cannot be formulated and held successfully in total ignorance or disregard of the findings of psychology. Some modern psychologists are undertaking to deny the existence of God and to rule out the possibility of the future life, but in so doing they are transcending the limits of psychology and to that extent are forgetting their scientific principles and methods. But such a situation does but emphasize the necessity that the Church should know all that psychology can say, and should through its own scholars lead the way in psychological investigations.

Religion has no need to be afraid of facts. Facts in themselves have never brought injury to the cause of truth and righteousness. Neglect and perversion of the facts or refusal to let them have their way has always been, and will always be, fraught with trouble for religion and the Church. The Church is in God's world. She has a right there. She is not an interloper. She is at home in her Father's House. Nothing can displace her. Let her acquaint herself fully with the furnishings of her home, and spare no effort in coming to know the meaning and value of her surroundings. An acquaintance with the history of the past will reassure her. The discovery of new facts and the truer interpretation of old facts have brought enrichment of life at every turn. The indifference and hostility of the ecclesiastical mind to the progress of knowledge is in part due to that intellectual inertia which besets us all and to which many yield easily. We shrink instinctively from the labor and pain involved in the learning of new facts and the adjustment to new mental processes. We ask only to be let alone in our slothful ease. But perhaps a more powerful motive pushing us toward opposition to things new is the conception of religion that we generally hold. We accept a body of precept and practice as a quantum of revelation, and think of that revelation as having been received by extraordinary men in miraculous ways. For most people that carries with it the thought of finality. God has spoken once for all, and His voice will not again be heard until the Day of Judgment. But a knowledge of the facts of history and experience changes our conceptions of the nature and processes of revelation and teaches us to label nothing as final. We are ever learning and constantly coming to the knowledge of new truth. That has been the method by which our civilization in its entirety has been built up and there are no signs as yet that any new method of

THE EAST WIND IN MAH JONG—AND IN LIFE.

"You have to pay double," remarked the veteran to the beginner.

"Why?" queried the latter, somewhat in dismay.

"Because you are 'East Wind'," was the reply.

"But I thought you said everybody paid me double when I was 'East Wind'."

"They do if you win, but if you lose you must pay double."

Such a conversation has no doubt taken place more than once at tables, where that fascinating old game of Mah-Jong is being introduced.

It sounds anomalous to say "introducing" an "old" game, but it clears it up somewhat to explain that this pastime, which has so recently taken possession of our country has an ancient (and fairly honorable) record in the East. We say "fairly honorable," because it has been said that this game offers such an unlimited gambling field that our Chinese missionaries are shocked that Bishops, clergy and people are playing it in this supposedly Christian country.

There are two traditions about the game: One is that it was invented by an old sea captain, who found it very difficult to keep his sailors contented, and so devised this game, with its innumerable opportunities, and its happy combination of luck and skill; another story goes that the game was found to be so fascinating by the royal family of China that it was not thought safe to allow the lower classes to play it, for fear they would spend all their time doing so, and not do any work, but that one royal leader found himself in such straits that he promised his followers that if they should be victorious in the coming battle they should be allowed to play the royal game.

Anyway, there seems to be no doubt that permission to play Mah Jong, or Pung Chow, as it is occasionally called, was granted, as a concession to the laboring classes by their rulers, some time during the past century.

Whatever may be the truth or falsity of these traditions there is no doubt that "the game of life," is a name that has sometimes been applied to it. There is good reason too for this title.

The position of "East Wind," which receives, and pays double, is found in life as often as in Mah Jong. It is also a fact that many persons are like the beginner in the conversation we have quoted, and expect the two-fold payments to be all coming and never going.

One of the chief objects of Our Saviour's teaching is to correct this view of life. We find Him constantly bringing to the attention of His hearers the great principle that in proportion as you receive so shall you give. His reiterations of it are most interesting and more numerous than we realize until we begin to count them up. He taught it from both ends so to speak.

The most startling and outstanding instance in the teaching of Our Saviour of a man, who, in life, occupied the position of "East Wind," is the rich man in the parable of Lazarus. He had received "double" all of his life. His purple and fine linen and sumptuous fare had come to him in more than two-fold proportion. He had not had to labor for them, they were unstinted and unlimited in quantity, and apparently in quality. But he had never recognized the responsibility that was placed upon him through receiving so lavishly.

So far from giving out in double proportion, he did not give at all. Our Saviour emphasizes this, with His quiet eloquence by mentioning the kind ministrations of the dogs who licked the sores of Lazarus. These dumb brutes cared more and gave more than did the favorite of fortune beyond the gates, where Lazarus lay.

In life, however, as well as in Mah Jong, settlement time comes sooner or later. It may not be in the life in this world, but life is not confined to this world. As St. Paul puts it, "Some men's sins do go before them to judgment, and some do follow after." In the case of Diva, his sins did "follow after," and we see him, still in life, but on the other side of the grave, learning the bitter lesson, that since he had received in double payments, he should also have disbursed in two-fold quantity. He was not in torment simply because he was rich, but because being rich, he had not recognized his responsibilities.

This parable is an illustration of Christ's teaching on this subject to those who have, but his message is not for the fortunate only. It includes the humblest and the poorest as well.

There is the widow who gives only the tiny mite, but gives all she has. She was not the "East Wind" in life. She had not received double, therefore, it was not expected that she should give in great quantity and the little coin would give spiritual wealth out of all proportion to the size of the gift because her contribution was large only when compared to what she had left.

After all, the size of our gift is not the measure by which to estimate our contribution, either to life or to material things. The real measure of the greatness of the effort is what we retain after it is made, either in strength or money.

This law of proportion is emphasized again in the parable of the Talents. The man who had five made five more and came with ten. He, too, to whom only two had been given, brought but four to his master. Nevertheless, the reward is identical, not because four equal ten, but because it requires as great an effort to increase two to four, as it does to make ten out of five. It is a beautiful illustration of the way Christ's teaching is meant to reach to every strata of society.

The poor are blessed, not because they are poor. On the contrary, their reward is to be released from poverty. The blessing of the poor is, that their responsibilities are not so great, nor their temptations so subtle. We use that word advisedly. We feel that it best describes the temptations of the rich.

It is so easy to say, "If I had as much money as Mr. B. I would do thus and so." As the money comes, however, all sorts of other ways of using it arise, that seem more pressing than giving it away. And the temptation to selfishness creeps upon us inch by inch, or we might say, dollar by dollar. That is the temptation of the rich.

Beware of the "East Wind" in Mah Jong—and in life!

Religion in the Home.

You know how much can be learned by heart by children, and even be appropriated on the surface of their mind, and yet vanish with extraordinary rapidity when they go out into life; but it is not so with the influences of the home. They are far profounder. That is most surely retained by the child which promotes most reaction of his own faculties: and the reaction of the child's life is intensest and most cordial and personal there, in the heart of the home.

The religion he learns from his father and mother and associates with the life that he loves best he may rebel against in the exuberance of youth; he may resent it when it lays restraint upon him; but it will be deep in him, and the chances are that he will come back to it. Never imagine that the parent can lay upon any other person the primary obligation for religious teaching. Never imagine that there can be in the schools any substitute for the religious teaching of the home.—Charles Gore.

STORY OF A GREAT PARISH TOLD IN AN INTERESTING BOOK

In this volume, most handsomely and profusely illustrated, the present Junior Warden of Grace Church in the City of New York, has written not only a history of that Parish, but a survey of much of the religious life in New York for the last century. The scope of the book, and the fact that it is no narrowly parochial chronicle, are indicated by the chapter titles. The first chapter, for example, is "The Church of England in Virginia," the second, "The Church of England in New York," and the last two are "Five Elder Brothers of Grace Church" and "Our Neighbors." Where the chapters deal more directly with Grace Church itself, they link its chronicle—as the Church itself has been linked—to the history and spirit of the whole Church in America. Hardly indeed could it be otherwise when a historian is reviewing such rectorates as those of Henry Codman Potter and of William Reed Huntington, and of other men who from Grace Church have put their stamp upon the thought and work of Christianity far beyond their parochial borders.

Of especial interest, too, is the chapter on "The Neighborhood of the Second Grace Church in 1846," the year when the present building in Tenth Street and Broadway was completed. For his material Mr. Stewart has gone not only to the vestry records and other official documents of the Church, but he has also woven into his story bits of old journals and contemporary accounts which have a very charming human flavour. A little girl, Catherine Elizabeth Havens, began to keep a diary at the middle of the last century, and thus Mr. Stewart quotes from her entry under August 6, 1849:

"Stages run through Bleecker Street and Eighth Street and Ninth Street right past our house, and it puts me right to sleep when I come home from the country to hear them rumble over the cobblestones. There is a line on Fourteenth Street, too, and that is the highest uptown . . . I roll my hoop and jump the rope in the afternoon, sometimes in the Parade Ground on Washington Square, and sometimes in Union Square. My brother says he remembers when it was a pond and the farmers used to water their horses in it.

"My mother heard old Dr. Bethune preach a sermon once about the woman who lost her piece of money and searched until she found it, and he said, 'One thing is certain, my friends; she raised a great dust.' . . . We have so many churches all around us we ought to be very good."

From the account of another, who was a small boy living in the neighborhood when Grace Church was built, Mr. Stewart draws this quaint description: "At the time of the laying of the cornerstone I was a boy of nine or ten (born in 1835) and living on the southwest corner of Broadway and Tenth Street diagonally opposite the Brevoort apple orchard. My attention was first called to men engaged in cutting down the trees which I considered a piece of vandalism, being at that period very fond of apples. A short time after I noticed they were digging the foundations of a building, and then a number of people, some clergymen, gathered round the hole. Although I had not received any invitation, boy-like, I joined the throng to find out what was going on. From a crane over a thick bed of mortar hung a large stone, which the workmen were preparing to lower to its place, and just as I had reached the front row the men who were lowering the stone very slowly, let it out of control, or something broke allowing the stone to drop, scattering the mortar in all directions over the clergy and laity without distinction. I know I got my full share. The further proceedings interested me no more, as I made for home to change a new suit I had only donned that morning."

Of the men who have been in charge of Grace Church from its foundation until 1922, Mr. Stewart writes:

"It is interesting to note the early age at which the seven rectors of Grace Church assumed the leadership of the parish. Dr. Bowen was thirty years old, Dr. Montgomery thirty-one, Dr. Wainwright—the youngest—twenty-nine, Dr. Taylor thirty-five, Dr. Potter thirty-three, Dr. Huntington—the oldest—forty-five, and Dr. Slattery forty-three. Dr. Bowen's rectorate covered nine years; Dr. Montgomery's—the shortest—only two years; Dr. Wainwright's twelve years; Dr. Taylor's—the longest—thirty-three years; Dr. Potter's fifteen years; Dr. Huntington's twenty-five years, and Dr. Slattery's twelve years. Of the total period Dr. Taylor's and Dr. Huntington's rectorates covered more than half, the average term of service of the seven rectors of Grace Church being over sixteen years. (Mr. Stewart's history concludes with the record of the call of the eighth and present rector, Dr. Bowie.)

"Four of the seven were raised to the Episcopate. Dr. Bowen became Bishop of South Carolina in 1818, Dr. Wainwright Bishop of New York in 1852, Dr. Potter Assistant Bishop of New York in 1883, and Bishop in 1887, and Dr. Slattery became Bishop-Coadjutor of Massachusetts in 1922. The rectorates of Dr. Taylor and Dr. Huntington were closed by death. Dr. Montgomery soon laid down his charge because of failing health."

In separate chapters, Mr. Stewart tells the story of the ideals and the work of these various men, especially of the last four. It was due to the foresight and the determined energy of Dr. Taylor that the congregation moved from the original church, near old Trinity, and built (with Renwick as the architect), the Gothic Church at the head of Broadway, which has been one of the creative influences in the deliverance of American ecclesiastical architecture from uninspired ugliness into grace and beauty. Dr. Potter, who succeeded Dr. Taylor, began at Grace Church that powerful leadership, by word and work, in the civic life of New York, which was continued later in his statesman-like career as Bishop. At Grace Church, also, William Reed Huntington achieved that rare combination of the scholar and the practical builder, which made him, on the one hand, the leader in many intellectual movements in the Council of the whole Church, and on the other hand, the unresting creator at home of such remarkable ministries as those of the Grace Hospital and of Grace Chapel, on the East Side, concerning which Mr. Stewart writes one of his most valuable chapters. And at Grace Church, Dr. Slattery (now Bishop Slattery) carried on the literary distinction of Dr. Huntington, while he brought to the Parish also his extraordinary devotion as a parish priest and shepherd of his people.

Something of the significance of Grace Church for the city and for the Church at large, Mr. Stewart sums up in this comment, with the quotation of which he closes one of his chapters:

"There are three Broadways. The old bridle path and country road that still defies the exact right angles of later New York is crowded and teeming on its lower end all the business hours of the day. That is the first Broadway. At its middle it is the street famed in popular song and glittering story; its bright lights are spoken of with wide eyes the world round. This is the second Broadway. Its upper end is home for a million or more souls, who there are pigeon-holed away to rest. This is the third Broadway. And at Broadway's most defying turn, Tenth Street, rises Grace Church, loving friend and servant to all her Broadways for over a century.

"It is in 'The Old Homestead', the play of some few years ago and the film of more recent years, that we have seen Grace Church pictured in one of her number of good works. As one goes westward, even all of the way to the Pacific Coast, one hears Grace Church spoken of as 'the kindly church'. One recalls that it was the attraction of this kindly atmosphere that made possible the reunion of father and son from 'back home' in that play and film.

"Grace Church is a parish church, but Grace Church is more than a parish church. She is interested in all those Broadways, the things and people that make those Broadways what they are. And, because of being known to so many visitors in summer and winter, one might say, that as regards her parish, the country, anyway, is the limit!"

Finally, of Mr. Stewart's work in general it may be said that the book, though of course of most vivid interest to those persons who have been in some way connected with Grace Parish, is an important historical document for all who seek to gather suggestions from the history of one of the great parishes of the American Church.

MEMORIAL.

To the Rev. Edward L. Goodwin,
D. D., and to His Son.

On Sunday, July 20, Bishop Brown visited St. James' Church, Ashland, where he preached to a large congregation and confirmed a class of six. At the close of the service the Bishop dedicated a beautiful lectern which had been placed in the church by members of the congregation in memory of the Rev. Edward L. Goodwin, D. D., late rector of the parish. The lectern is of rich dark walnut, especially designed to correspond with the Pulpit and Communion Table. On the base is a brass tablet bearing this inscription:

To the Glory of God and in Memory of

The Rev. Edward Lewis Goodwin,
D. D.

Rector of this Church 1910-1921
Rector Emeritus 1921-1924
He preached unto them Jesus and the Resurrection.

Bishop Brown, in a few well chosen words, spoke of Dr. Goodwin's high standing in the General Church, as an authority on Canonical Law, and Church History; upon the beauty of his devotional life, and the rich heritage left to this congregation in the memory of his life and ministry.

The congregation of St. James has also lately placed in the church a silver Communion Service as a memorial to Lieut. Edward Le B. Goodwin, of the Medical Corps, son of the Rev. Edward L. Goodwin, D. D., who died in the service of his country in October, 1918.

Greek Bishop Deposed.

Our Bishops and some of our parish clergy have been in doubt as to how they should receive the Greek Bishop Basil, who has been in this country for about a year. While they have wanted to offer him every courtesy as a visitor, they have felt him a probable intruder. The Foreign-Born Americans Division has received a communication dated July 15 from the office of the Greek Archdiocese of North and South America, enclosing a copy of the following sentence of deposition:

Because the Greek Bishop Basil, formerly Metropolitan of Methymna, in the Patriarchate of Constantinople, came to America against the orders of the Ecumenical Patriarchate, intruding in the province of another Bishop, namely, in the jurisdiction of the Greek Archdiocese of North and South America, which has its lawful head, the Most Rev. Archbishop Alexander; because the said Bishop Basil did not heed the warning of the Patriarchate to leave America and to return to Greece; because he is the author of several anticanonical acts, chiefly by unlawfully ordaining priests and creating trouble and factions in the Greek Orthodox Church in America; because he unlawfully proclaimed himself "Metropolitan of America and Canada," he was summoned to appear before the Holy Synod of the Ecumenical Patriarchate and explain his anticanonical attitude. He having paid no attention to the summons, the Holy Synod tried him in default and decided as follows:

Resolved, The Holy Synod, in default of the accused, judges and decides,

Declares unanimously that the Metropolitan of Chaldia, Basil, formerly Metropolitan of Methymna, is guilty of the said anticanonical acts and finds that he must be punished,

Imposes upon him the penalty of deposition and degradation from the office of the Bishop, and, in general, from every clerical capacity, unfrocks him, and, hereafter, places him in the ranks of laymen,

Orders that this present decision be communicated to the deposed through the Greek Archdiocese of North and South America, and that it be published in a Greek and in an American newspaper in America, Concedes him the right to make use before it of the lawful judiciary means.

Done, adjudged, decided and announced, in the Patriarchate of Constantinople, this seventeenth day of May, 1924.

Conference On Politics, Economics and Citizenship.

The struggle for spiritualization demands a change of emphasis from the institutional to the spiritual, from the "organizational" to the personal need. The older Bishops are not averse to this. They know the need, yet in many ways they are literally bound stomach and leg by the apron and gaiter of tradition. But a new type of Bishops is growing up. Many of the leaders of reform of a few years ago are now on the Episcopal bench. Temple (Manchester), Wood (Winchester), Walter Cary and Neville Talbot from Africa. These and others as Bishops, Dick Sheppard at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields and his followers, as priests, Dean Inge in another way, and older men more quietly, differing greatly and not always loved, are vigorous and united in mind on the necessity of a change of emphasis. It is becoming increasingly plain that what men want to know about Christian people is not so much whether they belong to a particular section of ecclesiastical opinion as whether their religion is a living one? Religious institutions must be judged more strictly by their influence on the life of nations, of society, and of the individual.

C. O. P. E. C. stands for this altered emphasis. It is wisely organized, is interdenominational in the best sense, i. e., it is truly national, its findings are in many ways revolutionary of present English life and challenge debate, but it is stressing the need of Christian personality, and it is out to reach the homes and to teach. It is doing so by the study group system.

It is not a Council of Social Service functioning for the Churches, but aims to make the Church itself function as a social being.

The shifting of emphasis was a broadening and deepening influence upon general Church thought. It is no longer so easy to separate the sheep from the goat in the matter of "High" and "Low". Both of these camps have been split on other issues. They depended perhaps more than they knew upon outward institutional forms. After all there is a certain lack of incentive in a fight where there gathers no crowd to cheer. And the crowd just isn't any longer interested that way. In many cases both sides have found common ground on a worthier field. So the immediate conflict is in demobilization of the institutional stress. It is a revolutionary conflict. It says in effect that we are going to reach the nation for Christ's wider gospel even if we have to go outside to do it. It is the first time perhaps that the Church in England has been able to couple an acknowledgment of the necessity to get outside with the willingness to do so. It is a great advance in principle. We are in a wider way witnessing the birth in England of the Social Gospel.

How far all this comes from pressure of political upheaval it would be difficult to say. There is room for a historical thesis dealing with changes in Christian doctrine due to political evolution. Labor is to the fore in this day and generation, and even in England is actually becoming respectable. . . . So we may bring forth the social Gospel unblushingly. Well, we may be thankful that it is Christ's Gospel, and such an enquiry leads nowhere except perhaps to a sense of humor, and to humility of mind. . . . both fair things, Brother, as George Barrow would have said.—J. E. Ward, in the Canadian Churchman.

Gift to St. Luke's Hospital.

The value of the Japanese yen is a little less than half a dollar. The Department of Missions has received word from Bishop McKim in Tokyo that the City Government has made St. Luke's Hospital a gift of 150,000 yen.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

The Annual Meeting at Lamb's Creek Church, King George County.

The Lamb's Creek Church Association held its annual meeting at the church on Sunday, August 3. The purpose of this organization is to restore and keep in repair this beautiful old church, which was built in 1770, but was almost demolished during the War Between the States. Its location is such that it was almost in the middle of the pathway of the great armies that surged back and forth in those dreadful days, being only a few miles from Fredericksburg.

The walls, roof and floors are now in excellent condition, so that complete restoration can be made, and no doubt will be made, in the course of a few years.

The annual meeting of the Association always consists of the celebration of the Holy Communion in the morning, followed by a bountiful "basket dinner," and a business meeting in the afternoon. This year the Rev. J. Letcher Showell, the rector of the parish, was in charge of the services, and the choir from St. George's Church, Fredericksburg, assisted with the music.

An unusually large number were present, and the following officers were elected: Henry Garnett, President; Langborne Williams, Vice-President; Mrs. Allen Smith, Treasurer; Roy Stuart, Secretary; Mrs. Frank Taylor, Assistant Secretary.

Regular services are now being held in this church on the third Sunday of each month at four P. M.

A Service of Thanksgiving will be held in Wickliffe Church, Clarke County, Va., the Rev. George S. Vest, rector, on Sunday afternoon, August 10, for the safe return of Miss Mary Jacqueline Smith, after four years' service as a missionary of the Episcopal Church in Yangchow, China.

Tappahannock: Congregational meetings have been held at St. John's Church at this place, and St. Paul's Church, Miller's Tavern, under the same rector, the Rev. Herbert Osbourne, for the purpose of information and inspiration in meeting Diocesan obligation as set forth in the budget. Much interest has been manifested, and these two churches will certainly do their part before the close of this fiscal year.

The new dormitory for St. Margaret's School is rapidly nearing completion, and, when finished, will accommodate twenty girls, which will bring the capacity of the School up to fifty boarding pupils. The growth of this institution has been most gratifying, and fully justifies the wisdom of the Diocesan authorities in selecting this point for a girls' school.

This is one of the most energetic and progressive sections of the Diocese, the Tappahannock Convocation having started a Summer Conference, which has proved most successful. Out of this conference has grown a movement amongst the laymen which culminates on August 5 in a meeting at St. John's Church here, at which it is hoped representatives will be present from all of the forty-three churches in the Convocation. The proceedings will be entirely in the hands of the laity, no clergy or ladies participating in the program.

Diocesan Committee Much Encouraged. The Committee appointed by the Diocesan Missionary Society of which the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., is chairman, for the purpose of carrying on a campaign of education throughout the Diocese in regard to the budget has already held meetings at Harrisonburg, in Valley Convocation, and Marshall, Warrington and The Plains, in the Piedmont Convocation. The attendance at these meetings and the enthusiasm developed shows that the most important part of raising the budget is to show the people the purposes for which the money is needed. Once the necessity for funds to carry forward God's Kingdom on Earth is brought home to the people satisfactory results follow.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The Associate Mission Field.

During the month of July Bishop Jett spent quite a good deal of time among the mission points in the southwestern part of the Diocese, visiting both officially and informally, and he plans to be in that section again in the latter part of August.

In connection with these trips the Bishop is exploring, in his automobile, some of the counties in which no work is being conducted by our Church. There are now only two of these counties with which he has not familiarized himself to some extent and it is his hope to go into these before very long.

Interesting Mission in Campbell County.

On Sunday, July 13, Bishop Jett visited three churches under the charge of the Rev. Thomas Carter Page, confirmed five persons at St. Peter's Church, Altavista, four at the Church of Our Saviour near Evington, and five at St. Andrew's Mission, near Altavista.

The Church of Our Saviour was for a long time a sort of interdenominational mission and was known as "Blue Door Chapel." In the past two or three years, however, it has been possible for Mr. Page to do more intensive work at this point. In this he has the able assistance of Mrs. O. V. Rowles, a devoted and most faithful Churchwoman who lives in the neighborhood.

This was the Bishop's first visitation to St. Andrew's Mission. For a long time Mr. Page has hoped to establish a mission at this point, which is about six miles northeast of Altavista.

First a Sunday School was organized. The interest of the local people steadily increased and now a chapel has been built and has been in use for some time. In addition to the confirmations noted above, three persons were baptized on the thirteenth.

The Rev. Edgar C. Burnz, who, since February, 1923, has been rector of St. Paul's Church at Saltville, Christ Church at Marion and Grace Church at Glade Spring, has resigned these charges, effective August 1, and has accepted the position of State Director of Near East Relief in North Carolina.

The officers of these churches are making every effort to find a suitable successor to Mr. Burnz as soon as possible.

New Rector for Covington. The Rev. Robert A. Brayshaw, formerly of Montgomery, West Virginia, has accepted a call to the rectorship of Emmanuel Church, Covington, Va., effective August 15. He will also have charge of the work at Low Moor and of Grace Mission at the Home for Boys, near Covington.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Death of Prominent Colored Clergyman.

Monday, July 21, at his home near Bracey, Virginia, the Rev. Jos. W. Carroll, the oldest colored clergyman in the diocese, save two, passed quietly into eternal life after a lingering illness, which he bore with Christian resignation and fortitude. The Rev. Mr. Carroll was rector for many years of St. Mark's, Bracey; one of the largest of our rural congregations and also of Christ Church, Red Lawn. He was in the sixty-eighth year at the time of death. Entering the ministry in his young manhood, he was a servant of Christ for thirty-nine years.

He was orphaned at an early age and was given to Mrs. Mary Maclin, who brought him up in the Church and Sunday School and also sent him to day school. As a youth he was a teacher in the Sunday School. Feeling that he was called to the sacred ministry he entered the Bishop Payne Divinity School in the autumn of 1881. He was ordained to the Diaconate by the late Bishop F. M. Whittle, beginning his ministry at St. Mark's, Bracey. In his long ministry he served St. Paul's, Union Level, St. Mary's, La-Crosse; Ascension, Palmer's Springs; Christ Church, Red Lawn and Peyton's Chapel, Skelton.

He was a faithful, conscientious minister and greatly beloved by the people in each of his charges. At the time of his death he was rounding out his life's work by planning to build a new St. Mark's. The project lay close to his heart and despite his feebleness he continued to think upon this work. He was spared to see his plans under way and a new St. Mark's will soon arise to the glory of God and a memorial to his faithfulness and the devotion of his good people.

The Rev. Mr. Carroll was twice married, the first time to Miss Sadie Baptist, Boydton, Va., who preceded him to the grave some years ago. Their union was blessed by six children, all of whom survive except one. His second wife was Miss Mary Berry, of Petersburg, Va., by whom he is survived.

Funeral services were held at St. Mark's, Bracey, on the twenty-fourth. Bishop Thomson officiated, assisted by Archdeacon Russell, the Revs. E. E. Miller, E. H. Hamilton, J. Alvin Russell, C. E. Green and M. B. Birchett. Some others who were in attendance upon the Religious Summer School at Lawrenceville, were present. There being no church building the services were conducted from the porch of the parish school, while the large audience congregated in the spacious yard about the school to pay the last sad tribute of respect to a beloved and faithful pastor.

A Remarkable Record.

The Teachers' Circle of St. John's Church, Hampton, Va., is conducting its regular weekly meetings throughout the summer. For more than thirty years the teachers of St. John's Church School have held this weekly meeting without missing once.

At the last teachers' meeting, Mrs. John Hughes gave a very interesting report of her work at Sweet Briar Summer School. Demonstration lessons from the course on "Present Day Mission Fields of the Church" are being taught each week. The last lesson was presented by Mr. John Weymouth, the Superintendent of the School.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D.

The Rev. William F. Pierce, D. D., President of Kenyon College, was the preacher at the open-air service of the Washington Cathedral on Sunday, July 27. At the eleven-o'clock service in the morning of the same day, Dr. Pierce preached the sermon at Trinity Diocesan Church.

A number of the Washington clergy will take their vacations in August and will have their pulpits supplied by visiting clergy. At the Washington Cathedral, the Very Rev. Franklin Johns Bohanan, D. D., dean of Easton, Maryland, will have charge of the morning services. At All Saints' Church, Chevy Chase, the pulpit will be supplied by the Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne, of Marietta, Georgia, and at Epiphany Church the Rev. William L. Mayo will assist at the Sunday services during the summer and will have charge of the Summer Sunday School. According to the custom of several years past, the parishes of St. John's and Christ Church, Georgetown, will combine services during the six weeks beginning July 27 and ending the first Sunday in September. These services will be in charge of the Rev. Calvert E. Buck, son of the late Rev. Charles Buck, for several years rector of St. John's Church and well known and loved in Georgetown.

M. M. W.

UPPER SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Bishop.

Grace Church, Camden.

The Rev. Ilbery deLacy Brayshaw, now rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Orangeburg, Diocese of South Carolina, has been called to the rectorship of Grace Church, Camden, and has accepted the call. He will take charge of his new congregation on the first Sunday in September. Mr. Brayshaw has been especially associated with the work among Young People in the old "Mother Diocese" and he will, it is felt, be a great acquisition to this phase of the Church's work in Upper South Carolina.

The Rev. Frank A. Juhan, rector of Christ Church, Greenville, has been elected Bishop of the Diocese of Florida, and has accepted this high honor and great responsibility. Upper South Carolina will miss him and his splendid work greatly, but her prayers will follow him in the larger field of service to which he has been called.

Graniteville and Associate Missions.

The Bishop of the Diocese made a special visitation to St. Paul's Mission, Graniteville, South Carolina, on July 20. At this time he confirmed a class of nineteen from St. Paul's, and the missions at Bath, Clearwater and Langley. These candidates ranged in age from twelve to seventy-nine. This was the second class to be presented to the Bishop since the first of the year—thirteen were confirmed on January 6.

The mission at Clearwater is growing very fast; there are now some forty members of the Church there and it is hoped that a building for worship will be erected in the early fall.

One of the St. Paul's girls, Lila Togneri, who is a graduate of the State College for Girls at Rock Hill, has recently been elected the teacher of Fine Arts in her alma mater, and will assume her new duties at Winthrop in the fall.

The rector of the Graniteville chain of Missions, and his associate worker, Miss Mary Ramsaur, are to be congratulated on their untiring and efficient labors in the Horsecreek Valley.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Eaglesmere, Pa.: On Thursday, July 10, in the Church of St. John in the Wilderness, Eaglesmere, Bishop Darlington ordained Francis B. Creamer to the Diaconate.

The candidate was presented by his rector, the Rev. Charles Everett McCoy, Trinity Parish, Williamsport. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Father Huntington, O. H. C. Mr. Creamer was graduated from Trinity College, Hartford, in 1921, and from the Berkeley Divinity School in 1924. At the early age of eighteen, he enlisted in the Field Artillery, and saw service at once as Corporal in the Mexican Border Service. As Sergeant-Major in Infantry, he went overseas, and took part in the following engagements: Chateau Thierry, Advance of Ourq and Vesle Rivers, Fismes and Fismette, Argonne Forest, and the Thiaccourt Sector. The Rev. Mr. Creamer has been appointed to St. John's, Huntington, to which parish he has been called by the vestry.

Bishop Darlington also ordained to the Priesthood the Rev. Louis Douglas Gotschall, Deacon, who was presented by the Rev. H. D. Viets, rector of St. John's Parish, Carlisle. The Rev. Mr. Gotschall becomes a Chaplain in the United States Navy.

The church was crowded during the ordination services, about thirty of the clergy being present from the Summer Conference for Church Workers, then in session.

The Rev. Herbert W. Hunter, rector of St. Peter's Church, Carson City, Nevada, has accepted a call to the rectorship of Trinity Parish, Renovo, in the Diocese of Harrisburg.

FLORIDA.

Rev. F. A. Juhan, Bishop-elect.

The Rev. F. A. Juhan Elected Bishop.

"Highly honored, see no reason why should not accept. Want meeting with committee," was the message received from the Rev. Frank A. Juhan, rector of Christ Church, Greenville, S. C., who was elected fourth Bishop of Diocese of Florida to succeed late Bishop Edwin Gardner Weed at the special convention of the diocese, held in St. John's Episcopal Church. The telegram was sent from Berlin, Ala., where the Rev. Mr. Juhan is at present on vacation. The members of the committee to wait on the Rev. Mr. Juhan are: the Rev. C. A. Ashby, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, and George W. Thames, Jr., layman.

The convention was opened by a celebration of the Holy Communion, after which the matter of electing a Bishop was taken up. The Rev. G. H. Harrison, of Pensacola, the Rev. H. W. Starr, Ph. D., of Charleston, S. C., the Rev. Henry D. Phillips, D. D., of Columbia, S. C., the Rev. W. B. Capers, D. D., of Jackson, Miss., and the Rev. Frank A. Juhan, were placed in nomination. Mr. Juhan being nominated by the Rev. C. A. Ashby, of this city. The voting was by orders, the clergy and laity voting separately.

On the first ballot, Harrison had 2 clergy and 17 lay votes; Starr 6 clergy and 4 lay, Phillips 2 clergy and 15 lay, Capers 1 clergy and 1 lay; Juhan 16 clergy and 14 lay.

On the fifth ballot, which elected Mr. Juhan, the vote was: Juhan 15 clergy and 26 lay; Harrison 4 clergy and 9 lay; Starr 2 clergy and 1 lay, Phillips 2 clergy and 15 lay.

The election was thereupon made unanimous and the president of the convention, Dr. Van Winder Shields, sent a wire to Mr. Juhan, notifying him of his election.

The newly elected Bishop is thirty-eight years of age. He was born in Macon, Ga., and moved to Texas when a small boy. He attended the public schools of San Antonio, Tex., and then went to the University of the South, at Sewanee, Tenn., taking the academic and theological courses. He was on the all-star football team while in college. After graduation he was for two and a half years headmaster of the West Texas Military Academy, at San Antonio. Then, after two years' missionary work on the Texas border, he came to the Sewanee, as chaplain of the Sewanee Military Academy, from which place he went to Greenville, S. C.

Mr. Juhan is an outstanding citizen of his city, a Rotarian, member of the Chamber of Commerce, chairman of the Associated Charities, member of the Y. M. C. A., and Red Cross. His standing as a minister and citizen was testified to by letters from many of leading men of Greenville, of all denominations.

He has been called to some of the largest churches in the South, but has preferred to remain in Greenville. Having made frequent visits to the State of Florida, Mr. Juhan is not a stranger to the state. He is married and has two children.

Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville, is one of the few churches that the average Sunday morning congregation is larger than the total number of communicants. Since the coming of Dr. Templeton to this parish two and one-half years ago, there have been five confirmation classes, the income has increased from $4,000 to more than $12,000, last year, and one of the most complete and commodious Parish Houses has been built. The plant as it now stands is one of the best equipped in the state.

Odell, who, with the rector, united with the Bishop in the imposition of hands.

The Entrance Into Life.

We may not court death. It is our bounden duty to guard our life unto the end. Suicide is not dying, but self-destruction. Dying should be an exhibition of courage. Suicide is cowardice. It is failure. It is lack of daring to continue the battle of life. It is desertion from the ranks. But through until the end, as long as there is hope and chance, nothing must be left untried to continue God's service on earth until He issues forth the call—when it comes, the smile of sacred joy is more in place than the heaving of a sigh. He who believes has always confessed that he does not belong here, but that his home is above. Dying must make this real. In dying the seal must be put upon all our life of faith. Dying is nothing to a child of God save the entrance into an eternal life. And this it cannot be, unless it is an act. We must not be overtaken, carried off and lifted up. We must hear the call, and answer in reply: "Behold here I am, Lord," and then bravely enter the valley of the shadow of death and go through it, knowing that the Lord awaits our coming, and that by His hand He leads us through the darkness to the light.—A. Kuyker.

Through Christ.

God cannot give us any spiritual blessing except in Christ. A Christian physician wrote to a friend: "Have you thought of the wonderful way in which God wraps us up in Christ? He makes us to wear Christ's name. He makes us acceptable in Christ. He gives us the Spirit of Christ. He grants that our feet may be shod with the preparation of the Gospel of Christ. He even gives us the mind of Christ, that we may think His thoughts. The song we sing is the song of the Lamb. It is through Christ that we enter into salvation, for He is the Door. And we are even to be conformed to His image. It is through Christ that we receive forgiveness of sins, and He has power on earth to do it; and it is the companionship and fellowship of Christ to which we are called. It is the power of Christ that lifts us up to make us efficient in service. It is the peace of Christ that keeps our hearts in the midst of strife. It is the light of Christ that dispels our darkness in times of perplexity. Surely we can say, 'Jesus is all the world to me'."—C. G. Trumbull.

The Rescue of Mollie Ellis.

The thrilling story that recently filled the press how Mrs. H. Starr rescued Miss Mollie Ellis from captivity on the northwest frontier of India has a great moral lesson.

For several years Mrs. Starr and her husband, a physician, had lived lives of devoted service to the tribesmen of the frontier. During that period the atmosphere of the border was one of hatred and fear. One day a native treacherously murdered the doctor. Mrs. Starr's reply was to train herself to continue her husband's work. She went to the tribe from which his murderer came and nursed the very man upon his deathbed, wringing his heart to penitence by her forgiveness.

At a later time when some tribesmen raided a British bungalow, slew Mrs. Ellis and carried off her daughter Mollie the British threatened an attack to rescue the girl. The result would probably have been the girl's death and the beginning of a fresh feud. Mrs. Starr, hearing the news, went fearlessly and unarmed to the tribe, which had not seen an Englishman since 1897, and was able to bring away the captive girl and restore her to her father.

So the love that knows no barriers and no fear once more proved itself not only unconquerable but all conquering.—Youth's Companion.

The Shepherd.

"O Shepherd with the bleeding feet,
Good Shepherd with the pleading Voice,
What seekest Thou from hill to hill?
Sweet were the valley pastures sweet
The sound of flocks that bleat their joys,
And eat and drink at will.
Is one worth seeking, when Thou hast of Thine
Ninety and nine?"

"How should I stay My bleeding Feet,
How should I hush My pleading Voice?
I Who chose death and climb a hill,
Accounting gall and wormwood sweet,
That hundredfold might know My joys
For love's sake and good will
I seek My one, for all there bide of Mine
Ninety and nine."

C. G. Rossetti.

A phrenologist, lecturing in a certain town, declared his ability to tell any man's nature from his head. A rough-faced, stern-looking man mounted the platform. After a thorough examination of the subject, the lecturer described him as harsh, cold, possessed of many disagreeable traits. The audience laughed derisively, for they knew their neighbor to be kind, genial and benevolent. They told the professor that he had miserably failed to judge character by his science. But the man himself was not amused; turning to the people, he said: "Friends, you have heard portrayed exactly my nature before Jesus Christ took possession of me. If there is any change the honor belongs to Him."—A. R. Kennedy.

Every man is an inlet through which clear or unclear energies pour into the life-pool of the human race. We cannot help it. My points of contact determine the character of my contributions, and if my supreme contact is with God in the communion of prayer, I become an open channel through which the blessed influences flow into human fellowship for its eternal good. And so the prayer-ground is the common ground of racial enrichment.—J. H. Jowett.

Dawn.

W. B. Lydenberg.

When sleeps the world at golden-tinted dawn

And twilight lingers slowly on the way,
Low-whispering breezes softly seem to say,

"Awaken, youth, slow-footed age has gone;

The doubts and fears that life has chanced upon

Have melted in the morning's misty gray,
And where stood burdens of a yesterday

Are lines of beauty in rich colors drawn."

How sweet must be that dawn of Heaven's morn,

When earth has vanished in its last cold night,

And death has healed the wound of sorrow's thorn

And rubbed away the marks of error's blight;

The prayer of faith, on angels' whispers borne,

Will lift the eyelids to a fairer light!

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

Jesus Washes the Disciples' Feet.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

For sheer shuddering horror the compulsory association of Our Lord with Judas, reclining on the same couch, surpasses anything in secular literature. Testimony of a thoroughly bad man, utterly familiar with Our Lord's life, seems necessary; or Judas must have his last chance, and, therefore, Our Lord endured the intimacy; but was the betrayal necessary and need intimacy proceed to such lengths as this? Taking into account the problem of finding a man in a great city a betrayal was necessary. The only other way was an arrest by sheer blind accident; and what men call accident is the Hand of God.

The problem of the origin of evil is involved in this, as in every other evil act. God the Logos so created the universe physical and spiritual that it is possible for men and angels to follow their own wills in it instead of God's will. The beings in it were in ranks and orders. One chose to follow his own will and led others away. God the Logos came down and put himself into the power of that being. The whole opportunity was created that the Father might glorify the Son by showing His willingness to die for the world, and that the Son might glorify the Father by showing that He was willing to give His Son for the world. It was an object lesson to the universe of where following one's own will instead of God's will leads; which is, to an attempt to murder God. The holy angels saw, in the case of Satan, what an angel can become who turns from God. Men see, in Judas, what a man can become. Just as on Satan, who was lost already, was the burden of the battle spiritual, because he was not further injured thereby; so on Judas, who was lost already, was burden of the betrayal physical. Perhaps Judas was not lost already. If so, he had chance of repentance. Our Lord offered him an "Act of Oblivion" in the speech concerning the twelve tribes and the twelve thrones.

The Ruler of a Passover feast began by taking a cup of mingled wine and water, reciting a benediction which begins, "Blessed art Thou, Jehovah Our God, Who created the fruit of the vine," and giving the cup to be shared among the company. Our Lord had departed from the Pharasaic washing of hands before every meal, two past controversies turning on that point. He said:

"With desire have I desired this Passover with you before I suffer. For I say unto you I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God." And he took the cup and gave thanks and said: "Take this and divide it among yourselves. For I say unto you I will not drink of the fruit of the vine until the Kingdom of God shall come."

There is a sharp clash of authorities as to whether the next event was during or after the Passover Supper. Certainly, the King James' version, read in parallel, seems to imply that the supper was finished. Just as certainly, the washing and the giving of a bit of bread dipped in sauce to the guest of honor were parts of the regular ceremonial. The explanation seems that the washing was transposed from its usual place near the beginning to just before the end. It was the custom for a host to see that his guests' feet were washed, usually by a slave. It was also the custom for the host to wash his own hands before giving the Passover cups; and this, of course, Our Lord did not do, having made a theological point of the omission. But the person who washes another's feet also washes his own hands.

Physically there were thirteen in the room, but the twelve were not the only ones who received a lesson in humility. Spiritually, the Great Ones of the universe were there; the greatest of the Evil Ones is especially mentioned as there. The pledge connected with the cup points forward to a kingdom earthly and heavenly; heavenly, for the risen Christ is king; earthly, for the inhabitants make and drink wine. In tremendous contrast to the glory of this kingdom was Our Lord's act. The garments laid aside were outer garments. The towel was the one provided at every Passover table for drying the hands of the ruler of the feast. The girding Himself with it was the adoption, on Our Lord's part, of the dress of a slave. If a modern host in evening dress took a napkin on his arm before beginning to wait at table, there could be no doubt that he assumed the character of a waiter.

After the brisk scene as to precedence when Our Lord reproved them both, Judas, in accordance with his nature, had taken chief place. Simon Peter, remembering Our Lord's injunction as to the lowest seat at feasts, had obeyed it, taking the humblest place of all. This put him on the end of the line, very near John Zebedee. With him Our Lord began. Simon said:

"Lord, would you wash my feet?"

"What I do you do not know, but shall understand hereafter."

"You shall never wash my feet."

"If I wash you not you have no part with Me."

"Lord, not my feet only but also my hands and head."

"He that is washed need only to wash his feet and is clean every bit; and ye are clean, but not all."

The allusion is to Judas, for He knew who should betray Him. Many mystical reasons are given for Peter's having no part in Our Lord if He refused the foot-washing. A practical one is that the refusal would have been direct disobedience of orders. "So, after he had washed their feet, he took His garments and sat down again."

The explicit purpose of the foot-washing was to teach humility, not to apostles alone, but to all intelligent beings who learn the facts. The room was full of angels. The reference to sender and sent was no idle word. "Apostellos" is no more one sent than is "Angellos." The princes of the Most High were gathered around their King. Invisible multitudes were intent on every act. Above all, he was present who through pride had fallen, and so made necessary the sacrifice of Salvation. Our Master and his was toiling to undo his evil-doing. Here was included in His plan a great act of humility.

No man can catch the meaning of Our Lord's passion who forgets the angels; just as no man can understand the Persian ministry, who has not seen an irrigated country, or the Judean who is unfamiliar with great crowds. The Book takes these things for granted, implies all and emphasizes none of them; but each is as certainly affirmed as the others. It was among the princes of the Most High that their Lord and ours girded himself and washed the disciples' feet. No painter has put that in a picture yet.

A Night in Miaoch'ien.

It was an exciting moment in Anking when a telegram from Miss Alice Gregg from Chinyang was decoded: "Bandits within a few li of Miaoch'ien. Pray for terrified people."

From her letter home, printed in the Anking News Letter, telling of the night in the little terror-stricken village with the bandits just outside, we quote the following as suggestive of the truly modern way to prepare for bandits:

"Just as I got to sleep some disturbance startled me and I woke up terrified. Ascertaining that it wasn't bandits, I dropped off again, only to have the same performance repeated. Then I understood. I was brave while my conscious mind was running things, but the instant my subconscious was in control I could be frightened. That had to stop for unusual noises would be going on all night. (I learned from Yao today that after telling me good-night he and Mr. Wang went out and watched the people fleeing with their bedding and valuables to the country until after ten o'clock.) So, my Conscience and my Subconscious had a good talk together. It ran something like this:

"Now, why are you so cowardly? Are you really so anxious for physical safety? If physical safety means so much to you, why don't you resign from the Mission as soon as you can reach An-king, and take passage home? You know you wouldn't do that for worlds. Well—if you won't do that, your dominant desire can't be for physical safety. And if it isn't for physical safety, then what is it for? And haven't you the promises 'Lo, I am with you always', and 'Fear not, I am with thee'? Don't you believe them? And don't you believe that other promise, 'No evil shall come nigh thy dwelling'?"

"But bandits are an evil, wailed poor old Subconscious.

"Yes, they are, if taken alone. But you don't have to take them alone.

"Ill that He blesses is our good,
And unblest good is ill.

Why, just think of the opportunity you'd have! There aren't fourteen hundred bandits, there are only fourteen. You'd soon know every one of them, and why they became bandits. And, after you had convinced them that you would not be ransomed, and why, you might succeed in getting them to stop being bandits! Now, wouldn't it be a thrilling occasion to show in An-king with fourteen ex-bandits? And all the excitement of getting them pardoned! And then, you'd have to find work for them. Awful thought! But you haven't got your fourteen bandits yet, so there's no sense in losing sleep planning for employment for them after they have reformed."

By this time, my poor old Subconscious was so exercised over those poor bandits that maternal feelings had entirely cast out any fear, and it was so amused at the picture, too, that we just chortled. Then I turned over and went to sleep as peacefully as though I were at home. My heart was as light as a feather.

Faith The Main Essential.

"Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" Assuredly they do not. They are too well acquainted with the universal law: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Yet there is a no more prevalent error than the current one on the lips of too many loose-thinkers: "It don't matter what a man believes, it is only the life that counts." This false thesis is opposed to every pedagogical law. You cannot rear a child a pagan, and expect him to live a Christian. You cannot preach rationalism, and look for a Christian outcome.

Professor Scott, of Union Seminary, has just published a scholarly volume on "The Ethical Teaching of Jesus," in which he maintains the thesis: "Whether we like it or not, the moral teaching of Jesus is rooted in his religion, and cannot be detached from it." Here he lays bare the inescapable principle that the seeds of Christian faith must be sown in our hearts if we would show the fruits thereof in our lives. This is precisely what Our Lord meant when He asked the decisive question: "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" Our deeds spring from our beliefs as inevitably as fruit from a tree, a river from its source, or a grape from its seed. The faith is the cause, the life the effect.

"As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," said Our Lord.

Herein lies the value of Christian nurture. No parent can escape the solemn responsibility of careful religious teaching of his child, or of sending him to a Christian institution. And herein lies also the duty of the Church to guard her pulpits against "false prophets" who misguide their hearers by preaching the illusive liberty to believe or disbelieve, only so that you live rightly. God sent His Son into the world to proclaim the gospel of a new life, and Paul says: "I live by the faith of the Son of God." Christians need the spiritual strength of this faith to enable them to walk uprightly in a world of temptation and evil. And the more fully and firmly they hold it, the more Christ-like their lives will be. An intelligent, a pure and strong Christian faith alone will enable us to lead a true Christian life. But "faith without works is dead," saith St. James.—J. B. R., in Christian Herald.

Old Hands.

Old hands are not for kisses
Nor the gifts of long ago;
But old hands in a garden
Can make the flowers grow.
We look at them in wonder
One day and, sighing, see Them changed and old and withered—
Surprised that this should be.
Such smooth, soft hands they once were,
Pink tipped, pink palmed, and now
So thin, so veined, and wrinkled,
But useful anyhow!
"Your hands are like two roses,"
Our husbands used to say,
Well, now one needn't work in gloves
In gardens anyway!
The flowers don't see the difference;
They only feel a touch
Of tender understanding
And blossom twice as much.
Old hands can hold a baby
And smooth a pillow too;
Old hands can write a letter
Signed "Grandma's love to you."
Old hands return the pressure
Of strong, big hands of sons,
Of grandsons and granddaughters—
The loving little ones.
So old hands do God's bidding
In gardens and highways,
And at evening in contentment
Old hands are clasped in praise.

THE PARABLES OF SAFED THE SAGE.

The Parable of Things Forgotten.

I walked one day along the street in the City where I reside, and there came along through the street a High Powered Car that looked as if it belonged to a Prosperous Man. And it ran up to the curb, and the man who drove it jumped out.

And he grasped my hand, and he said, I cannot pass by without stopping to thank thee for the Letter thou didst send me. For indeed it came at a time when a Word of Cheer was somewhat more than welcome. For the misfortune that had come to me was great, and it seemed to me that my friends were few; if indeed I had any.

And he held my hand and shook it warmly.

And I inquired, saying, Where dwellest thou?

And he said, I dwell in a city about Fifty Miles from here, and I am doing well. And today I have business in the Big Town, and I saw thee as I drove through. And now, behold, I surely remember the good thy letter did me.

And I said, Give me, I pray thee, thy Business Card, that I may remember thy present Address and Occupation.

And he felt in his Pocket, and said, I have none; but we shall not forget each other; and if thou shalt ever need a friend, call on me.

And now I would give the fourth part of a shekel to know who he was, and what it was I did for him.

And this hath happened unto me in like form once or twice before. I said a kind word and passed on and forgot it. So little did it cost me that I treasured no memory of it. But later I found that it had lodged in the breast of some one who needed it, and was cherished there.

And when I know things like these, and think how kind words cost little, and letters of sympathy or cheer cost but a loving thought and a postage stamp, I wonder that I do not do such things more often.

And I remember the bewilderment of those who inquire Lord, when saw we thee a stranger and took Thee in? Or naked and clothed Thee?

And I know that some folks are going to heaven for things they have forgot.

And it would appear that the thing I did that brought me this Great Gratitude cost me Two Cents.—Selected.

The Old Songs.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Many of the most popular of the old songs that are sung have about them that touch of real "human interest" for which the editors of today are constantly pleading. It is that touch, without a doubt, that will always make them live.

There is "Robin Adair," for instance, the words of which were written by Lady Caroline Keppel. It seems there was a real Robin Adair, a poor young Irish medical student, with whom Lady Caroline fell deeply in love at first sight, and married him in spite of all the objections of her titled family. It was during the time that the young lovers were being forcibly separated that the song was written.

"Annie Laurie," too, was a very real person. She was the daughter of Sir Robert Laurie, and her home was at Maxwellton House. If the ardent writer of the words, William Douglas, has faithfully depicted her charms, it is no wonder that she had two, or many more, lovers. She married a man named Ferguson. But Douglas remained faithful to his declaration:

"An' for bonnie Annie Laurie I'd lay me down an' dee," for tradition says that he died upon a battlefield in France with a lock of her hair in his hand, and that his last words were her name.

There is an interesting story told about "Comin' Through the Rye." It explains that the "Rye" is not a grain, as is popularly supposed, but a little river of that name in Scotland. It was so small that it was crossed by stepping-stones. And any one meeting a "lassie" on her way across was permitted to demand a toll of kisses.

Their eyes have been opened to that larger life which is always given us in Christ. And the beautiful thing about that life is this, that worries which were overwhelming yesterday, somehow have vanished so that we cannot see them in the love commended on the cross.—G. H. Morrison.

Little Helpers.

Little helpers, girls and boys,
How they add to mother's joys;—
Little girls who set the table,

The Things Moppet Did.

Moppet had got out of the wrong side of the bed that morning. At least that is what Aunt Lou said, and if Aunt Lou meant that Moppet, instead of being sunshiny and happy, was a cross and grumpy little girl, why, then, Aunt Lou was quite right—Moppet had got out of the wrong side of the bed.

You see Moppet was used to having her own way, and since Moppet had been with grandpa and grandma she had been having her own way more than ever, and now that little Mary Smith had come to see Grandpa, and sometimes wanted her way there was trouble.

Since Mary's shyness had worn off everybody understood her and loved her more every day. She was a little bundle of playfulness: she was as playful as kitty Plumey Toes. It didn't suit Mary to stay in the playhouse all day long and play with dollies. She wanted to hunt eggs, and play hide-and-go-seek and tag, and slide down the straw-stacks, and run races in the sunshine. And grandpa and grandma saw at once that this would be the very best thing in the world for little Moppet.

Of course the two little girls had long happy hours in the pretty playhouse, and cooked on the cunning cooking-stove, and had dolly teas, and made hollyhock ladies, and clover wreaths, but only for an hour or so at a time; then they waded in the brook and swung on the willow branches, and even climbed the lowest trees in the old orchard.

But this day nothing suited Moppet. First, she wanted kitty Plumey Toes for her child, until she saw how cunning Kitty Muff looked when Mary got him all dressed up in Dolly Nan's blue coat and white sunbonnet; then she wanted Kitty Muff herself.

She wanted to wade, then whimpered and whined because a stone hurt her toe; and she wouldn't swing because the branches scratched her hands; and when they played tag she said Mary pushed her.

It really was hard to believe that this pouting, sulking little girl was sunny little Moppet, and poor little Mary stood off and looked at her, and didn't know what to make of it.

"I won't play hide-and-go-seek and I won't run a race," pouted Moppet. "Let's play millinery store," pleaded Mary. And as this was a really truly new play, and as Mary's plays were always interesting, Moppet at last said she would.

So for a while they had a lovely time. They gathered lilac leaves for hats, and cut wee slits in them with a pin, and laced in clover blossoms in some, and larkspurs in others; and they crinkled up poppy petals on grass-stems and made gay little hats of red, and pink, and white, trimmed with plumes of feathery grasses. They made bonnets of hollyhocks, and caps of nasturtiums, and best of all, grandma gave them each a red cactus blossom that made the most beautiful hat turned upside down.

Then Moppet and Mary laid all their pretty hats and bonnets out on the mossy rock, and brought all the twenty-two dollies to buy. It was such a pretty sight that grandpa, and grandma, and Aunt Lou, and even Ben, came to see.

But suddenly Moppet remembered which side of the bed she had got out of, and she wouldn't let Mary have the pink poppy hat, nor the one with the ribbon-grass bows, and she tore up the lovely yellow hollyhock bonnet with the pansies on it, and she said she wouldn't play millinery store another minute, because it was so stupid!

Poor Mary tried and tried to think of something new to play, and at last Moppet consented to hunt eggs. So Mary ran for the basket, and then they hippety-hopped out to the barn, and the sheds, and the big, big, straw-stacks. It was here, at the biggest golden stack, that the dreadful thing happened I am almost afraid to tell you about.

You see Moppet was on the top of the stack with three big white eggs she had just found in her clean little white apron—Biddy Brown and Biddy Speckle and Biddy Crumple-Comb all had their nests on the east side of the stack, very near the top—when her foot slipped, and she went slip-slip-sliding down to the bottom. She wasn't hurt a single bit, but those eggs, those three big eggs, were in a mussy mess of yolk and white and shell, in Moppet's clean white apron!

When Mary Smith saw Moppet sitting at the bottom of the stack, not a single bit hurt, but so round-eyed with surprise, and with all that mussy mess in her apron, she just fell over on the stack and laughed and laughed until the tears came.

"Oh, Moppet," she giggled, "if it was only a teeny bit hotter, you could sit right there and cook your omelet in the sun!"

And what do you think Moppet did then—naughty Moppet, who, as Aunt Lou said, had got out of the wrong side of the bed? Why, she lifted up her pretty dimpled hand and struck poor little Mary Smith just as hard as ever she could!

"Why, Moppet Mead!" cried indignant grandma who was just coming to find them.

Moppet cried and cried up in her little white room—cried until the handkerchief that grandma had tied about that naughty hand, so that Moppet might not forget, was wet and soppy—cried until all the crossness was washed away, just as when it rains until the clouds are empty and the sun peeps out.

Then Moppet went solemnly over to her little white bed, and just as solemnly crept straight across it.

"Grandma, Grandma dear," she called in a shaky voice—and you may be sure grandma was near enough to that closed door to hear the little voice—

"I've got out on the other side of my bed now, and I'm so—so—sorry I was so naughty and slapped Mary. Please may I come out now and tell her so?"

And that was the very next thing Moppet did.—Christian Observer.

The Stork That Lived On the House-Top.

Hulda was a little Dutch girl who lived in Holland in one of the queer peaked houses along the canals. She wore a white cap over her flaxen hair and wooden shoes on her small feet. She loved her home and her parents were kind to her, but the thing she wanted most they could not give to her.

In Holland it is considered good luck to have a stork build its nest on your roof. Hulda's grandmother had a nest on her house. It had been there for many years and was several feet high. The old lady was very proud of it and would not let any one disturb it, even when the birds had left it for the winter.

Grandmother had often told the little girl how a stork built the nest on the roof her house the day Hulda's mother was born. How year after year it had been occupied by some member of the same family. And that each year the birds had made an addition to the family home until it was the largest nest in Holland.

Hulda had been up on the roof through the trap door to see the wonderful bundle of sticks, reeds and grass. She had peeped inside where she saw a hollow place in which were four white eggs tinged with buff. Mother Stork was standing on one leg inside it; but she was very tame and didn't mind the little girl looking at her cradle.

One day when Hulda was looking very unhappy because there was no stork nest on their roof, the father smiled and said, "I saw two storks house hunting as I came in. I think I'll put up a house to let to the young couple."

"Father, how can you?" Hulda asked.

"I am going to nail a cart wheel to the roof. It will make a fine place to build on. They like a good foundation."

After the wheel had been fastened to the roof, Hulda saw two beautiful white birds with red legs, feet and bills flying over the house. One looked down the chimney, then made a queer snapping sound with its beak, which brought its mate. The chimney didn't suit them, for they soon flew upward. Then all of a sudden the birds dropped down on the wheel, examined it carefully, and decided that it was a nice place to begin housekeeping. Hulda was delighted when she saw them fly away and return with a load of twigs and reeds which they placed on the wheel. She ran around the house crying, "Father! father! the storks are moving in. I am so happy!"

"Where are your shoes?" Father asked.

Hulda looked down at her feet. She had lost both her wooden shoes as she ran to tell her father the good news.

"I wish I had red shoes and stockings like the storks," the little girl said. "My shoes are always dropping off my feet."

Hulda was very proud of her family of storks. Sometimes she would climb the ladder to the trap door and watch them at work or eating their lunch. She thought they looked very funny when they took a nap standing on one leg with their long neck doubled back so that their head rested on the shoulder.

When the babies came they were awkward little things, all legs and neck. They remained in the cradle until they changed their downy coat for one of feathers, and were strong enough to fly downward. They are taught to look for fish and frogs and eels before they take long flights upward.

One day Hulda went with her mother to the market to buy fish, and there she saw her storks walking along the street. Mother bought some small fish and Hulda fed them to her "family," as she called the birds. They were not at all afraid and followed the little girl up the street until they came to her house, when they flew up to the roof.

"Our storks know me," she said to her father as he stood watching them follow his little daughter. "They are the finest ones around here. They have such beautiful brown eyes with a black skin around them, and they are so good-natured. I never heard them quarreling."

"They can't quarrel with their tongues," father said with a twinkle in his eye. "Mother Stork can't scold father Stork when he goes to sleep instead of watching the children."

"Why not, father?"

"I thought all Dutch children knew that storks are dumb. They can't sing or make any sound except by snapping the long, horny bill together," he explained.

"Where do the storks go in winter?" Hulda asked.

"They live in Africa in winter, returning to Europe in the spring. They come and go in great flocks, choosing the night to travel. They are good parents, sacrificing their life for the young ones if necessary."

"I am going to watch them closely," the little girl said. "Perhaps I can learn some things about them that is not yet known."

"Did you know that they can be trained to do many tricks that a dog can do?"

Hulda opened her eyes wide.

"I have seen them jump through hoops, walk a tight rope, climb up a ladder, and pretend to be dead."

"May I have a baby to train?" she begged.

"No. Let them live their life," he answered and Hulda thought her father was right.—The Presbyterian.

Carrots and Chocolate Creams.

Miss Rose White and her mother had been invited to supper, and Jimmy and Miss Rose sat in the window seat talking while his mother was busy in the kitchen.

"Aren't you hungry?" Jimmy asked, "and don't things smell good?"

Miss Rose laughed, "I am hungry, Jimmy, and things certainly do smell good."

Jimmy sniffed. "That's chicken we smell; chicken and gravy and biscuit," he said.

Miss Rose laughed again. "I suppose you like chicken and gravy and biscuit better than anything else there is to eat," she said.

"Well," answered Jimmy, "I don't know. I like everything pretty well, though of course rice pudding isn't a very good dessert. Yes," he continued after a thoughtful minute, "I like everything but carrots."

"Carrots!" exclaimed Miss Rose.

"Why, I don't like them either."

"Oh," laughed Jimmy, "we're alike. And do you like chocolate creams better than anything else? I do."

"Well," said Miss Rose, "chocolate creams are very good."

"I've never had a whole box of them," said Jimmy. "Mother says that little boys don't have whole boxes to themselves."

Just then mother called them in to supper, and for some time Jimmy was too busy to pay much attention to what what the rest were saying. It was when he heard his own name that he listened. Miss Rose was saying, "You could give Jimmy his luncheon tomorrow, couldn't you, mother?"

Jimmy looked up from his plate. Mrs. White was deaf, and Miss Rose had to repeat what she had said. "Mrs. Smith feels that she can't go to the city with me tomorrow because Jimmy comes home to his luncheon."

"Why," said Mrs. White, smiling when she understood, "I should like to have Jimmy take luncheon with me tomorrow. I don't know much about little boys, but I'm sure I could give him something to eat."

"Oh," laughed Miss Rose, "Jimmy is easily pleased. He is like me and enjoys eating everything but carrots."

"Carrots," did you say?" asked Mrs. White. "I'll remember that. So you'll come, won't you, Jimmy?"

Jimmy smiled shyly and nodded.

The next morning when Jimmy was ready for school and mother was almost ready for her trip to the city with Miss Rose, Jimmy said, "What shall I do, mother, when I go to Mrs. White's this noon?"

"Why," said Mother, pulling on her gloves, "just ring the bell; ring it loud so that Mrs. White will hear, and then answer politely when she speaks to you. Speak loud for it would be much kinder to make her hear you the first time, but of course you mustn't shout. Then eat your luncheon just as you do at home."

Speak politely and loud, and eat his luncheon. That sounded easy enough, thought Jimmy on his way to school. But at noon when he walked slowly along the village street to Mrs. White's, he wondered just how hard he must press the button to ring the bell very loud.

At last he came to Mrs. White's. There was no need to ring the bell, for she was at the door looking for him.

"Here you are, Jimmy," she said, smiling.

Jimmy took off his cap and said, "Yes, ma'am." It must have been just loud enough, for she said, "How well I hear you! I believe my hearing is improving! Luncheon is ready," she added, and led the way to the dining room. "I've cooked something of which I am very fond, and my daughter said yesterday that you like carrots too. I never cook them when she is at home, for she doesn't like them, but now we shall have a feast, shan't we?"

Jimmy tried to swallow the lump in his throat. What could he do? Tell her he didn't like them? Why there wasn't anything on the table except bread and butter and a big dish of carrots!

"I walked out to Mr. Brown's farm for them this morning, so I know that they are fresh and tender," Mrs. White was saying as she helped Jimmy to a big dish of carrots.

Jimmy looked from the carrots to Mrs. White's smiling face. He gave a big sigh. "I shall have to eat them," he said to himself. "I'll just eat them as fast as I can, and then drink my milk to take the taste away."

So he ate the carrots, fairly gobbled them in fact, and when he had finished took a long drink of milk.

Mrs. White laughed. "You do like them, Jimmy," she said. "I am so glad, and now let me give you some more."

More! Jimmy finished his milk and then said, "Thank you, but I'm not very hungry this noon." That was true; he wasn't hungry any more.

"But there is dessert," said Mrs. White, going to the kitchen.

Jimmy's eyes brightened, and then he had to wink two or three times, for Mrs. White brought rice pudding.

"Just before leaving this morning my daughter said something about carrots and rice pudding," said Mrs. White pleasantly. "I am so glad, for I should never have thought of them."

Jimmy took one spoonful of pudding, and then another and another, until it was all gone. Then he thanked Mrs. White, took his cap and ran to school.

He was a hungry and quiet little boy at supper, but mother had so many things to tell about her visit to the city that she did not notice it.

After supper Miss Rose came.

"Jimmy Smith," she said, "you are a little brick. My mother enjoyed your visit and wants you to come again. However," she added, "I shall be there too, and I shall do the cooking. She said that she could hear distinctly every word you said, and I'm going to speak so that she can understand what I say too. And now Jimmy boy, I've brought something that I hope will even things up."

Jimmy unwrapped the parcel she gave him and found a big box of chocolate creams—a whole box, all for him! —Youth's Companion.

The Moonflower.

Alice B. Joynes.

When the sun has gone to rest—
And the flowers have closed their eyes;
When birdie's asleep in his nest
And it's time for the moon to rise,

Then the buds of the beautiful moonflower

Begin to tremble with joy,
As approaches the twilight hour
Free from all glares that annoy.

Each little green bud is a quiver
To welcome the pale moonlight.
A tremble—a sigh—a shiver,
Then a wonderful blossom white!

O Moonflower, radiant and fair,
White as the driven snow,
O blossom of beauty rare,
No wonder we love you so!

You come at the evening hour,
When a calm o'er the spirit steals.
Then, O wondrous, pale Moonflower,
What love your beauty reveals.

You tell of the Father in Heaven,
Who has sent this gift of His love,
At the calm, sweet hour of even,
To lift our thoughts above.

An Eastern Legend.

A little banyan seed once said to a lofty palm tree: "I am so tired of being tossed hither and thither by the wind. Let me shelter awhile among your great leaves."

"O, yes," said the palm tree; "come and welcome. Stay as long as you wish."

So the banyan seed nestled down among the leaves of the palm tree, which very soon quite forgot the presence of the little stranger.

But the tiny seed was not idle. It sent out little roots and fibers, which crept round the mighty trunk and under the bark of the palm tree itself until at last the tree in alarm cried out, "What is this?"

The banyan replied, "It is only the little seed you allowed to rest among your leaves."

"But now you must leave me," said the palm tree. "You are growing too large and strong. You sap my strength."

"I cannot leave you now," replied the banyan, "for we have grown together. I should kill you if I tore myself away."

The palm tree rustled its great leaves and tried with might and main to throw off the banyan, but it could not, and gradually the palm leaves withered, and the great trunk shriveled until at last only the banyan tree could be found.

So it is with little sins that come creeping in. They at last smother all the good in the heart and destroy its true growth.—Exchange.

Waiting For Rosie.

"I want to go to the picnic, too," said five-year-old Rosie.

"Oh, no," said Clara, quickly. "We don't want to bother with you."

"It's too far away, anyway," added Ralph.

"Mother said it wouldn't be too far if I walked slowly," coaxed Rosie.

"Why, it's a mile and a half to the Glen," said Ralph.

"She runs twice that far playing around home here every day," spoke up Arnold. "Let's take her."

Ralph and Clara agreed at last, though rather unwillingly, and before long the children were started. Their way led along the road for about a mile, then it turned into a woodpath. Following this for a half mile would bring them to the Glen.

The Glen was a fascinating place. There was a brook to wade in, acorns and pine cones to collect and a dozen kinds of flowers and ferns growing here and there among the rocks. Best of all, the children had learned that, by keeping very still for awhile, they might catch a glimpse of gray squirrels at play in the treetops or a partridge scurrying busily among the dry leaves.

As they walked along the dusty road, Clara and Ralph became impatient at the slow pace that was necessary to suit Rosie's plump little legs. To make matters worse, they had gone but a short way when the child stopped. "Something in my shoe," she said, holding up one foot.

Arnold unlaced the shoe, shook out a tiny stone, and laced it up again, while Ralph and Clara stood by, urging him to hurry.

A little farther on Rosie stopped again.

"What's the matter now?" asked Clara, sharply.

"I've lost my hair ribbon," said Rosie. "Please wait while I run back and look for it."

"It's nothing but wait, wait, wait, all the time for you," exclaimed Clara. "I wish we'd left you home. Never mind your ribbon. Come on."

"Oh, it's my new pink one. I want it," cried Rosie, tears filling her eyes at her sister's words.

"I'll run back and get it," broke in Arnold. "You all walk on slowly. I'll soon overtake you."

Just around the last corner he found the big pink bow. Picking it up, and brushing off the dust, he hurried after the others.

As he rounded the corner again, he saw Rosie sitting in a little heap by the roadside, while the other two children were nearly out of sight around the next turn in the road. Rosie was crying.

"Oh, Arnold," she sobbed, as her brother came up, "they wouldn't wait for you, and they said I was a horrid little bother."

"Now, stop crying, Rosie-posie," said Arnold, patting his little sister's curly head. "Don't you mind what Clara and Ralph said. They'll feel better natured by and by. I don't see why they're in such a hurry, anyway. I don't believe the Glen is going to run away. I guess we'll find it waiting for us, no matter when we get there."

Rosie smiled a little through her tears at this. Arnold tied the ribbon in place clumsily. "All ready?" he asked. And they started on.

Five minutes later they heard a car coming behind them. They stepped to the side of the road to let it pass, but instead it stopped. The children looked around.

"Oh, Uncle Ben!" cried Rosie.

"Where you folks bound for?" asked the big, smiling man behind the steering wheel.

"We're going to have a picnic at the Glen," replied Arnold. "Clara and Ralph have gone on ahead."

"I'm going to the village," said Uncle Ben. "Get in and have a ride. I'll go home round the other way, and let you out at the crossroads, 'bout two minutes' walk from the Glen. You'll get there most as quick, and Rosie can save her legs for the trip home. What do you say?"

"We say, 'yes, yes, yes!'" cried Rosie. The children loved to ride, but seldom had a chance. They climbed in joyfully.

In fifteen minutes they were at the village. Uncle Ben led Rosie and Arnold into the drugstore. "We want two big dishes of ice cream," he announced to the man behind the counter. Then he turned to the children. "I reckon that will keep you busy till I get my errands done," he said.

They had just finished the last delicious spoonfuls when Uncle Ben put his head in at the door. "All aboard," he called.

It was about twenty minutes later that Rosie and Arnold reached the Glen. Ralph and Clara were wading in the brook. "So you finally got here, did you?" asked Clara.

"But why are you coming from that direction?" asked Ralph.

Rosie giggled.

"Uncle Ben came along in his car a little while after you left us," Arnold explained. "He gave us a ride to the village and around by the crossroads just the other side of the Glen."

"And we had ice cream, too," added Rosie, triumphantly.

"A ride in Uncle Ben's new car!" exclaimed Ralph.

"And ice cream!" cried Clara.

"Arnold had choc'late and I had strawberry. Big dishes, too," put in Rosie.

"Oh, dear," said Clara and Ralph, together, with a sigh, "I wish we'd waited for Rosie."—Junior Herald.

The Bluebird's Wings.

"Rainy day Sat'day!" sighed Bobby Nash, as he looked sadly out of the window of the nursery.

Nannie, his little sister, added her wail to his.

"You and Bob can have lots of fun up here," mother put in cheerfully. "You can cut out paper dolls, and Bob can draw animals and fix up a farmyard with them."

An hour passed, and Nannie, girl-like, was more interested in Bob's animals than she was in her paper ladies. She wanted some animals, too.

"Cut me out a birdie, Bobbie—just one little bird out of this blue paper," Bob was building a block fort by this time, and he didn't want to stop a minute. He cut out a rough oblong, with some resemblance to a bird's head and tail—but no suggestion of wings.

Nannie took it, looked dejectedly from the blunt bit of paper to the occasional flashing shadow darting past the window in the rain, and laid the "bluebird" sadly down.

Bobbie heard the doorbell and dashed out. "Come up, if it's Jack Miller with the butter!" he shouted. "I want to show you my fort, Jack."

Jack handed Mrs. Nash the butter his mother made every week, and ran up to the nursery. While he was admiring Bob's fort, he saw the forlorn little sister gazing helplessly at her bird.

Jack caught up scissors and paper, and in a minute he had cut out a pair of little wings, and with a stray pin he had bent and pinned on the wings so that they stood out from the awkward body—and lo! the bluebird was ready to fly! Delighted, Nannie tossed it in the air, watching it flutter down, and, hearing her merry laugh, Mrs. Nash followed the sound to the nursery, Jack's bucket in her hand.

"What's made you all so jolly, chicks?" she asked, and then, as three voices gave her three different answers, she caught the truth.

"It's Jack's kindness to a lonely little girl, then, that gave the bluebird wings," she smiled; "kindness is like that—it lifts you out of any kind of a dark day."—Sunshine.

Treat Your Toys Right.

"Oh, dear, I wish I had nice things like you," sighed Amy as she looked at Grace's doll trunk and all the pretty books and games on the shelf.

"You do have nice things," said Grace. "Last Christmas you had more presents than I had. Then, think of all you got at your birthday. Your aunts and uncles give you lots of things, too!"

"All the same, I haven't a book that looks as good as yours or a game or puzzle without something lost. Every one of my dollies has a broken arm or leg or the hair gone."

Can you guess why Grace's things last so much better than Amy's? You do not need to see those girls to know that Amy leaves her toys and books and dolls and games wherever she happens to be. Then, rain or dogs or some of the children often spoil the things. It is really Amy's own fault those things happen, because she has not been careful. She is both lazy and careless.

It is not the child that is given many toys who has the best things. It is the one who takes care of what he or she has. You can play with the same toy or dolly a great many times and have it to give away or keep after you are grown up. Or you can let everything you have be spoiled soon.

There is nothing smart in breaking your things or leaving them where they get spoiled. Take pride in seeing how well you can make your things last and yet have fun and give others a chance to enjoy playing with them. Use your playthings, but use them right.

Well-cared-for playthings will give you many good times, and they help you to learn how to care for other things you will have to use in work and play. —Child's Gem.

Obituaries

Lewis: MRS. J. STUART LEWIS, of Tallahassee, Fla., entered into eternal life July 18, 1924. Funeral service and interment at St. John's Church and Cemetery, Tallahassee, Fla.

May she rest in peace and light perpetual shine upon her.

Fuller. After an illness of several weeks, MISS MAY LUCY FULLER died in City Hospital, Parkersburg, W. Va., July 26, 1924. She was born July 1, 1841. The funeral services were held Monday, July 28, at Memorial Church of the Good Shepherd, Parkersburg. Interment at Odd Fellows' Cemetery.

WILLIAM POWELL TRIPLETT.

Entered into the rest of Paradise on Sunday, night, July 13, 1924, at the Concord Apartments, Washington, D. C. WILLIAM POWELL TRIPLETT, formerly of "Round Hill," the old family home in Fairfax County, Va. He is survived by a brother, George Triplett, of Fairfax County, and a sister, Miss Sally Triplett, between whom and himself there was a devoted and beautiful life-long attachment.

The funeral service was held at Christ Church, Alexandria, Va., the officiating ministers being the Rev. William J. Morton, D. D., the rector of the church, and the Rev. Samuel A. Wallis, D. D., his old rector.

Mr. Triplett was a descendant of William Triplett (as the name was then spelled), of "Round Hill," who was a vestryman of Truro Parish in the time of George Washington and George Mason, succeeding George William Fairfax, of "Belvoir," in that office.

It is interesting to note in the careful record of all the preparations made for the funeral of General Washington by his secretary, (Tobias) Lear, among those specially notified of the time fixed for the funeral, at Mrs. Washington's desire, were Mr. William Triplett and family, of "Round Hill." Round Hill has been held by the descendants of William Triplett until the present generation, being disposed of within the last few years. The Triplett family pew is still seen in the restored Epiphany Church immediately east of the south door.

The late William Triplett was an earnest and devout communicant of the Episcopal Church throughout his life, and although traveling about for a number of years, he never failed to attend church wherever it was possible for him to stop off for Sunday.

So he lived and at last passed away, "in the communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope, in favor with his God and in perfect charity with the world."

RESOLUTIONS.

Morris Earle.

At a special meeting of the vestry of the Church of the Holy Trinity held July 28, 1924, to take action on the death of the rector's warden, MR. MORRIS EARLE, the following minute was unanimously adopted:

In the death of Mr. Earle the vestry recognize that they have suffered a loss that cannot soon be replaced.

He entered the vestry in 1906 and was appointed rector's warden in 1910, so that these many years of experience made him a counselor, whose advice was greatly relied upon in all vestry matters, especially on account of his knowledge of music.

He was a strong connecting link between this church and the Church at large, being on the Executive Council of the Diocese and a delegate to the General Convention of the Church; he also labored for many years in helping to compile and introduce the recently adopted hymnal.

He was one of the most active members of the Board of the Philadelphia Divinity School, especially in helping to raise funds for their new building.

Mr. Earle recently retired from active business in order to devote his whole time to his religious and philanthropic activities, into which he threw all his physical and mental powers; his characteristic was earnest vigor, living a life at high pressure in working continually for the good of his fellowmen. His works will follow him.

Sunday Observance.

One of the most vital questions confronting Christian civilization at the present time, is the decay of the religious observance of the Lord's Day and the lack of any standard among religious people as to how it should be observed. The outward observance of public worship may be but a part of the expression of the faith and ideals of the community but it is a very important part. It is not too much to say that a love for God which does not express itself in public worship soon grows cold and unreal and that a faith which lacks public expression also lacks vitality.

Both the teaching of history and the reasoning of common sense combines to show that the future of Christian living and idealism is bound up with the ability of the Church to create and maintain the practice of public worship. Nothing can be substituted for it. It both expresses faith and creates faith.

While it is manifestly not the province of the state to require any one to worship and it would be an impertinence for the secular authority to interfere with the rights of the individual which are negative as well as positive, the state does recognize in the Constitution the value of religion, and does so specifically when on Thanksgiving Day it urges the people of the land to give thanks to God. Also if it is proper for the state to set aside days in honor of great men and to protect such days from the encroachment of commercial enterprise, it is manifestly not improper for legislation to be made for the purpose of protecting as a day of rest and refreshment one day in seven. While theoretically the particular day of the week to be used as a public rest day is a matter of complete indifference, the one day used by Christian lands for this purpose has been and is the First Day of the Week in honor of the Resurrection.

The cry always raised against Sunday legislation is usually based upon misconception as to what is really involved. No sane person desires the enactment of so-called "Blue Laws," and no person of the present generation has lived under any such laws. No one desires to force persons to worship or to legislate so as to touch the individual's liberty in any way religiously. So far as the state is concerned its business is primarily with Sunday as a Rest Day for all people. How they will observe this rest day is a matter of individual choice.

The psychology of a rest day, however, demands that the entire community shall use the same day for rest and recreation. The proviso in almost every bill before Congress in regard to Sunday observance to the effect that if the worker observe some other day as a matter of religious belief, he should be allowed to substitute that day for the first day of the week and to conduct his business on Sunday, is altogether beside the mark. It is the province of the state to safeguard one day in seven as a rest day for all people and it is necessary in order to create the atmosphere of rest and refreshment, that that day should be kept free from the encroachment of gainful occupation even though it may work individual hardship.—The Church Militant.

THE CHURCH AND EDUCATION.

progress is at hand.

There are blind leaders in many religious groups today who would have us turn our backs upon truth and fact. They seek to read reality out of the universe. They would identify religion with ignorance, superstition, and fear. They refuse to learn anything new or to unlearn ancient errors. They would tell the scholar what he should teach, though they themselves know nothing as it should be known. And all this is put forward in the name of real religion! If such counsels should prevail, the Church is ruined. She will lose the confidence and support of thinking people and will speedily become an institution for the feeble-minded. It is the function of our Church Schools to save her from such a fate and to enable her so to adjust herself to the facts of history and experience that she will challenge the admiration and win the devotion of the strongest and best. Science is today nearer God than ever before in its history. The astronomer and astrophysicist with the telescope and photographic lens have revealed to us a boundless universe wherein law and order of the same sort as that we find in the nature of this earth are regnant. Yet that universe is complicated and involved in the highest degree. Its mechanism spells intelligence. The physicist and chemist have traced the electron to its lair. They tell us that the most apparently solid forms of matter are in a state of perpetual internal motion. They say that we must now conceive of matter in terms of energy, and some of them are daring to prophesy that ere long we shall be thinking of matter in terms of mind. But whatever science may yet have to say to us, we shall owe to it a great debt for its discovery and description of facts as they are. No sane man wants to live in a world of illusion. He must have the facts in order to know how to adjust himself to stern reality. Only when in possession of all known facts can religion do its work successfully.

The situation as it is puts a heavy responsibility upon the leadership of the Church today. The minister as he contemplates the task thus outlined might well be appalled and cry out, "Who is sufficient for these things?" None but an intelligent and thoroughly trained ministry can meet the requirements of the Church of our age. But that training need not and cannot be so broad and thorough as to render every minister an expert in all the fields of knowledge involved. The minister need be an expert in but one thing, and that is religion itself. Here he must have first-hand experience and adequate knowledge. But he can leave mastery in the various sciences, languages, histories, literatures, and philosophies to the membership of the Church at large. It is enough that he be sufficiently well informed in or regarding these various interests to keep alive in the ranks of the Church a proper sense of the importance of these things and a proper attitude toward them. He must be enough of a scholar himself to make scholars feel at home in the Church of which he is a minister; and not the smallest of his responsibilities is that of seeking out and inspiring young men and women to undertake the task of preparing themselves thoroughly for the work of scholarship in the various fields of learning.

To attain adequate preparation for the great work of the ministry we have come together in this institution. We expect to unlearn much, but to learn more. We shall not shrink from new discoveries. We shall not fear any new facts that may appear in our field of vision. We shall rather welcome them as reflecting new light upon our great task as interpreters of the will of God to our fellow-men. We go forward not in trepidation at every step, but with a holy confidence and a glowing enthusiasm, assured that God goes on before us and that

No harm from Him can come to us
On ocean or on shore.

We who are treading this way with you confidently invite you to join us in the great quest, and urge you to give yourselves to it with unhesitating faith, assured that those who seek shall find.

How the True Southern White Man
Regards the True Black Man.

In the light of recent efforts to misrepresent the attitude of the better class of Southern whites to the better class of Southern blacks we commend to our readers everywhere a tribute paid by James W. Austin, an Atlanta attorney, to Sam Bell, a negro—Uncle Sam, as he was known—who had just died. Mr. Austin wrote:

"A letter came to me today. 'It is from the white-haired mistress of the old plantation home of my boyhood, my mother. 'Dear son,' she writes, 'Uncle Sam is dead—Sam Bell is dead and I want you to write a tribute to him.'"

"I sit in my office chair with the letter in my hand and look out absently from the twelfth floor of a skyscraper on the great city stretching out before me. I hear the roar of the traffic in the crowded streets below, but these sights and sounds pass by unheeded. Memory is throwing on the screen of my fancy a picture of the long ago. I am a little freckle-faced boy of seven, back again on the old plantation, sitting on the kitchen steps under the shade of the spreading mulberry in the back yard, counting with nervous and eager fingers a nest of partridge eggs, and glancing up gratefully at 'Uncle Sam' standing over me, grinning with delight at my joy over the present he has salvaged for me from the wheatfield. There are an even dozen of the little eggs. Ranger, my dog, is standing by, eyeing my booty wistfully as I count my treasures.

"Yes, there before me at the old South Carolina home is 'Uncle Sam,' sturdy in build and frame as a rock, with a heart as kind, as gentle and as steadfast as ever beat under any man's shirt, whether that man be white or black.

"And for more than fifty long years he was as familiar a figure around the 'big house' on the farm as the great white oak in the front yard, and as dependable and standing as straight-up for right, for truth, and in honesty as immovable.

"South Carolina can boast of one ante-bellum crop which never failed—gentlemen—gentlemen to the manner born.' And a great host of them were white and some were black; and black though his skin, Sam Bell was 'a South Carolina gentleman,' instinctively refined, spontaneously courteous and polite, in speech truthful, in conduct without guile, in simplicity and humility a little child.

"Can I write a tribute to Sam Bell? Can I write a tribute to this faithful old servant and friend of my father and mother, of their sons? Yes; for I who knew this princely old negro—knew him as he was—can say of him that I have known few men of nobler character, a character of granite texture. I have known few men of finer loyalty.

"And his faith in the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Great Redeemer, never waned or wavered during more than a half century of Christian life and experience. Sam Bell's body goes back to mother earth, but his soul goes marching on, as I verily believe, with the great company of the redeemed."—Manufacturers' Record.

Co-Workers.

It is easy to substitute labors for Christ for labors in Christ. This accounts for that sorry spectacle of begging for the Lord's work which results in making Christ a way-side beggar, asking an alms from a self-sufficient world to keep His program going. Nothing can dishonor Him more. He had no plans apart from the development of His people. Certainly He is as anxious about the individual who becomes a channel for His power as He is about the individual to be helped by that power. When we, as co-workers with Christ, learn to appreciate fully that fellowship in Christ, which the work allows, we become increasingly less anxious about results and more enraptured with the fellowship. It was only in self-defense that Paul related His accomplishments through Christ, but it was a matter of daily joyous testimony for him to say, "For me to live is Christ." The measure of his accomplishments was the measure of his reply to the plea of the Master, "Believe also in Me." Likewise it is the measure for the whole world.—Sunday School Times.

For the Southern Churchman

Struggle.

Harold V. Smedberg.

Life is always upward struggle
From the mire of cherished sin,
Through our ignorance and trouble,
Toward the Lord we glory in.
Christ we follow. He will guide us;
He alone can lead us clear
Of the loathsome beasts beside us,
Halting us in deadly fear.

All our petted faults and failings
Strive so hard to keep us back;
Grasping, holding, jeering, wailing,
All along the painful track.
Foes may hurt us, friends may fail us;
Yet though faint, we press the fight:
For we hear the Master hail us:
"Onward, Christians, toward the Light!"

Stumbling often, famished, weary,
By Our Christ, we will endure,
Till shall pass the darkness dreary
And shall come Heaven's daylight pure.
Wounded sore, but still upgoing,
Till the goal of life is won,
And 'mid golden trumpets blowing,
Christ Our Saviour says, "Well done."

Seven Eighths

of the world's present production is due, not to our labor, but to the thrift of preceding generations, so some one has estimated.

Too often the accumulations of thrift and industry do not benefit those for whom the owner worked and saved, because estates are wasted by litigation, mismanaged by careless executors or lost by inexperienced heirs.

You avoid these dangers when your will names the "Safe Executor," for you place your property in responsible and experienced hands. For thirty-two years prudent men in every section of the State have been naming this Company Executor, Guardian and Trustee.

JOY is a duty,"---so with golden lore
The Hebrew rabbis taught in days of yore,

And happy human hearts heard in their speech
Almost the highest wisdom man can reach.

But one bright peak still rises far above,
And there the Master stands whose name is Love,

Saying to those whom heavy tasks employ,
"Life is divine when duty is a joy."

Big Money For Your Church Work

Many Christian Endeavor, Missionary and other church societies have added $100.00 or more to their treasury by selling Christmas Cards. Nearly every family uses from 50 to 200 Christmas Greeting Cards, seals, enclosure cards, tags, etc. They would rather buy from the members of your society than in the rush of a store.

Mrs. Black's Christmas Cards are of the finest sentiments, art engraving and stock of cards, paper, etc., and the prices are very reasonable. You invest no money. Simply show the book of samples and take orders. These cards sell themselves. Pay for the goods after they are delivered and you have your money. Engraving done promptly.

Wednesday Evening to Sunday Evening
October 8 to 12, 1924
Albany, N. Y.

The registration fee is $2.00 for Seniors, $1.00 for Juniors.

The trip alone is worth while. Add to it the splendid inspiration and spiritual growth that are bound to come from and through the Convention, and you have surely sufficient reason for coming to this Convention, even at the expense of something else.

The clergy generally are urged to call to the attention of the men and boys of their parishes the advantage of attendance, and to make an earnest effort to assure that their parishes are represented. Registration cards may be had from the National Office, 202 S. 19th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Real Education

Real education consists not only in the transference of ideas from books to brains, but also the development of character through human contacts.

At Hobart College the balance between studies and human relationships is remarkably well maintained. The spirit of comradeship which pervades the Hobart campus is no less well known than the high quality of Hobart scholarship.

Among the many factors which combine to bring this about are intimacy between teachers and students, a real spirit of democracy among the students themselves, a compact college community, and pronounced loyalty to the institution.

Social organizations are plentiful, well chosen extra-curricular activities bring virtually every student into frequent contact with his fellows; two dormitories and several fraternity lodges near at hand house most of the students.

Applications for admission to the one hundred and third class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

In two things we should train ourselves—to be slow in taking offense and slower in giving it.

The way to deserve a large space is to glorify a small one.—Record of Christian Work.

There is no argument for religion in heaven or on earth that can persuade a man who will not give up his sins.

Day by day, and night unconsciously The heart lives by that faith that lips deny—God knoweth why.

—Bulwer.

To look at the things that are seen is a very paltry achievement. To see the things that are unseen is a triumph of the observer's skill.

If you have so much business that you have no time to pray, you may know that you have more business than God ever intended you should have.

"Keep yourselves in the love of God" does not mean keep yourselves loving God, but keep believing and rejoicing that God loves you.—M. D. Babcock.

"Christ is the living Vine, the source of our supply. But He bears His fruit through us. He needs us for fruit-bearing as surely as we need Him for life. There is a profound sense in which He cannot get along without us.—J. H. McConkey.

"Lord, in the morning let me keep An hour apart, my tryst and Thine, Make my first thought when called from sleep, Thy will, my Lord; Thy will, not mine."

—William B. Oliver.

The ways of life are many, but this does not mean that one is as good as another—there is "the way." It can never be discovered by chance—it is only found as we seek earnestly and constantly.—Selected.

"Ere thou risest from thy bed, Speak to God, whose wings were spread O'er thee in the helpless night— Lo, He wakes thee now with light! Lift thy burden and thy care In the mighty arms of prayer."

Our Lord wants nothing to be lost. If I am His, and am fed by Him, let me, in my own life, as He gives me opportunity, try not to lose what He would have me gather up—opportunities to speak a word for Him, opportunities to help some poor, lost soul to come to Him, opportunities to teach His little ones to pray to Him.—E. Romanes.

Be still, my soul; Jehovah loveth thee; Fret not, nor murmur at thy weary lot;

Though dark and lone thy journey seems to be,

Be sure that thou art ne'er by Him forgot.

He ever loves: then trust Him, trust Him still,

Let all thy care be this, the doing of His will.

—Exchange.

LIKE A TREE

The psalmist says of the godly man: "He shall be like a tree planted by the river." It is a wonderful simile, for there is nothing in nature quite so human as a tree. Every law of its life finds its parallel in the life of man. To begin with the soil. Trees take in that upon which they feed in the form of soil solution. The astounding thing is that practically all soils have in them all of the minerals necessary to plant life. All that is needed is to make this plant food available. But for the "useful trouble of the rain," there could be no plant life on earth. Heaven must touch the earth before the tree can live. But heaven's gift comes to the plant not directly. As it finds its way through the soil it dissolves some of the mineral matter. By the time it reaches the terminal of the roots, the water holds these minerals in solution. Only the tiny filament at the end of the root, the part that grew today, can avail itself of heaven's gift, richer after it touched the earth. Only about one-tenth of an inch is alive. All above is being constantly corked in and made impervious. Unless a root grows today, it cannot receive the gift. Within the corked surface of the root and also underneath the protecting bark are myriad tiny cells. These cells, we are told, are every one a complete electric apparatus with North and South Pole. When the earth awakes in the spring, and the current of energy is shot through the world, the bird wings its way, drawn by some mysterious but all compelling power, towards the North Pole. When the winds of March sweep across the earth, tearing the branches from the trees, Nature seems in a meaningless rage; but she is really preparing the earth for her gift of spring. With the immense leverage of the branches she shakes the tree to its furthest extremity, breaking the hard-set mould of last year's growth, and giving to every tiny rootlet freedom for new adventure into the depths. When the roots are freed, then comes the call. The tiny filaments reach out to take in the gifts of heaven and earth, and then the mystery of life begins. By cellular action, which is, we are told, electric, the soil water is carried upward unchanged to the crown of the tree, that part upon which the sunlight falls. Unless the gifts of heaven and earth can be carried up to where the sun can receive the offered gifts, then these gifts are all in vain. What the rain gave, the sun must bless. There in the sunlight and through the action of a substance in the tree called chlorophyll, the plant-food is prepared. The chlorophyll will paint the leaf its vivid green and the sun-blessed gifts, now made fit for use, will be carried by the cells to every part. In this use of the gifts there are two striking facts. One is that the tree cannot assimilate all it has taken from the earth. With the good it has taken some of the bad, and it must free itself of the bad or it will die; and so through the porous bark it sends out the poison of its mistakes and trusts to the rain to cleanse the bole. When the rain falls and with its absolving touch cleanses every leaf and branch and the bole itself, it carries this poison to the earth. Then woe betide the plant life underneath the tree if the branches spread so wide as to shut out the sunlight and the air; for the waters of absolution are filled with the poison, and if they remain for long upon the grass, the grass dies from the touch. Only sunlight and air can save it. Much of this water bearing the poison sinks into the earth, but the root, busy with its task of supplying life to all the tree, has guarded itself against the mistakes of yesterday by clothing itself in cork.

The solitary tree grows to beauty in its loneliness, but unless some guiding hand prune its lower branches little except the poor immune periwinkle can grow beneath the shadow of the solitary one. In spite of its beauty, the solitary tree is a destroyer unless a power not its own shall lift the curse. In the forest where the trees stand close to one another the sun can touch them only at the crown. Contact and the struggle for a place in the sun give little opportunity for the solitary virtue of beauty of form. Nature prunes the branches near the base, and leaves the trunk bare far up the tree. These unbeautiful trunks are the ones which furnish all the lumber where-with are built the homes of men.

In those first days of growth in the spring the full charged cells carry to the outermost boughs an overplus of plant food. It passes through the open pores of the young bud and is deposited on its surface in a gummy substance. For once Nature seems to have wasted its strength. This gum only remains a few days and is then either absorbed or evaporates. During those few days every tree has visitors. The migratory birds heeding the call of the pole are moving steadily northward. They must live along the way and be assured that food awaits them at their journey's end. Every tree gathers enough food for itself, and something besides to feed the birds on their journey.

It is a familiar truth that the heartwood of a tree carries within it the full story of its life. The concentric rings tell of the good years of plenty or of the time when caterpillars stripped it of its foliage or of the summer when the latter rain came not. It is a no less familiar truth that the fairest flowers and the best fruit are always on this year's growth.

From the beginning the tree lives under the law of growth. Trees do not get gradually smaller as they grow upward. The tree does not taper save where it forks. Whenever the trunk sends off a branch, or a branch a bough, or the bough a bud, that branch or bough is lessened in diameter in proportion to the volume it has sent out, and remains of this diameter until it sends out another shoot. This law runs to the extremity of every branch as well. There is a law governing the way the leaves are arranged on the spray, and it is conformance to these laws that makes the beauty of a tree. The tree tells not only the story of its growth, but of its mishaps. Every knot that mars, if it do not destroy the value of its gift to man in the form of lumber, tells how in its youth some enemy of its life bored into its very being, or some careless passer-by struck it and left a mark that time could not efface. So human in its likeness is a tree that Isaiah in the full reach of ecstatic rhapsody as he describes the greeting that awaits the triumphant Messiah declares: "and all the trees shall clap their hands."

DOG-DAYS

When the dogs of Orion, Sirius and Procyon, the big dog and the little dog as they have been called from remotest antiquity, bark at one another from their home-looks on either side of the milky way, then day and night become times of stress for all the sons of earth. Heriod declares that "Sirius parches head and knees." A man can neither think nor pray.

The story of Acteon, famous hero and hunter, punished for having accidentally intruded upon the privacy of Diana, and changed by her into a stag and then pursued and killed by his fifty hounds, is but a myth representing the destruction of vegetation during the fifty dog-days. The dogs of night who make sleep a difficult task take all the joy and beauty from the day.

Homer pauses in his song long enough to curse the brightest star in the heavens, calling it "the evil star."

Orion and his dogs chased Pleione and her fair daughters, who cried out to the gods for succor and were changed to doves (pleiades) and placed among the stars. Dog-days spare neither age nor beauty.

In Rome, when midsummer pestilence prevailed, sacrifices were offered to placate the inimical star.

In English literature stones are still being thrown at the big dog of the stars. Pope sings:

"The dog-star rages! Nay, 'tis past a doubt,
All Bedlam, or Parnassus, is let out."

Addison says that the only use he can find for the dog-days is to set them aside for training in the use of the fan—fighting the dog with a turkey's wing.

The Fourth Estate that makes our manners and mocks our morals has named this time "the silly season." From the parched earth arise those absurd and monstrous lies, most of which are killed by the first frost. Some of them, however, survive and creep into the chronicle of facts, and play havoc with history. So dangerous to truth are the dog-days that some would have it that it is a counsel of safety to "believe nothing you hear in August."

Gilbert White, in "The Natural History of Selborne," first noted the fact that even the birds refuse to sing in the dog-days, and that "August is by much the most mute month" of the year. This is the time, and all that has been here written is by way of asking the indulgence of our readers. Sirius, the baleful star, is in the ascendant; Sirius that parches head and knees, that will not let you think nor pray. These are the pariah days of the year, the mongrel and vagabond dog-days, outcasts of all time, children of the evil star.

THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS

By the Reverend J. F. Weinmann

HAVE you ever, reader, if a question may be permitted which is so intimate as, but for a saving consideration, to seem impertinent, have you ever in your inmost self felt convicted of sin? As if you could not look up or even forward? With a conviction that made you feel ashamed and humiliated, not to say broken and discouraged? Until for the first time you no longer thought strange the words in the Communion Office, "The burden of them is intolerable"?

Has the cumulative and accumulated sin of a human life, of your human life, weighed heavily upon your spirit in any case, but all the more terribly as you have reflected upon the beauty, the holiness and the perfection of Almighty God and the soul's relation and responsibility to Him?

Have you ever with St. Paul cried out, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver or rescue me from this body of death"? Have you ever really and with sympathy read into the meaning of St. Peter's abnegation where he cries, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord"?

Are you, even as you read these words, afraid of God? afraid and ashamed to pray? Do you feel, in the ancient and still modern language of Isaiah, that your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and that your sins have made Him hide His face from you?

Do you stand outside the door of your Father's house, It is all now as if only you alone were in the world, and feeling that you are no more worthy to be called His son?

What can be said for you, of you and to you? It matters not now to you that all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; that all like sheep have gone astray. as if for the first time man had heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day. Where will you hide yourself? What will you do? Is there no help for you, no hope, convicted as you are, alike before the bar of reason, of conscience and of God?

Yes, there is hope for you, and this hope is found in the Church, the Sacraments, the consciousness of the human race, in experience and in the Holy Writings which have come out of the Church and experience.

It would seem that the first truth that every religion (not only our own priceless Christian religion) has found out as it has thought of and related itself to God, or, as President Bell put it before his class at Wellesley, the primary reality discovered by man religiously, is—SIN.

What is sin? Sin is missing the mark, we are often told; sin is failure; the root sin of all sins, is failure to glorify God, since we read that for His pleasure we are and were created. God desired to take pleasure in His children, in their loyalty, their devotion, their love, and His children failed Him. Like St. Paul, they found what seemed a very law in their members, that when they would do good evil was present with them, so that how to perform that which was good they could not, again and again, find. Sin is the putting of the human will for the will of God. Sin cuts off from God. How true that is. Not that sin cuts God off from us, but rather that it cuts us off from God. It is we who hide ourselves, not God. God is ever represented in our holy religion as seeking us, even as did our Lord, Simon, "Go and tell my disciples—and Peter." It is we who are ashamed and who have the feeling that now we can no longer hold up our head, now we can no longer pray, now we can no longer, need no longer, try; all of which are temptations, sore temptations, of the devil, who tempts always in our weakest hour and follows up his temptation with others, in his effort finally to separate us from God and our ideal. No wonder we hear our LORD saying, "Satan hath desired to have thee that he may sift thee as wheat, but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not."

And no language could be more explicit or more painstaking and abundant than the language of Holy Scripture regarding the readiness and willingness, the deep desire and anxiety, so to say, of Almighty God to forgive sin and to restore the erring and sinful child. Not once nor twice, but over and over again, do we see the outstretched hands of God turned toward His ancient people and toward all the world, for God is not willing that any should perish, but that all might come to repentance, and the Lord is merciful and gracious, as so many texts in the Psalms in the Old Testament say, slow to anger and of great mercy. He will not always chide: neither will He keep His anger forever. He hath not dealt with us after our sins; nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is His mercy toward them that fear Him. As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us. Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. For He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are but dust. His hand is not shortened that it cannot save; neither His ear heavy that it cannot hear.

Indeed it would seem as if God feared that man would not really find it in him to believe that the Holy One Who inhabiteth eternity could concern Himself with man in any case, and certainly not when he considered the gulf of sin that separated between him and God, his Maker, and as if for that reason God had laid word on word in a sort of holy and persistent eloquence, in order that man, cast down and undone, might come at last to believe that he could be forgiven and restored. One remembers the prominent man in the prison who had dragged his respected family along with himself into the shame of public disgrace through some speculations in a political position—one remembers this man's asking where the text could be found that tells of God's promise even to forget the sins of His children. Now that is a wonderful and an amazing thing, that God will not only forgive, but that He will and does forget. The text is in Isa. 43:25, "I, even I, am He that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins." It is moreover in this same book that we are told, "Thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption: for Thou hast cast all my sins behind Thy back." And to make the picture so to speak four-square we read in Micah that He will cast all their sin into the depth of the sea. Remembered no more; cast behind His back; buried in the sea; and removed as far as the east is from the west; could anything be left that God has not said to lead His sinful, erring children back to Himself and to their Father's house? Could anything else be needed to make the most abandoned even and the outcast say humbly and with gratitude, "I will take the cup of salvation (the margin or note says deliverances), and call upon the name of the Lord," for certainly God, strange as it may seem, and hard for sinful man to believe, must mean what He is at such pains, not only to say, but to say so frequently and with such measured eloquence.

And lastly, in this hope and achievement of the mercy, the forgiveness and the restoration of God, it may be helpful to remember there are a number of easily distinguishable elements. There is contrition, of which little need be said, and for the reason that it is only too poignantly present with any one at all conscious of sin, or interested sufficiently to read this far in a paper with such a title as the Forgiveness of Sins. Sorrow is obviously the least of the elements that need to be stressed, for sorrow always comes with awakening, and sorrow for sin is never wholly absent in this life, whatever the next life, in the mercy and the power of God, may bring forth. We do not so much need to be told to be sorry for what has separated between us and God as that God pities and is not lost to us. It is this the soul longs to hear and is slow to believe, hence the texts, and, as has been said, the eloquence of God in assuring man of forgiveness and of ultimate victory. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is." And following upon sorrow or contrition comes confession. "I will acknowledge my faults and my sin is ever before me: against Thee only have I sinned and done this evil in Thy sight." How easily and quickly the ancient language forms itself upon the lips and is appropriated as the soul's own in all the ages. So true is it that confession is always a part of the process of the soul's restoration that it has passed into a proverb of our language, "An honest confession is good for the soul." It is a common place for a murderer to be hounded by an accusing conscience and to find a measure of peace at last when he surrenders and acknowledges himself ready to take his punishment, to make reparation and restitution, as far as it now is possible for him so to do: it brings him, does this confession of his sin, a measure of peace. And so it always is. "We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." How Scripture seems to be found for every step in the soul's need, for every occasion along the highway, the beset highway, of its pilgrimage from the city of destruction to the habitation of its real desire and delight! Reparation, of course, as has been intimated, there will be wherever this is necessary and possible. The soul awakened to its need and its desire for the mercy and the forgiveness of God counts no price too great to pay if it can but build what it has broken down, if it can but heal where it has hurt. This in all human wrongs and relationships. In its relation to God there is nothing the soul can do but wait for His salvation, His loving kindness, in the midst of His temple, pleading meanwhile, looking up to, the suffering and the understanding Figure upon the Cross, the Sign and Symbol and Sacrifice in all the Christian centuries which the soul dumbly offers in atonement for its sin. As if helpless and not knowing what to do or where to turn—it turns to what God Himself has provided, to what God Himself has done to meet the very need and issue of the soul's and the world's sin. And then, of course, which goes almost without saying, for it is implicit in every gesture the soul makes, as it is real in all its anguish—purpose of amendment! By the grace and the power of God this will I do, and this and this. Until by many attempts, by seeking again and yet again, the soul at last finds itself sheltered and at home with God, who is its only good.

REVELATION.

Thou Who dost all things give
Be not Thyself forgot!
No longer may Thy children live
As though their God were not.

But every day and hour,
Since Thou dost bless us thus,
In still increasing light and power
Reveal Thyself to us;

Until our faith shall be Stronger than words can tell,
And we shall live beholding Thee,
O Thou Invisible!

SPIRITUAL ASPECTS OF RELIEF WORK

By the Reverend John Ralph Voris

PEOPLE in general have responded to appeals for relief as a matter of sympathetic response to suffering; and as sheer duty. They do not analyze their feelings; they do not ask whether the appeal is "spiritual" or not. They simply give.

If the great majority of people who give to the relief of the suffering were asked if they did this as a spiritual exercise, they would answer quickly in the negative. They simply divorce spirituality from this kind of service. Spirituality means to them prayer, communion, worship, contemplation of the sufferings of Christ,—rather than the sufferings of His children,—but it hardly means pledging money to the support of orphaned Near East children.

And there are many who lay claim to spiritual ideals who frankly and honestly deplore appeals for relief from the pulpit, because they divert the mind from spiritual things. I recall hearing a secretary of a Foreign Mission Board take a relief organization to task because it was "exploiting" the churches of his communion. To him as to many others, caring for the Chinese famine sufferers, Russian refugees, Near East children was only a task, a non-spiritual task, unless it should perchance provide a channel for sectarian proselyting.

While not many priests and other Church leaders will agree with this extreme point of view, there are many who face the appeals for help with consternation and worry.

I sympathize with such men. In a sense they are right. But they are right about this only in the sense in which they would be right about denominating any effort to raise funds as "materialistic." If the raising of funds for the building of a church, or for missionary work, can be made a spiritual function, then assuredly the giving to relief projects can be similarly regarded. To give to a starving, naked bondaged people in the spirit and name of Christ, is every whit as spiritual in its effect upon the nurture of the soul of the giver, as is giving to an evangelistic campaign, or to a mission chapel or the building of a Cathedral. Either may be hard and materialistic; either may be a softening and an ennobling thing.

For the sake of kindling in their people an idealistic attitude toward giving to suffering peoples and for the sake of such causes as may seem to be essential in the future, I wish that the clergy would teach their people the fundamental religious realities in such giving.

As one contemplates the relief movements from this angle, one cannot be but deeply moved by the impressiveness of the contribution of relief movements to the idealism of American Christianity.

It is well to recall what we preached about the Red Cross during the Great War, and the work of feeding French and Belgian children since the war, to realize anew what we then so clearly saw. The hundreds of millions of dollars given by the American people to the help of France, Belgium, Austria, and Germany, released vast storehouses of generosity, aroused and expressed sympathy, fed springs of international good will toward friend and enemy. These results are priceless. This aid went beyond war allies and war enemies, into Russia where economic and political considerations had prevented relationships; into China—a land so largely misunderstood by Americans; and more recently in Japan, doing away with all thought of jingoism, and cheapening all talk of war.

Thus has all international relief had spiritual values of many kinds. But in another sense the work of two relief organizations has stood out, not so much for its extent, for it has not been so great as that of the American Relief Administration and the Red Cross—as in its instigation of certain spiritual factors. I refer to the Friends Service Commission and to the Near East Relief. These movements have not only released the ideals that have been alluded to, but they have been able by virtue both of their inherent purpose and the need they have attempted to fulfil to emphasize the spiritual note to a greater degree than more general organizations could. Each has been distinct. For want of better phrases, I might say the spiritual emphasis of the Friends has been upon brotherhood and service; the spiritual emphasis of Near East Relief upon sacrifice and Christian fellowship.

The idealistic conceptions created by the Friends have been of unrealized value. They have emphasized voluntary service, peace and good will, reconstruction of the family and of the community, until I am willing to aver that the effect upon America has been of far greater value than the actual accomplishments overseas, however great these may be. There has been something singularly pure and fine in this work of the Friends. All Communions should seek at least to appreciate this idealism.

In some ways Near East Relief has not made so idealistic an impression. It has in America, emphasized the campaign spirit more, in order to arrive at the larger funds needed. It has been so involved in the political problems of the Near East it has not been able to present as clear a note of good will toward all men. But it has had other qualities to a degree not attained by other relief movements. These qualities came not so much from the Near East Relief, though that leadership has been a strong factor, therein,—as from the cause itself.

The appeal of the Near East suffering has been of immeasurable value in developing in the children of the Sunday Schools a sense of intimate fellowship with suffering childhood. That this childhood is in Bible Lands is a cause of special interest to Sunday-school children. The Bible lands will now have a vivid human interest they could not have had under ordinary circumstances. I doubt if any cause has ever been so continuously before the Sunday-school children of America. That this has developed in the children generosity, pity, loyalty, to the Christ to Whom the suffering children they are assisting have been so devoted, goes without saying, though probably for the most part it has been overlooked.

That the Near East Relief appeal has created and has used the sense of indignation against injustice is no small contribution. One enters into this with hesitation because of its conflicting currents. The Near East Relief itself has not been especially courageous or statesman-like in its attitude toward injustice to Armenians and Greeks. But THE CAUSE,—has aroused hatred,—NOT AGAINST the Turk, but against any such form of brutality by whomsoever perpetrated. There are those who will insist that this form of indignation is warlike and unhelpful, and that it is a contradiction for one to laud the Friends in one paragraph and to praise this indignation in the next. I see no such contradiction, for war has been the last thing desired. But God have pity upon human hearts that can gaze upon injustice without feeling a sense of burning indignation.

But the more special contribution of the Near East Relief appeal has been that of bringing the Christian sense of sympathy and of fellowship to those who have been martyred, in behalf of their convictions. Here it has been different from any other appeal. Nothing else is like it: Japanese earthquake, Chinese famine,—incomprehensible acts of nature; Russian famine, the result of natural and of economic conditions; helpless children of France, the result of war, indignation against which had been fully developed. But in the Near East Relief there is something different from these others. It must be closer to the Christian conscience.

Now I do not mean to say that it is necessarily more idealistic or "spiritual" because it bears the name "Christian". Many things have been done under the name "Christian" that were far from spiritual. I am not evaluating here the relationship between Turk and Armenian. I am trying to say that contemplating the sufferings and the Cross-bearing martyrdom of Eastern Christians, has given to Western Christians a new sense of the value of Christianity and of its meaning to the individual and to the world.

And again, my last point here,—it has been of special spiritual value to America in developing a sense of fellowship with the Eastern Churches, misunderstood, unappreciated, for the most part, ignored heretofore. This is a long story in itself,—one in which only the first chapters are now being written. For the leaders in the Episcopal Church this situation is but a growth, an application of the principle that the right course to take is to supplement rather than supplant the indigenous Christian Churches; and yet for the great majority of the Episcopal laity it presents a new challenge. For Presbyterian and Congregational Foreign Mission leadership, believing fundamentally in working into the native Church rather than dismembering it, but conscious of attempts made with resultant failures along this line, this opportunity now comes as a practicable and fresh invitation. For the laity of these communions and for the pastors and membership in general of the Churches in America, this point of view is new and the interest is but in its infancy. They will eventually come to the realization that the Orthodox Eastern Churches and the Churches of America have much that is in common and should therefore have a sense of unity, but that more particularly each group has a very great deal to give to the other.

While there is a long road to travel before the clergy of both groups of Churches really believe this truth, which is so obvious to those who have thoughtfully studied the question, and a still greater distance to cover before the rank and file of the Churches on either side of the water see it, yet the work of Near East Relief has been a material factor in increasing the number of crusaders in behalf of this Fellowship between the Eastern and the Western Churches.

That these spiritual factors do not in themselves feed the bodies of the orphans goes without saying, but their realization will certainly not diminish material support and it is likely to give stability and continuance to the giving of the money so necessary to sustain life.

THE HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SOCIAL SERVICE WORK OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES

The Reverend Jos. M. Waterman, A. B., B. D., Baltimore, Md.

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew.
(Story of Program and Pamphlets.)

THIS organization was started in St. James' Church, Chicago, in the year 1883 by James H. Houghteling. As the leader of a Bible class he inspired a group of young men with a vision of their responsibility to personally serve their Lord and Master in the establishment of His Kingdom. The origin of the organization was accidental. The young men were making an effort to care for a human derelict who had drifted into a meeting of the men's Bible class. When the rector saw what they were doing he remarked, "Andrew was the man who found his brother Simon and brought him to Jesus."

"The Brotherhood of St. Andrew was adopted as the name of the newly organized group, because St. Andrew exemplified what they were planning to do. The purpose of the organization was to vitalize in each member his passive relationship to Christ's body, the Church, and to convert him into an active force as an enlisted soldier in Christ's army, the Church, commissioned to win the world for Christ.

Other parishes soon heard of the Brotherhood and its working principles, which resulted in a number of groups being organized in several dioceses. Through correspondence and the sharing of experiences three years later, on St. Andrew's Day, 1886, eighty delegates met in Chicago to organize a National Brotherhood. This organization has spread throughout the United States, Canada, England, Scotland, Australia, New Zealand and the West Indies, and many isolated parts of the world where the American and Anglican Churches are working. The organization was never intended to be large in membership, but as a movement it aimed to reach every man and boy in the Church and challenge him to stop and think of what Christ expects of him as an enlisted member of His army.

Boys between the ages of twelve and eighteen are organized into a Junior Chapter. In addition to the personal influence for good which the members of these groups will exert in a parish, the following are some of the corporate objectives:

1. To organize and loyally support groups for the study and discussion of the Bible, the Prayer Book and Program of the Church.
2. To endeavor to interest the unbaptized to become members of Christ's Body, the Church, through baptism, and the unconformed to receive confirmation.
3. Through cooperative effort to secure the interest of the men and boy communicants of the Church in the practice of attending monthly corporate communion.
4. Through cooperative effort to stimulate regular attendance at public services of worship.
5. To interest members in and to encourage the practice of family prayer.

Perhaps the most important recent work which it is desired to establish permanently for the Church is the operation of six boys' camps in various parts of the United States. These, while providing systematic recreation, are definite training schools, not just to create Brotherhood members, but future Church leaders. The training is all around, and under the guidance of the several departments of the Church.

Daughters of the King.
(Extracts from Handbook.)

The sole object of this order is the spread of Christ's Kingdom among women and the strengthening of parish life. Its two rules are to pray daily for the spread of Christ's Kingdom, especially among women, for God's blessing upon all members of the order and for the spiritual growth of the parish to which the chapter owes allegiance. Second, to take regularly some part in the worship study and work of the Church, to make a constant effort to bring other women within its influence, and to render at all times such aid to the rector as he may deem necessary for the spiritual upbuilding of the parish.

Certain forms of social service are conducted by the order if the need for such services seems to be paramount. In some cities Bible classes are conducted, members meet girls and women at railway stations; they visit children in asylums and shut-in people, read to prisoners, operate milk stations and even endow hospitals. The keynote of the order is "Service."

History of the Order.

The Senior Bible class for young women in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, New York City, had for its class name "Daughters of the King." Desirous of stimulating its members to greater activity and more earnest zeal for Christ, their teacher, Mrs. M. J. Franklin, called a meeting on Easter Even, 1885. An organization was quickly affected. They realized that there was a duty at home; that each one of them had near at hand women who needed to be won to Christ and His Church. Their first move was to establish a Bible class for women and to bring other women to that class. They also made it a point to make strangers welcome at the church services. Several other societies adopted their plan and asked to affiliate with this class. This led to the original constitution, which remained in form until 1891. It was not expected that the order would in any way supersede the established societies for women. It was purposely organized as a religious order. Its motto translated is as follows: "Bear forward, almost aggressively, the cross with a great mind."

By the year 1889 six chapters had affiliated. The growth of the order has been continuous. At present there are six hundred and seventy-five Senior chapters and sixty-five Junior chapters, with chapters in England and Canada (7,000 members).

The first convention of the order was held in Baltimore, 1893. That year one hundred and three chapters were added to the order. The sixteenth convention was held in Portland, Ore., 1922, and a new constitution adopted. At this convention the order also established "the Master's fund," for the education of women of the order who wish to become deaconesses.

One of the outstanding moves of this order was in the year 1904, when the "self-denial fund" was established. One of the Daughters, Miss Ward, had dedicated herself to service in China. Upon her death a letter was found which urged the support of the work in China. Self-denial week is observed each year in the Epiphany season and the money contributed goes to this fund, which is used for the maintenance of a Daughter of the King, as a missionary in China.

All the funds that this order handles are free will offerings. It does not hold entertainments nor work to make money. The social work that it does is personal and corporate service in the interests of women. It has been instrumental in furthering the work of the Church Mission of Help, described in another section.

Methods of Work.

The organization works—

1. Through the Bible Class.
2. The Visiting Committee.
3. The Hospitality Committee.

The Work of the Visiting Committee. This committee varies in size with the size of the parish. A record is kept of all visits. Some chapters use a card index system. On one side is an order signed by the president or rector, giving the name and address of the women to be visited, together with any other information, such as may be known, age, occupation, etc.

The Hospitality Committee meets strangers, gets information regarding their residence, names and addresses.

It may be difficult to understand what a force this order may be for good in the lives of women, so an incident is mentioned which brings out the force of their social work.

A girl belonging to a Junior chapter was missing from home for five days. When she returned the girl admitted that the suspicions of her parents were well founded, and she was cast out as a child of evil. Two Daughters of the King went at once to get her. They talked with her parents and with the girl and induced her parents to give her a chance. They acted as Big Sisters to this girl, and in so doing have continued to aid a repentant girl, to try to win back her place in the world.

Junior Daughters of the King.

Soon after the organization of the chapter in Emmanuel Church, Anacostia, District of Columbia, Mrs. Davenport, the directress, selected out of her children's guild a number of young girls of proper age and called them Junior Daughters. She sent them out to hunt up absentees of the Sunday school, to look after girls of their own age and to visit the sick, the aged and afflicted, and to read to them. This work went on for several years before the Junior chapters were formally organized.

The first meeting of diocesan chapters of Juniors was held in Washington, 1905. The first conference on the work of Junior Daughters was held in St. Louis, 1916.

The Junior order embraces girls from twelve to eighteen years of age.

Book Reviews

NONE SO BLIND. By Albert Parker Fitch. The Macmillan Company, New York, Publishers. Pages 366.

"None So Blind" is a remarkably interesting, well-written book, and very unusual. The characters are strong. The story clean. The Harvard atmosphere pervades the book. The students of all classes are pictured with remarkable skill and the young professor, characteristic product of this great university, is exceedingly well-drawn in the person of Professor Barrett. The personality of Richard Blaisdel from a dissipated student in his first year of college life to that of an earnest idealist, is wonderfully well done and the reader can almost see the growth of power that comes, through greater vision, clean living and applied efforts. The heroine, Felicia Morland, does not recognize the possibilities in this developing man, and, through her calculating attitude toward life, fails to accept his proffered love and thereby loses the opportunity of her life.

The closing scene showing her married to the young professor, bored by the surroundings of a Western College, with a husband immersed in his professional duties, has real dramatic power.

TONGUES OF FLAME. By Peter Clark McFarlane. Cosmopolitan Publishing Company. Pages 405.

It is refreshing to read a story that is written to illustrate that honesty is the best policy—to have the hero afraid only of not doing his best—to be square and true to his ideals—whatever the price.

Henry Harrington is a splendid type of man, and the story of his experiences is thrillingly exciting, holding ones interest from cover to cover.

He is employed by an enormous corporation, which ruled the state, and which was founded and built by fraud, but when Harrington realized this and the dreadful injustice done the people, he tries to expose Boland, who had, by the subtlest forms of bribery, corrupted the whole community.

False charges are brought against Harrington and he is thrown into prison, forsaken by sweetheart and friends, humiliated and nearly crazed. An Indian girl who loves and adores him, proves his innocence.

He saves the town and people when fire and starvation surrounds them, and, because they know him to be honest, Harrington is the hero of the hour.

A GENTLEMAN OF COURAGE. By James Oliver Curwood. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. Pages 342. Illustrated. Price $2.00.

This novel is written in Mr. Curwood's usual style, and with a somewhat unfortunate similarity to the plots of his former books, which gives the reader a rather reminiscent feeling, that detracts a little from the interest. The scene, opens in the Canadian wilds where the hero's father has taken refuge to escape the consequences of a tragedy in his life. The principal part of the book, however, develops in a village near one of the Great Lakes, where the lives of Peter McRae and Mona Guyon move from childhood to youth, and find a united happiness through numerous exciting scenes, the rehearsal of which provides interesting Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses.

This is composed of a specialized group of women, for whom the Guild holds a unique place. It is the only national organization providing religious and social life for all nurses of whatever denomination.

This Guild is missionary, because it deals with those who care for the sick throughout the world; it is educational because it offers to the young women in hospitals and training schools the guidance of the Church; it is social because it brings the nurse into touch with the Churchwomen of the community and affords a home for the girl who is alone in a strange city.

The English Guild was founded by Miss Autrobus in 1876, a nurse who knew well the special difficulties besetting nurses in their busy lives. The Guild in America was started in Boston in 1886. There are now in this country forty branches with a membership of 2,804.

Each branch has at least a monthly meeting, at which, after a short service, there is a conference or business meeting, followed by a social hour. The duty of associate members is to know and visit the nurses. In some of the branches there is a sick relief association, which is a mutual aid society.—From Story of the Program and Living Church Annual.

reading of a clean and wholesome nature. It is perhaps unfortunate that the Canadian Mounted Police, who are seen in pursuit of the elder McRae, are portrayed in rather ugly colors, presenting the worse side of that picturesque body of men whose duties, however, necessarily require sternness of character.

THE SCHOLARS ITALY. By Florence Trail. Williams and Wilkins Co., Baltimore. 1923. Pp. 358.

The following pages presuppose, and depend for their interest upon a thorough acquaintance with my previous work, A History of Italian Literature. This is the rather formidable sentence with which Miss Trail, of Frederick, Maryland, opens her book. It will be seen that she takes herself seriously, for she tells us that when she needed a history of Italian Literature, she found she must write it. "The viewpoint of an American, the refinement of a woman and the spirituality of a Christian must dominate its pages." In the present volume she is "bringing forward some addenda and reflections" left over, as it were, from the mass of material collected for her major work. The book contains a mass of data loosely put together, in which there is much of interest. Miss Trail is an ardent and omnivorous reader and gives one the idea of an isolated student who has worked hard, for the love of working, in her chosen field. Her contention is a worthy one—that amid the colossal achievements of the Italian genius, genius which has led the world in almost every new path of government, science, art and letters, the critics of all time have been alert to signal out abnormal qualities and to stress the astounding heights and depths of folly and vice, which this remarkable people have exhibited. She claims for them a general normalcy throughout the ages. The chapter on Sacred and Didactic Poetry is perhaps the most worth while, containing her own translation of Arici's description of Hagar in the Desert and the closing lines of Manzoni's Prayer to the Holy Spirit. There is also an interesting note on page 32 concerning our glorious Latin hymns, many of them written by Italians.

SOCIETY OF THE NAZARENE: A CORRECTION.
Mr. Editor:

In the Southern Churchman for July 26 I have noticed an interesting article on "Healers" and "Divine Healing."

In writing of our Society Dr. Moore states that headquarters are at Boonton and that the Rev. Henry B. Wilson is the Director. May I ask that you will make a correction in an early issue, stating that our beloved Founder and former Director entered Life Eternal in March, 1923, and that in June National Headquarters were moved to Asheville. Also that Rev. A. J. Gayner Banks is now Director of the Society.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Editor.

LEARN A LESSON FROM THE SOFT SHELL CRAB.

The writer recently had the pleasure of spending the night with a friend at the seashore, and that delectable delicacy, soft shelled crabs, formed part of the menu at one meal.

Between delicious mouthfuls, the host told us of the transformation process, whereby a crab changed from hard to soft-shell. He said that they shed their shells when they got fat, and as a consequence, became almost helpless and had to begin all over again, forming a new hard shell, for their protection.

It occurred to us that, although it is a far cry, from Moses in the desert, with the children of Israel, to a soft-shell crab on toast, nevertheless, the same general rules of life are applicable.

In the Book of Deuteronomy, which is said to contain Moses' farewell addresses, he cautions his followers, in eloquent language, against the dangers of prosperity.

"And it shall be, when the Lord thy God shall have brought thee into the land which He swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildest not,

And houses full of all good things, which thou fillest not, and wells digged, which thou diggst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full;

Then beware lest thou forget the Lord, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage."

With these impressive words, this great leader of old warns his people against the danger of prosperity, of overfeeding, of fatness.

As one hears of the disaster that overtakes the corpulent crab, who by reason of his excess of eating, loses the protection which is given him against his enemies, and becomes a well-nigh helpless prey to all who have designs upon his life, one might exclaim:

"If I were a crab, I would surely be careful of my diet!"

It is just as necessary, however, for us to guard against the dangers that come from too easy living, as it is, for our friends of the ocean, on whom we love to make a meal.

The writer of the Book of Deuteronomy was both wise and right when he said that the danger of forgetting the Lord, Our God, was great in the times of easy living.

The people of the United States will do well to remember this, for we hear on all sides, that we are about to enter upon a period of unprecedented prosperity.

One of our great leaders of industry and finance has announced that we shall shortly see a time of as great industrial activity, as that through which we passed during the war.

Everything points that way. The adjustment of European finances will certainly lead to the loan of a great sum to Germany by our bankers. Money is somewhat like the blood of an animal. It is very little use unless it circulates. We have had for several years great quantities of surplus money in this country, but it has been of very little use to us because it has been in a more or less stagnant state.

According to an editorial published in a cosmopolitan newspaper:

"One of the New York banks, in its review of the business situation last week, called attention to the great proportion of the world's total supply of gold which is now held in the United States. The amount has been steadily piling up and is now placed by the Mechanics and Metals National Bank at $4,500,000,000, as compared with something less than $3,000,000,000 three years ago. The rest of the civilized nations have together no larger sum of gold than is to be found in this country alone. It is not something which our bankers and merchants, our manufacturers and importers, have made special efforts to secure. Simply as a result of economic forces set in motion by the World War, gold has flowed in upon America as in a veritable stream of Pactolus.

"Something must be done with the gold. It cannot be left indefinitely idle in the vaults. Americans are not misers to delight in merely brooding over their amassed gold, and handling it to make sure of its existence. They know that its real value is in safeguarded use, and for such employment of it they are looking about today more eagerly than ever before.

"A certain amount of our surplus gold can be utilized in our own supply of currency. Bank notes are retired and gold certificates put out in their place. But this can reduce the excess only in a slight degree. For the full employment of the gold which we have beyond our own immediate needs we must, as the bank referred to insists, look abroad. We must be prepared to make use of our surplus gold not only in subscribing to the forthcoming German loan, but in greatly extending our foreign investments of all kinds. Otherwise the gold will remain on our hands as both a drug and a danger.

"Thus is the ancient process reversed. Instead of scouring the world in the search for gold, we are in the position of asking the rest of the world to help us make safe and profitable use of the gold which we already possess. It is like carrying the Golden Fleece to market instead of going on a long and arduous quest of it."

It may seem foolish that we should gain prosperity by lending Germany money, with which to buy our goods, and yet that is exactly what will take place. It is this condition, too, on which are based the prophecies of a new industrial activity, the like of which the world has never seen.

It behooves our clergy and their congregations to keep ever before them the fact that "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." It is He, Who gives us the blessings of His bounty, and we must be ever on our guard against greed and selfishness, ever on the lookout lest in our own times of ease and abundance, we allow others of His children to suffer for the lack of the things which we have so plentifully.

Four Commands of the Church's Mission.

Suggestions for an exceptionally interesting program, lasting half a day or several days, as time permits, may be taken from a missionary conference held at Church Missions House early in the summer. That conference was attended by thirty missionaries, half on furlough, half newly appointed, and all but two or three of the speakers either were missionaries or had visited the mission fields, but even without such a personnel, the outline of the conference would be useful elsewhere.

The talks, none of them very long, were grouped around four commands, "Lift up your eyes and look," "Pray ye, therefore," "Freely ye have received, freely give," and "Go ye, therefore." This included study, prayer, stewardship and service.

Before and after each of these discussions were presentations of the larger divisions of the mission field, Latin-America, the Orient, Africa, Alaska, without a great deal of detail, but with emphasis on the underlying problems and difficulties, racial and national, and the purpose of the Church in relation to them.

The Great Commission

"A GOODLY FELLOWSHIP"—S. P. G. REPORT FOR 1923.

Not for general reading among us, it may as well be admitted, but for every true missionary enthusiast, for every one who believes in and loves the mission of the Church and who finds good reading in the story of its triumphs and difficulties and its heroes, there is an English book issued every year which is full of interest. It is a paper-bound sketch or summary, some two hundred pages in length, of the work of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, that great and venerable English society now well into the third century of its life. The 1923 report is called A Goodly Fellowship, and may be had from the Society's office, 15 Tufton Street, Westminster London, S. W. 1, for a postal order for a shilling.

The name, A Goodly Fellowship, was intended to emphasize the oneness of the contributors at home with the mission workers on the field. For us it should further emphasize the oneness of the work of the Anglican Communion throughout the world. Americans will find a special interest in the chapters about those regions where our own work is carried on—sometimes in a much smaller way than that of the older English society—in Northwest North America, South America and Africa, and in the West Indies, where, in view of the constant migration of some of the strongest Church people from the English islands to ours, one English missionary writes, "Our work here seems largely to consist in training recruits for the American Church."

In the Orient, where the young national Churches are the product of English, Canadian and American work, the book is as interesting for us as our own Story of the Program or The Spirit of Missions. English missionary writing, especially the S. P. G. reports, The East and the West, a quarterly, and the little monthly Mission Field, is unfailingly interesting and not infrequently subject to thrills. There can be no doubt that a wider reading of it by those of us who have learned to value our own publications would greatly encourage us and increase our efforts in the work for which we are directly responsible.

REMARKABLE RECORD OF CHINESE PARISH.

Without wasting any words in oratory the rector of the Church of Our Saviour, Shanghai, at a recent gathering mentioned the following social and educational achievements of that Chinese parish. The occasion was the twentieth anniversary of Chants Academy, a boys' boarding school connected with the parish. The new academy building was formally opened, its entire cost, $35,000 Mexican, having been contributed by parents of the students and members of the congregation.

The parish is located in one of the worst but growing suburbs of Shanghai, where the church is surrounded by masses of poor, ignorant people. The Yenson Community Hall was also opened at this time, a comparatively cheap wooden structure. A campaign for $50,000 is planned for 1929 (marking the rector's twenty-five years of service), for the erection of a substantial church hall to replace the wooden structure and to include an auditorium large enough for 1,500 people.

On the same day occurred also the opening of the Han Memorial Institute, established and supported by Mr. N. L. Han, a vestryman, in memory of his parents. This is to give a primary education in English and Chinese to the Christian children of the parish.

A "School for Popular Education" was begun at the same time, as the share of the parish in the nation-wide movement toward that end.

A tablet was unveiled, erected in memory of the late Mrs. Y. K. Friend, for twenty years "vestrywoman" and choirmother of the parish.

The academy school building, though less than four years old, is already too small. During the year the students had an enthusiastic campaign to raise $6,000 for the purchase of additional land. The land has been bought, a small boy presenting the title deeds to the Bishop at the anniversary celebration. The students raised $4,000 and the campaign had not yet closed. The land is a gift from the boys to the school.

Furthermore, the celebration marked the seventieth anniversary of the parish itself, which was organized by Bishop Boone. In 1906 it became self-supporting and has since been maintained by the Chinese Christians and administered by the native clergy.

The rector took occasion to say: "It is most appropriate for us to make use of this opportunity to express our sincere thanks to the Department of Missions in the United States for its kind support and guidance upon which the birth, growth and development of this parish largely depended, and this we can do only through its representative, the Bishop of the Diocese, by whose presence our gathering here is greatly honored."

MISS LINDLEY STUDYING ENGLISH MISSIONS.

Miss Grace Lindley, Executive Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, continuing her useful tour of missions, has spent July in India, taking advantage of the opportunity to return that way in order to study the work of some of the English missions, that our own work may benefit by their long experience. India, "this great and beautiful land," as Kim calls it, will seem less far away as Churchwomen of both countries are brought nearer each other by Miss Lindley's visits there. The month's schedule included Ceylon, Madras, Calcutta, Benares, Cawnpore, Agra, Moradabad (between Lucknow and Delhi), Delhi and Bombay, from which she was to leave for England early in August.

All along the line of her visits in Japan and China would come back from the missionaries and native workers of the great help and encouragement they have received from her, and their repeated desire that they might have more frequent visitors from headquarters. Miss Lindley's letters have been appearing in The Spirit of Missions and will continue.

The Young People's Conference, Sewanee, Tenn.

By the Rev. E. P. Dandridge, D. D.

What are the young people of today thinking of—the sheiks who walk with a swagger and the Shebas with bobbed hair, khaki shirts and knickers? The Young People's Conference now being held at Sewanee furnishes one answer. Until this year these young people met with their elders and were accounted one division of the Sewanee Summer School for Church Workers, but the numbers attending this school have become so great that the University authorities have insisted on a division, and this year the young people are holding their meeting two weeks earlier, to be followed by the adult conference from August 7 to August 21. So for two weeks the young people and their leaders have it all to themselves. And what are they doing? They are playing, singing, yelling, playing baseball and tennis, taking hikes, getting up "stunts" and having a royally good time. But play is only a small part of that which occupies their time. The day begins with a celebration of the Holy Communion at 7 A. M. in the chapel of the S. M. A., or, in fine weather, out under the trees. Then comes breakfast, followed by inspection. From 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. they are very busy in classes. Under such leaders as Bishop C. S. Quin, of Texas; Rev. Gordon M. Reese, Rev. E. C. Seamon, Miss Annie M. Stout, Miss Nettie Barnwell, Mrs. F. H. G. Fry, Miss Helen Hargrave, Rev. Clarence Parker, and Miss Mabel E. Stone, they are studying the Bible, the Prayer Book, Missions, Social Service, Church Pageantry, Young People's Service League work and many of the units of the Standard Normal courses for Church school teachers. It is not all sitting still and being instructed. Their leaders are wise enough to put much of the work on the young people themselves, and the latter respond with a readiness, earnestness and originality which would dispel the gloom of a pessimist. They get up programs for league meetings, use their ingenuity in making effective posters, make prayers which show a wide knowledge of the opportunities for service which lie before the youth of today, and breathe a spirit of genuine devotion.

After dinner comes a rest period of an hour, and then two hours given over to recreation. Then come various informal conferences, and at 6 o'clock all assemble for a short devotional service and listen to heart-searching devotional addresses by Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Alabama. Supper comes at 6:30, and the evenings are given to various matters of special interest. Sometimes it is a model league meeting, arranged by one of the teams into which the conference is divided. Sometimes it is an entertainment put on by one of these teams. Sometimes it is a religious pageant. Sometimes it is a service of stunts or songs gotten up by the groups representing the various States. Or it may be a pow-wow around a big camp fire. It always ends with the reading of the "We Tell 'Em Daily," in which the events and jokes of the day are recorded, and when it is over, everybody, tired and happy, files silently into the chapel for the short, solemn compline or good night service which closes the day.

There are about 192 young people here, representing nearly all the States of the Southland—not a very big number for such a wide territory, but they are representatives of thousands of others in all the parishes of the Episcopal Church in the South in which the young people's movement has gotten under way; and they are here to carry back to their various local groups all the inspiration and ideas and devotion which they can crowd into their hearts and minds, to make the work of the Church for young people and the work of the young people for the Church effective.

Dean Wells, of the Sewanee Divinity School, spoke to the boys on Friday night on the subject of the Ministry, and from the number who crowded around him afterwards to ask questions and to continue the discussion, it was evident that some at least were thinking of it seriously.

What are our young people coming to? What are they thinking about? Here are the sheiks and Shebas in all their wild regalia, enjoying life to the full, thanking God for it all, and tremendously intent on "following the gleam" which will guide them to the fullest and highest service and enable them to enlist other boys and girls in the same holy quest.

It should be added that the officers of this school are:

Director—The Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., Monteagle, Tenn.

Dean—The Rt. Rev. Clinton S. Quin, D. D., Houston, Tex.

Executive Secretary—Miss Gladys M. Fry, New Orleans, La.

Chairman Program Committee—The Rev. Gardner L. Tucker, D. D., Houma, La.

The Eaglesmere Summer Conference for Church Workers.

With a total attendance of one hundred and sixty-three delegates, the third annual Summer Conference for Church Workers, held at Eaglesmere, Pa., July 7 to 14, under the auspices of the Bishop and Department of Religious Education of the Diocese of Harrisburg, was the most successful held thus far. There were thirty-seven parishes and six dioceses represented at the Conference, Harrisburg Diocese leading with twenty-five parishes represented, Pennsylvania with eight, and the Dioceses of Milwaukee, Maryland, Florida, and Sydney, Australia, being represented by one delegate respectively.

Bishop Darlington was the President of the Conference, while the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, O. H. C., acted as chaplain. The courses given were all of a very high order, and the lectures delivered reflect great credit upon the faculty, of which the Rev. Charles Everett McCoy, rector of Trinity Parish, Williamsport, was the Dean. A distinguished Welsh-Australian, Major William Lloyd, a cousin of the Rt. Hon. David Lloyd George, formerly Prime Minister of Great Britain, added much to the interest of the Conference by his lectures on "The Eastern Church" and "Affairs in Turkey," where he has been for some time. Major Lloyd was a guest of Governor Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, a staunch Churchman. A feature of this year's Conference was the ordination of a deacon and priest, held in the beautiful Church of St. John in the Wilderness, Thursday, July 10. Following the ordination, a conference was held for the clergy, attended by twenty-five clergymen. The principal addresses were given by Bishop Darlington and Father Huntington.

The delegates who attended were delighted with the Conference, and all agreed that Eaglesmere is the ideal spot to hold such gatherings. Plans are being made to hold a similar Conference next year, and from all indications it will even surpass this year's. The Eaglesmere Summer Conference now ranks as one of the leading summer conferences of the Church.

News Notes of Interest From the Missionary District of Haiti.

Mrs. Estelle S. Royce, of Berryville, Va., has become the first addition to the staff of workers in Haiti since the consecration of Bishop Carson. Well known to many for her unusually fine work in the Panama Canal Zone, their interest will follow her to her new field. Mrs. Royce resigned from the Isthmian field a year ago, made a brief visit to Haiti on her way to New York, and was so moved by the imperative need of helpers that she volunteered for service upon her return from a long contemplated trip to the Holy Land. Her work will be as directress of social work and will be the opening of an entirely new field for the Church in Haiti.

The Rev. Charles E. Benedict, one of the first fruits of the ministry of him who was then the Rev. Mr. Holly, died at Aux Cayes, Haiti, on July 14, after a long illness, at an advanced age. At a later period in his ministry Bishop Holly referred to him as among "some young Haitians sent as students to the Mission House in Philadelphia" as the direct result of an episcopal visitation by Bishop Burgess, of Maine, in 1866. Mr. Benedict was the first of the Haitian clergy to become a beneficiary of the Church Pension Fund. Among other surviving members of his family, the Rev. Georges E. Benedict, of the Church of Saint Sauveur, Aux Cayes, Haiti, is an honored member of the Haitian clergy.

Plans are being drawn by Mr. Robert T. Walker, of Boston, for a new church at Port au Prince, the cornerstone of which will probably be laid on the fiftieth anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Holly, November 8. By sympathetic resolution the National Council, at its May meeting, expressed the desire of the Church in the United States to assist in commemorating this anniversary, more especially by a better equipment of the Church in Haiti, of which this is the necessary beginning. The National Council authorized Bishop Carson to appeal for special gifts in the amount of $25,000 and gave assurance to the Bishop and other clergy and people of its best wishes for the success of their endeavors to extend the kingdom in the Haitian Republic.

Among recent gifts to the District the Bishop has received three sets of vessels for the Holy Communion, one of which was given by the Church of the Incarnation, New York, and the other two by Dr. William C. Sturgis, Educational Secretary.

The Bishop returned to the District after two months in the States the end of July.

The Journal—the Proces Verbaux—of the first two Convocations held by Bishop Carson has just come from the press and is ready for distribution to those who may desire to have it. It is in French and presents matter that will be of interest to the Church in the United States, especially to those familiar with that language. A card to either the Bishop or the Rev. Edouard C. Jones, Port au Prince, will bring immediate response.

Province of Sewanee: Executive Committee of the Board of Missions.

Wilmington, N. C., July 2, 1924.

To the Clergy of the Province of Sewanee:

My Dear Brethren:

At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the Provincial Board of Missions, after a full and helpful discussion of plans looking to the development of our missionary work, not only in the Province, but also in connection with the Program of the Church as set forth by the National Council, the Chairman and Secretary were requested to write a letter to the clergy of the Province embodying the following recommendations:

First. Holding vestry conferences in parishes, districts and dioceses. At such conferences the Program of the Church would be discussed, and the vestrymen led to realize their responsibility for carrying out the plans of the whole Church.

Second. District organization of the Diocese—Several dioceses have found this District plan most helpful. In each district, made up of two or three counties, a clergyman as chairman and a layman as vice-chairman, might be appointed.

Third. The selection of a "key man" in each parish to represent the diocesan organization.

Fourth. Study by the vestries of Mr. C. A. Tompkins' book, or some similar work on Business Methods in the Church.

Fifth. That the budget portion of the national quota be considered as an obligation of the Diocese, and that deputies to the General Convention be so instructed when elected.

Sixth. The committee also approved, in principle, the plans for the provincial organization of the Diocesan Executive Secretaries, or such officials in each Diocese who perform the duties of the Executive Secretary. It was thought that these men meeting together, preferably at the time of the Synod, would exchange helpful information as to methods in the different dioceses.

The suggestions outlined above are presented for your careful consideration. Some of them could be used in the parish; others must, of course, have the approval of the diocesan authority before they could become effective.

If we have exceeded our authority in making any of the suggestions, please understand that it is not due to officiousness on our part, but that it comes from an honest desire to be helpful.

Trusting that the delegates from the various dioceses will come to the meeting of the Synod in Wilmington this fall, prepared to discuss the suggestions that we respectfully submit, we are,

Yours faithfully,
THOMAS C. DARST,
Chairman.
WARREN KEARNY,
Secretary.

Bishop's House, Diocese of East Carolina, Wilmington, N. C.

Information Requested.

The Committee on Student Affiliations of the Department of Religious Education of the Diocese of Harrisburg acts as a clearing house for information concerning students entering or leaving the Diocese for the purpose of attending school or college. In order that it may properly discharge its duties it requests information concerning students residing in other dioceses who expect to attend any school or college in the Diocese of Harrisburg during the year 1924-25. Information is also desired concerning students whose homes are in the Diocese of Harrisburg who expect to attend educational institutions anywhere.

Any one knowing of students falling in either of these groups is requested to send full information to the Secretary of the Committee, Professor Elton D. Walker, State College, Pa. Please give the student's full name, home address and parish, and the name of the school or college to be attended. This information is desired as promptly as possible so that it may be sent to the rectors concerned by the opening of the fall term.

Healing Mission Conference.

The Society of the Nazarene will hold its annual Mission-Conference in Washington, commencing with services in participating churches on Sunday, September 14, and ending September 19.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

The Laymen's Association of the Rappahannock valley Convocation.

There was a very largely attended meeting of laymen of this Convocation held at St. Margaret's School, Tappahannock, on August 5, an all-day meeting. Some sixty representative men were present from every part of the Convocation. Hon. Rosewell Page and the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., both of Richmond, made addresses before lunch. The evening session was a business one. A full convocational organization was perfected with Robert Beverley, chairman; Hon. James M. Lewis, Vice-Chairman; J. Carson Phillips, Secretary. An Executive Committee of five was appointed as follows: W. H. Wellford, Warsaw; J. Marshall Lewis, Gloucester; Barton Palmer, Christ Church; Walter Wilson, Bowling Green, and B. T. Newton, Hague, Va.

There was an arrangement made and promises of laymen and representatives from practically every church and mission to effect parish, church, and mission organizations throughout the Convocation. Every church and mission, of which there are forty-three, had representatives at the meeting, except four. The meeting was a most enthusiastic and inspiring one, and not a few of the clergy attended. Convocational meetings will be held annually and the local meeting in parishes quarterly. The Association is calculated to do much good, its object being the better education of the laymen in Church work, and the carrying out of the Church's Mission.

The Rev. Samuel A. Wallis, D. D., and Mrs. Wallis, of Alexandria, will sail for Bermuda on August 20. Dr. Wallis will have charge of the Cathedral at Hamilton, Bermuda, for two months, in the absence of the Canon Residentiary, the Rev. Dr. Henry Marriott, in England.

UPPER SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Bishop.

Memorials Presented to St. Andrew's, Greenville.

There has been recently presented to St. Andrew's Parish, Greenville, by the teachers and pupils of the Sunday School, a very handsome brass receiving alms basin in loving memory of Edward Percival Long, the late Superintendent.

The presentation was made by Mr. C. B. Lucas, the present Superintendent, and the rector, the Rev. A. R. Mitchell, received the basin and presented and blessed the gift with appropriate prayers.

There has been ordered from Munich three handsome stained glass windows to be placed in St. Andrew's Church, Greenville, some time in the fall.

One will bear the following inscription:

"In memoriam, Edward Percival Long, Born 21st Dec. 1869, Died 10th Aug. 1923. Vestryman and Sunday-school Superintendent."

The second:

"In memoriam, Valeria B. W. Salas, A generous contributor to this Church."

The third, which will be a circular window, will simply have inscribed, "All Saints," and will be in loving memory of all the members of the parish who have died since the church was organized.

Generous contributions have been made for these windows by friends outside of the parish.

A kind friend will donate a sufficient amount with which to erect a parish house for St. Andrew; this will be in loving memory of E. Percy Long.

A handsome brass receiving alms basin and two brass collection plates, in memory of Eugene Earle Stone and Lydia Croft Stone, was recently presented to St. James' Memorial Church, Greenville, by their son, Dr. T. C. Stone, in behalf of the family.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Interesting Meeting at Blacksburg.

Mrs. John J. Lloyd, who has been visiting her son, the Rev. J. Hubard Lloyd, at Christ Church rectory, spoke, by special request, to the Woman's Auxiliary at its July meeting. She gave a delightful sketch of her work as President of the Junior Auxiliary in Southern Virginia, and its organization and growth. Although the attendance was small, many members being away for the summer, the greatest interest was manifested by those who were so fortunate as to hear Mrs. Lloyd.

The church attendance during the summer season has been most gratifying, as there are quite a number of visitors in Blacksburg.

St. John's, Roanoke.

The Rev. Karl M. Block, D. D., rector of St. John's, is enjoying a vacation of six weeks at the "Log Cabin Cottage," Avalon, New Jersey. During his absence the Rev. Frank Ridout, of Cape Charles, Va., is in charge of the parish. Dr. Block expects to return about September 14.

New Rector at Abingdon.

On July 1 the Rev. Beverley M. Boyd assumed charge of St. Thomas' Church at Abingdon, the Chapel of the Good Shepherd ("the Knobs"), near Abingdon, and St. Paul's at Damascus.

Mr. Boyd graduated from the Virginia Seminary and was ordained Deacon on June 6 of this year. On the following day he was married to Miss Sarah Kemper, of Alexandria, Va.

The parish which is Mr. Boyd's first charge, is one of the oldest and best known in Southwestern Virginia, but has been without a regular rector since the departure of the Rev. L. G. H. Williams in May, 1923. In the meantime it has been supplied at various times by visiting ministers.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D.

The Rev. Bernard I. Bell, D. D., President of St. Stephen's College, was the preacher at Trinity Diocesan Church on Sunday morning, August 2, and in the afternoon of the same day preached the sermon at the open-air service of the Washington Cathedral. At these services on August 9 the preacher was the Rev. John Mockridge, D. D., of Philadelphia.

St. Stephen's Church has inaugurated open-air services to be held every Sunday afternoon during the month of August, under the direction of the Rev. Clyde Brown. These services will be held on the site of the new church at Newton and Sixteenth Streets.

At the Sunset Services held at Holiday House on Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Girls' Friendly Society, the clergy of Washington officiate from time to time. On the first two Sundays in August the sermons were preached by the Rev. Enoch Thompson and the Rev. Meade Bolton MacBryde.

Some Interesting Statistics: The Journal of 1924, containing an account of the proceedings of the Diocesan Convention of Washington, held February 6 and 7, has been completed and issued by the Rev. H. Allen Griffith, Secretary of the Convention.

The report shows some interesting statistics and facts. The Church in Washington owns property to the value of $3,065,000, not including property owned by Diocesan Institutions, or property of the National Cathedral Foundation. Receipts for all purposes in the year amounted to $734,500, of which $70,000 was given for missions and other purposes outside the Diocese. On December 31, 1923, there were in the Diocese 24,000 communicants. Of thirty-five lay readers listed, seven are candidates for orders.

The Diocese of Washington includes Montgomery, Prince Georges, Charles and St. Mary's counties of Maryland, as well as the District of Columbia. Eighty-two separate parishes and congregations are listed.

St. Andrew's, Yonkers.

The Rev. Francis T. Brown, for the past ten years or so rector of St. Andrew's Church, Yonkers, has resigned and will take up special work. He is to be succeeded in September by the Rev. Dr. Theodore Sedgwick, for a decade or thereabouts rector of Calvary Church, New York.

St. Andrew's is a child of St. John's and was built for the most part by the Cochrans, all of whom helped St. John's liberally. The first rector was the present Bishop of Washington, who while rector planned and built Hollywood Inn, a social headquarters for men of Yonkers, projected by the Cochrans. The communicants exceed 1,000 in number. Mr. and Mrs. Brown were formerly workers under Church direction in Japan.

St. Paul's Chapel As a Landmark.

A New York newspaper having written about the Sub-Treasury Building in Wall Street, and its preservation by the government, in spite of the fact that it is no longer to be used to store gold, Bishop Manning writes to the paper, to correct some statements, and speaks thus of St. Paul's Chapel:

"New York has, however, one other incomparable landmark in old St. Paul's Chapel, a few blocks north on Broadway.

This chapel was opened for worship on October 30, 1766, and has been in use ever since. Owing to the fact that Trinity—the mother church—was then in ruins from fire, the newly opened Chapel of St. Paul was used as the parish church throughout the period of the Revolutionary War. The records tell us that 'during the residence of General Washington in New York, and while the headquarters of the American Army were stationed there, he was a regular attendant upon the services, as well as a communicant in the chapel.'

In this venerable building George Washington, accompanied by both houses of Congress, attended the religious service which completed the ceremonies of his inauguration as first President of the United States. The service on that occasion was conducted by Samuel Provost, rector of Trinity Church and first Bishop of New York. At the service in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of St. Paul's Chapel in 1916, at which I had the honor of preaching the sermon, the same flag hung from the pulpit which was carried before George Washington as he marched from the old Federal Hall to the chapel on the day of his inauguration."

Tercentenary of Education.

It is announced that Religious Education is to have part in a national exposition to be held in New York during National Education Week, falling in November next. This week and this exposition are to mark the tercentenary of schooling in this country, and is arranged by the Department of the Interior, the National Education Association and the American Legion. Already offices are opened to start in the preparations. Monday is to be Constitution day, Tuesday patriotism, Wednesday teachers, Thursday to consider literacy and its lack, Friday physical education, Saturday communities and their needs, and Sunday religion. The exposition will show the progress made in America in education of all kinds, and the new ideas in education, which include doing things, as well as just knowing things.

Death of Mrs. Carmichael.

Mrs. Lucilla Carmichael, widow of the Rev. James Carmichael, D. D., died at the home of her granddaughter, Mrs. David R. Murchison, Wilmington, on Wednesday, July 23.

Mrs. Carmichael was born in Fredericksburg, Va., in 1837, the daughter of John H. Wallace and Mary Gordon Wallace. She is survived by one brother, Judge A. Wellington Wallace, of Fredericksburg, and a son, George Carmichael, of Franklinton, N. C., and her granddaughter, Mrs. Murchison, wife of Dr. David R. Murchison, of Wilmington.

Possessed of a gentle charming dignity, characteristic of the women of the "Old South," deeply religious and lovable in character, Mrs. Carmichael during her life in Wilmington attracted to her a host of friends and admirers who sincerely loved her and who greatly deplore her death.—Wilmington News-Dispatch.

First Summer School Proves Great Success.

A venture of faith which has proved highly successful in Mississippi was the Summer Training School held at All Saints' College, Vicksburg, these past two weeks. While small in registration as compared with other summer schools, this first attempt at an annual diocesan school, from the standpoint of faculty and personnel, was the equal of any in the Province of Sewanee, in which so many dioceses are introducing similar projects.

All Saints' College proved a most delightful place for the school. Its spacious building, capable of housing quite a large number of students, and its beautiful grounds, situated in the heart of the wonderful National Park at Vicksburg, has commended itself to diocesan representatives as possibly the permanent meeting place for many gatherings during the holiday season. Miss Newton, the principal of the college, and Miss Todd, the housekeeper, both gave up part of their vacation time to look after the physical comforts of the members of the Summer School.

The school had for its faculty Bishop Bratton, who, assisted by the Rev. J. H. Boosey, gave the course on "The Prayer Book"; Miss Mabel Lee Cooper, who taught "The Pupil," "Principles of Christian Nurture," and gave a short lecture course on "How to Tell Stories"; the Rev. DuBose Murphy, who taught "The Bible" and "How to Train the Devotional Life" (his own book); Miss Mary Bell Conway, who, in addition to her duties as registrar, taught "The Teacher," and handled the Manual Work class of the C. S. S. L. (Miss Conway is President of the C. S. S. L. in the Diocese); the Rev. C. A. Ross, director of the school and chairman of the Department of Religious Education of the Diocese, who gave courses in "Church School Administration," "Church School Ideals" and "C. S. S. L. Administration"; the Rev. W. A. Jonnard, who held the Young People's Leaders and Councillors Conferences, and taught two courses of Christian Nurture; and Miss Josephine Thames, who assisted in the Young People's Work and taught a Christian Nurture course. Miss Frances Withers was to have been present, but an accident kept her from serving as a member of the faculty.

In addition to these regular ten-hour classes, a three days' course on the Conference Method in Christian Unity was given by the Rev. Floyd Tompkins, Jr., and evening lectures by Mr. Tompkins and the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker, D. D., Field Secretary of the Province.

A new feature of Summer Conference work was the holding each night of what was termed a "Practical Application Conference," in which questions were asked or various problems in the parish or Diocese were brought up by members of the school, and answered or discussed by the staff.

Bishop Bratton and Bishop Green were both present, and acted as chaplains for the school. Early communion, sunset meditations and a good-night service were held daily, and on Sundays the Conference attended services in a body at Trinity and Christ Church.

Recreation, which formed a big feature of the Conference, was looked after by Mr. Jonnard, and Miss Thames, and ran the gamut from a watermelon party, an indoor track meet, and a faculty party to a boat trip up the Mississippi River, and daily swimming parties at the Fair Grounds pool, conveniently located at the foot of the hill near the college.

During the course of the school a telegram from Sewanee announced the election of Miss Josephine Thames as Provincial President of the Young People's Service League, and the event was celebrated. Miss Thames is the President of the Y. P. S. L. in Mississippi also.

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. Alfred H. Stubbs.

The funeral service for the Rev. Alfred H. Stubbs, who died on Saturday, August 2, at the Mission Hospital after an illness of ten days, was conducted on Monday at Trinity Church, Asheville, at 2 o'clock. The Bishop, assisted by several of the clergy of the Diocese, conducted the service at the church and cemetery. Officers of the Cyrene Commandery and Knights Templar, to both of which Masonic orders he belonged, were the pall-bearers. The services of these Masonic orders were used at the grave.

Dr. Stubbs was born in New Brunswick, N. J., August 22, 1841, the son of the Rev. Alfred Stubbs and Emily Stebbins Houghton. He was a graduate of Rutgers College, with the degree of M. A., and of the General Theological Seminary of New York City. He was ordained deacon in 1864 and priest in 1865 by Bishop Odenheimer, of New Jersey.

He held important positions in Church work in the Diocese of New Jersey, Connecticut, Iowa, Mississippi and Albany, N. Y., in succession. In 1867, while rector of Trinity Church, Davenport, Iowa, he married Ella V. Huntweiser, of Davenport, who died in 1896.

From New York he moved to North Carolina in 1881 and was rector of St. Andrew's Church, Greensboro, until 1894, when he moved to Asheville and became warden of the Ravenscroft Associate Mission, which position he held till death. Dr. Stubbs died in service, attending to his duties when he was taken to the hospital.

He was the oldest priest in the Diocese of Western North Carolina, having been identified with this division of the Church since its organization as the Missionary District of Asheville in 1895.

He was Treasurer of the Diocese and a member of the Board of Trustees and of the Executive Committee, and was chairman of the examining chaplains of the Diocese and as warden of the Ravenscroft Associate Mission was called upon to hold services each Sunday.

He is survived by two sons and two daughters.

EASTON.

Rt. Rev. G. W. Davenport, D. D., Bishop.

What a Missionary Spirit Did for One Parish.

It is astonishing what a missionary spirit will do for an individual or a parish. One whose vision is enlarged so that he sees the world and his fellowmen from Jesus' point of view cannot be slothful or indifferent. In the past sixteen months a change has taken place in St. Peter's Church, Salisbury, Md., which has surprised the people themselves more than any one else.

From a congregation that for years has been at a standstill, struggling to keep its head above water, making no effort to meet its missionary or Nation-Wide Campaign apportionments, it has suddenly developed into one of the leading parishes of the Diocese, having more than paid its Nation-Wide Campaign apportionment for 1923 and having pledges for more than its 1924 amount, paying its rector nearly twice what it was paying two years ago, having put its property all in first class condition, having just completed and dedicated a handsome new parish house costing over $50,000.

This parish house is a model of efficiency in its arrangement to meet the practical needs of the parish, the social life of the young people and the community interests of the large population around it in a down-town center.

Within twelve months the rector, the Rev. H. F. Kloman, presented sixty-eight for confirmation, thirty-seven of them being men, and another class is in preparation to be presented in the early fall. The Sunday school has increased over 300 per cent, including a large Bible class of the leading men of the community, attending regularly every Sunday morning at 9:45. A Girls' Friendly Society has been organized and doing effective work with a membership of seventy-eight. In short, there is a general and sustained interest throughout the entire parish that promises big things for the future, as well as maintaining effective work at present.

When men and women can only get outside of self and see from the Master's point of view and lend themselves to His leadership, there is no limit to the possibilities. While this development in this particular parish may seem unusual, it may be said to be rather typical of the spirit working in what has been considered the weak and decadent Diocese of Easton under the splendid leadership of its present Bishop.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Coadjutor.

New Parish House Opened.

The parish house of Grace Church, Honesdale, the Rev. Glen B. Walter, rector, was opened auspiciously a few weeks ago. There is a large auditorium for Church school and public gatherings; there are a number of rooms, furnished by the different church organizations—the Daughters of the King, G. F. S., Woman's Auxiliary, etc. There is also a thoroughly equipped kitchen and dining-room. Much praise was given to the young rector for his zeal and energy in accomplishing this long-felt want. The best is yet to come—the house is paid for and they have started an endowment fund, amounting to $3,000.

Improvements in the Church Home for Children.

The Church Home for Children, Jonestown, Mr. Joseph S. Wagstaff in charge, has made most commendable progress during the past year. Additional land was bought—six acres—so that now no one can block the house in. The buildings were painted and repaired. A fine library was installed and the children are becoming steady readers. Some blooded cattle were presented and more will be bought, so that the best of milk and butter will be available for the children. To get away from "institutional appearances" the long, narrow tables with oil cloth covers and benches for seats were cast out and round dining tables have taken their places with table cloths, napkins, silverware, nice dishes instead of tin cups, steel knives and forks and brass spoons. It is a great pleasure to see the children eat—just like the children eat in our homes. Hereafter when they leave the Home they will not have that awkward and nervous feeling that seemed to say they were poorly taught and ill-mannered. This summer additional bath-tubs and showers will be installed. Also a chancel will be built to the chapel or room used as a chapel. Then as they go out from the Home our churches will not seem strange to them. At present there is only a rectangular room with no altar rail, chancel or sanctuary. The Rev. Mr. Philbrook, rector of St. Luke's Church, Lebanon, has promised the chancel and sanctuary as a gift from his congregation.

Great credit is due Mr. and Mrs. Wagstaff for the splendid work they are doing in really giving the children a Home and love.

Bishop Talbot writes that on Wednesday afternoon, July 23, the D. D. degree was conferred on him at the Steel-domain Theatre, Oxford. There were several hundred people there, as quite a number of students received degrees. The Bishop's was the only D. D. degree conferred.

The Bishop preaches at Teuksbury Abbey August 10; on August 17 at Westminster Abbey; on August 24 at Holy Trinity Parish.

He will return on the Steamship Pittsburgh, sailing from Cherbourg, France, on September 6, going to Halifax and from there to Yarmouth, where he will spend some time with the Rev. and Mrs. Leonard Haslam. He expects to return to the Diocese about October 1.

Restitution.

There is a sea, a great sea,
Beyond the farthest line,
Where all my ships that went astray,
And all my dreams of yesterday,
And all the things that were to be,
Are mine!

There is a land, a great land,
Beyond the setting sun,
Where every task in which I quailed,
And all wherein my courage failed,
Where all the good my spirit planned,
Is done!

There is a hope, a great hope,
Within my heart instilled,
That if undaunted on I sail,
The guiding star shall never pale,
But shine within my labor's scope,
Fulfilled!

And there's a tide, a great tide,
Flowing toward a goal,
That sweeps by every humble shore,
And at its fullest ebbs no more,
And on that final swell shall ride,
My soul!

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

The Sop.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

Williams' Harmony of the Gospels gets stubbornly muddled here, as do others. Everybody transposes everything to suit theories. We follow Gardner, who seems to have no theory.

Our Lord's speech after the foot-washing is a mosaic of quotations from rabbinical sources. The washing itself was probably a fulfillment of Ezek. 16:9. Next came a bit of Passover ritual. By custom ironclad the ruler of a Passover feast gave a bit of meat or of bread dipped in gravy from the platter in front of him to the more important guests, beginning with the guest of honor. Now Judas, by token of his place next our Lord, was guest of honor. For sheer irony the situation is inimitable. Our Lord went on: "But behold the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table. And truly the Son of man goes as it is written of him; but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed. Good were it for that man if he had never been born."

This was a definite statement that one of the twelve should betray Him.

Naturally, all thought of Judas; for Judas was a thief. Two of the eleven were armed with swords and all had the long Galilean knife. They were not, however, quite certain. They began to discuss among themselves which of them should do this thing.

Were this a place to halt we would discuss the grammar of the phrase "that man" in our Lord's saying. In the English it seems to refer to Judas. In the Greek that is not so certain. It may mean that it would have been good for Jesus if Judas had not been born. Universalists say it does. The question of the Scriptural proof of Eternal Punishment hangs on that bit of grammar. Here are thirteen men. Their Leader tells them that He is about to die, betrayed by one of them. He seems able to foil any betrayal by moving from place to place, so they are not unduly disturbed. They do not realize that the betrayal is successful and will cause his death. They go on eating. This heartlessness would be terrible if it were intended. The Leader sees that they do not realize, and repeats solemnly, slowly and quietly. They stop eating and look at each other. They are armed. They love their Leader. Eleven are innocent, one guilty, but which one? At last one who knows himself innocent asks the question, "Lord, is it I?" By word or sign the Lord answers in the negative, or there would be no motive for the next man's asking. As it is, the next man meditates a moment, then asks the same question, "Lord, is it I?" After that each must ask. To be silent would be to confess himself the traitor. The matter proceeds slowly, because each must think, and tremendous emotional tension forces deliberation. The question goes around the board, each asking narrowing by one the group in which the traitor lies concealed. No scene in any play approaches this in dramatic power. The device seems never borrowed by any playwright; perhaps because, in its enormous wealth of material, the story so little emphasizes it; perhaps for a better reason. The men half rise as, slowly, very slowly, the question falls from the lips of each. Two of the men have short, heavy swords under their cloaks. They make sure that these are clear.

"Now there was leaning on Jesus' bosom one of the disciples whom Jesus loved. Simon Peter beckoned him that he should ask who it should be of whom he spoke." John then, lying on Jesus' breast, whispered to him, "Lord, who is it?" Jesus whispered, "He to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it." And when He had dipped the bit of bread He gave it to Judas of Kerioth, the son of Simon, and said aloud to them all: "It is one of the twelve that dippeeth with Me in the dish." This narrowed the matter to Judas and John. Judas said:

"Master, is it I?"

"Thou sayest it," answered our Lord softly, and then aloud, "What thou doest, do quickly." He, then having received the sop, went immediately out; and it was night.

This exit, planned and ordered by our Lord, was probably necessary to save Judas' life. The answer, "Thou sayest it," was given in a whisper, heard only by John. The ten merely saw our Lord give Judas the customary bit of bread dipped in sauce. Judas received it and immediately asked, "Is it I?" To this our Lord returned a murmured answer, then added an order which took Judas out of the room. Some of them thought, because Judas carried the purse, that our Lord said, "Buy what we need for the feast," or ordered him to give something to the poor. No one interfered, because he had the Master's orders. Without them they would have stopped him until there had been time to find the traitor. A few minutes more, another question or two, and they would have identified him. Had that been done there would have been no betrayal. Judas, as it was, lived only a few hours. Without our Lord's intervention he would probably have lived fewer minutes.

The apostles were not the only ones withheld. Powers higher than human were gathered around that banquet. There were watchers who could and would have stopped Judas but for our Lord's order. This is as certainly implied in the narrative as is the fact that the room had four walls or the house a roof. No man understands Passion Night who forgets the angels. Judas, to retire unmolested and do his work, needed our Lord's command to save him from other swords than Peter's.

After the sop Satan entered into Judas. It was recorded that Satan had entered into him the day before; and our Lord, speaking of him a year before, had said, "One of you is a devil." The possibilities are intermittent possession of increasing degrees of possession. We touch here laws of the realm of darkness. Men who doubt a realm of darkness are scornful. Theologians should recall that no logical explanation of our Lord's life is possible if it leaves out Satan. The man of simple faith accepts the record.

If intermittent possession be the explanation the pathos of the situation is exquisite. During the intervals when Judas was not possessed, our Lord had fought a losing fight for his soul; or, if that soul were lost already, a sadder fight still, to give him all those opportunities of salvation which a soul not lost would take. Now the Prince of the Powers of Darkness took him, jeering, and they went out together. It is not for nothing that St. John records again the information already given elsewhere that it was dark.

Our Lord's order, "What thou doest, do quickly," is capable of perversion. No sane person doubts that He was expressing that wish we have all felt for prompt grappling with some evil foreseen and inevitable. Minds a little insane could take it as justification for Judas' treachery. Judas, for instance, would undoubtedly have plead that our Lord knew his plan and endorsed it. So clear is this possibility that our Lord foresaw and forestalled it by the explanation: "It were better for that man that he had never been born."

This last is, to most minds, the sufficient disproof of universalism. If all are saved, even after eons of agony, the time will come when, on the whole, it is good for even Judas to have been born. Therefore, say close thinkers, it is not possible that Judas should be saved; he went out into the darkness lost eternally.

Opportunity.

The great problem that we face in this twentieth century is as to whether the spiritual powers that come from God, that can dominate the souls of men, can be brought to bear upon our modern civilization quickly enough to offset the terrific tide of rising power which modern science has placed in our hands. There are great days before you. There are greater opportunities in the spiritual fields than were ever faced by people since this old world started.

They talk about the good old days and the opportunities that people faced. You have a bigger opportunity than any people ever faced. What are you going to do with it? Will you turn your back upon that opportunity? Will you say, "Oh, no, I do not want that?" Will you look upon the Foreign Mission field as it is today, with nations rising out of their lethargy and looking around to see whether they will go toward God or away from God? Will you turn from that majestic and wonderful opportunity to shape the next thousand years of human history, and put your life in something that doesn't count?

God save you from putting it where, when you come to the sunset and the evening star and look backward across your life, you will feel that you put it on second-rate things that did not matter, after all! God save you from feeling, when your chance is over, like the old king, "I played the fool! I erred exceedingly!"

God has a place for you. He is ready to lead you to it, if you will let Him. He will want you to prepare for it. If you give Him His chance, and go into it, you will build a strong enduring bit of God's architecture that will last through long centuries to come. Go where He wants you to go! Do what He wants you to do. Whatever less vision dims your eyes, never let grow dim the vision of the leadership of the great Christ, your Master, your Lord, your Saviour, the Son of God, who leads you on to build according to the purpose of God, your Maker.—A. W. Beavan.

In Darkness.

Gene Scott Wright.

Master dear, I miss Thee so,
Through many a maze Thy Spirit free
In other days has guided me,
But now I know not where to go.

I need Thy smile to light my dark;
Groping, I reach to touch Thy hands;
Perchance my Saviour near me stands,
And my dull eyes but fail to mark.

I dare not walk this path alone.
O Master, take my groping hand,
And through this dim, uncertain land
Guide all my steps till night is gone—

Till night is gone, and endless day
Shall light the path Thy servants tread,
And we, like Thee, risen from the dead,
Triumphant walk the perfect Way.

Roots That Grow in the Dark.

As the clergyman entered the room Clara looked up with a wry smile. "You've caught me now, Dr. Smythe; I'm tied by the leg and can't run. I suppose you think it's a judgment because I've stayed away from church so much lately?"

Dr. Smythe laughed and sat down. "I've missed you. I miss you now. I hope you are getting well fast."

"Slowly," she corrected him, "and I can't stand it. I'm terribly bored when I'm not doing things. There are hundreds of things that I want to do this very minute, and I'm here for six weeks. It's awful—just wasted time."

"How beautiful your lilies are," Dr. Smythe remarked irrelevantly. "What a tall, straight stalk and wonderful white crown of bloom! It takes strong roots to bear a blossom like that." He laughed. "Some one brought me a jar, like that with water and pebbles and bulbs putting out green shoots. I stood it in the sunshine and rejoiced in the quick growth until some one told me that unless I let it root in the dark it would never have strength enough to flower."

"Did you put it in the dark?" Clara asked politely.

He nodded. "I kept it in the dark until the white roots clamped the pebbles in every direction. The shoots didn't grow in the dark, but when they came into the sunlight again they leaped into flower because they had strength behind them. But my blossoms were weak compared with yours. I had waited too long to strike roots, you see."

Clara glanced from the doctor's face to her bowl of lilies and back again to him. "Is that a parable?" she asked.

From his pocket he drew a worn Testament and opened it at Ephesians. "That ye, being rooted and grounded in love," he read, "'might be filled with all the fulness of God' and 'grow up into Him in all things, which is the head, even Christ.' Quite a long way for even the best of us to grow, isn't it? And, you see, we can't do it without roots."

"And roots have to grow in the dark?" inquired Clara.

"The sunshine often keeps us too busy to grow roots," he replied.

"It makes a pretty good parable," she conceded. "'Rooted in love'; and love means God, I suppose."

"St. John thought so."

"Rooted in God," she mused; "that means drawing all your strength from Him, doesn't it? I don't believe I know Him well enough."

"It is easy to know Him," he said and smiled. "There's the Bible, you know. I see one on your book shelves; may I get it?"

"I've been too busy to read it lately," Clara admitted, "but if I'm put in the dark just to grow roots, I'd better begin, hadn't I?"

The clergyman nodded toward the lily. "With roots like that, think what flowers you will carry!" he said.—Youth's Companion.

A Leper Idyll.

Recently Mr. Arthur Hanson, of Shanghai, visited the leper plant of the Southern Presbyterian Mission at Kwangju, Korea, and afterwards sent the inclosed lines of appreciation, as well as assuming the support of one of the sad little leper girls by the roadside:

She stood outside the settlement,
Her eyes bedimmed with tears,
A little outcast leper girl
Of very tender years.

I sought the keeper of the gate
And paid a trifling fee:
It purchased Paradise for her,
And even more for me.

For as she passed within the gate
She looked at me and smiled,
And taught me just what heaven meant—

Our Assets.

Lincoln C. Cummings.

Most of us ordinary humans are brought up to regard what we get and what we have, as the measure of the man and our most important asset, as well as tangible proof of capacity and success.

But is it not true that more important than any such success is the question of how we use these blessings: that what we choose as a standard for attainment is more important than what we see, even though it be a large bank balance?

So then, it is only what we are, and not what we may seem, that counts: our words may seem fair and good, but are they true and do they blossom into action?

The practical measure of what we really are is then what we do and not what we dream: what we give and not what we get: how we live—and not what we pray!

Truth and opportunity do not live in a world apart, but right here in our midst and in the human heart and a thousand good deeds are waiting to be done: and the real measure of every man, the tangible proof of his character and attainments, is his unselfish contribution of himself and what he has, to the great fund of human kindness!

It Depends On the Man.

There are two kinds of men in the world: those who sail and those who drift: those who choose the ports to which they will go, and skillfully and boldly shape their course across the seas with the wind or against it, and those who let winds and tides carry them where they will. The men who sail in due time arrive; those who drift often cover greater distances and face far greater perils, but they never make port.

The men who sail know where they want to go and what they want to do; they do not wait on fortune or favorable currents; they depend on themselves and expect no help from circumstances.

No man becomes great by accident. A man gets what he pays for, in character, in work, and in energy. There are few really fine things which he cannot get if he is willing to pay the price. Men fail, as a rule, because they are not willing to pay the price of the things they want. They are not willing to work hard enough, to prepare thoroughly enough, to put themselves heartily into what they are doing.

The only road to advancement is to do your work so well that you are always ahead of the demands of your position. Keep ahead of your work and it will push your fortunes for you.

Our employers do not decide whether we shall stay where we are or go on and up. We decide that matter ourselves.—Hamilton Wright Mabie.

"Open mine eyes, that I may see
More beauty, blessed Lord, in Thee;
Unstop mine ears, that I may hear
Thy voice in accents soft and clear.
Keep Thou my body, spirit, soul,
Completely 'neath Thy blest control,
And fill me with Thy fulness, Lord;
Then Thou alone shalt be adored."

For the Young Folks

The Farm Child's Lullaby.

Oh, the little bird is rocking in the cradle of the wind,

And it's bye, my little wee one, bye;
The harvest all is gathered and the pippins all are binned;

Bye, my little wee one, bye;
The little rabbit's hiding in the golden shock of corn,

The thrifty squirrel's laughing bunny's idleness to scorn;

You are smiling with the angels in your slumber; smile till morn;
So it's bye, my little wee one, bye.

There'll be plenty in the cellar, there'll be plenty on the shelf!

Bye, my little wee one, bye;
There'll be goodly store of sweetings for a dainty little elf;

Bye, my little wee one, bye;
The snow may be a-flying o'er the meadow and the hill,

The ice has checked the chatter of the little laughing rill,
But in your cozy cradle you are warm and happy still;

So bye, my little wee one, bye.

Why, the Bob White thinks the snowflake is a brother to his song;

Bye, my little wee one, bye;
And the chimney sings the sweeter when the wind is blowing strong;

Bye, my little wee one, bye;
The granary's overflowing, full is cellar, crib and bin,

The wood has paid its tribute and the axe has ceased its din;

The winter may not harm you when you're sheltered safe within;

So bye, my little wee one, bye.

Charity Is Initiated.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Max loved to tease—and no one better than his cousin Charity, for she never tattled and was always full of fun and good-natured. Max lived in a village and knew all about flowers, weeds and trees. Animals were as familiar to him as the sky overhead. Charity lived in a city of pavements and apartment houses. The big open country was like an undiscovered land to her, until she came to visit in Golden Rule Lane. She and Max wandered miles together, and at his scores of jokes on her Charity always smiled—after her scare was over. On one of their walks they came to a steep hill covered with trees and shrubs and slippery pine needles. Charity had all she could do, leaping from tree to tree and skidding about the green sliding rink Nature had made. But Max was very sure-footed. From his pocket he took a twisted nail and lightly placed it on Charity's shoulder.

"Oh, look at that worm, Charity!" he called.

Charity clung to a tree, her face pale as she turned her head about. "Oh-h-h!" she screamed, and shrinking her shoulders together, the nail bounded to the earth. But she had lost her footing and slid down the incline until she finally scraped against a tree. "Ouch!" she cried again.

Max was laughing lustily. "It was only a nail, silly!" he called.

But Charity examined her knee, wiping it off with her handkerchief.

"What is it? Did you hurt yourself?" The boy felt a pang of remorse as he hurried down to his small cousin. "Blood! you skinned your knee!"

"It is only a bruise, silly!" Charity smiled in return. She wrapped her handkerchief about the knee and got up.

"You're a game little sport, if you are silly!" exclaimed Max admiringly.

But Charity was too trusting. Coming to a bush of burdocks her cousin pretended to press his hands about them.

"Just squeeze 'em tight, Charity, and see how soft they feel!" he suggested. "But you have to hold 'em close."

With an interested smile Charity caught a cluster of the prickly burrs in her own soft hand and a hundred little prickles pressed into her touch. She winced, yet laughed.

"I am a silly to do as you tell me!" "You are," retorted Max, "but a game silly."

"What is that nest?" Charity ran over to a long hanging cone that looked like a bird's nest.

"If you would touch it you would sure find out!" Max seemed to hesitate. Charity half raised her hand. Max added quickly, "Better not; that's a wasp's nest!"

The girl bounded away from it like a deer. Max loved to see her run from anything she feared, bugs, gentle animals, all the strange things Charity never knew in the city. Even the quiet dark frightened her after the bright lights and noise of the city. But though Charity had these foolish fears, real pain, like the bruised knee or any hurt, never made her really cry. Max did not understand this. He could shed tears over cuts and sores and all kinds of pain. He admired Charity even while he teased her.

And they had a good time together. The country boy told Charity many interesting things she never knew before. She learned of different trees, shrubs and flowers. They picked berries, ate birch bark and made baskets from the prickly burdocks.

"Oh, I want some of those cherries!" exclaimed Charity; "don't you, Max?"

He looked up at a tall bush, covered with fruit, about the size and color of cherries. A sly smile stole over his face. "Want some choke cherries?"

"Yes, don't you?" Charity returned eagerly.

"Not I! Help yourself. I'm too full of berries."

Max watched as Charity made a wry face over the first bite. She was fond of sour things, however.

"Good!" she exclaimed, and put three or four more in her mouth. Her expression changed, and she twisted her lips.

"Have some more?" asked Max, and he pulled down a big branch for her.

After a few more cherries Charity's face twisted up. Her lips screwed and the inside of her mouth seemed to pucker up tight. Max knew the cherries were harmless and offered her more. It was fun to watch her pucker her face. Redder it grew and suddenly Charity gasped for breath. Then Max became alarmed. He began pounding on her back, while she turned from red to purple.

"I'll get some water!" cried he, and started towards a brook.

Charity shook her head and held out her arm, coughing for breath. But Max wheeled about and started off. Suddenly he stopped short. There before him coiled a rattlesnake, just ready to spring. Max turned as white as Charity had ever done. Then a stone came whizzing through the air and hit the rattler square on the head. It doubled up in pain. Suddenly Max was rushed through the woods, hurled along by Charity. For fully five minutes the two ran, until Charity finally stopped and the boy gasped.

"You're all right again?"

"Silly, I just choked on a cherry pit."

"It was what is called a choke cherry," said Max, shame-facedly. "That's the last trick I'll ever play on you, Charity. You saved my life when you pulled me away from that rattler!"

"I had to throw the stone and then pull!" Charity smiled, her face smooth again, "for my choking on that choke cherry choked by telling you he was there!"

Flower Dance and Shower Dance.

M. L. G.

All the little Flower Ladies dance with measure slow and stately;
While the breezes blow soft music, see! they bend and bow sedately
First to left and then to right,
Oh! It is a pretty sight!
Waving fans and shaking ruffles—surely they enjoy it greatly.

But the little Shower Ladies, tumbling from the twigs and branches,
Rolling down the window-pane, go hurry-scurry to their dances;
Then in every pool and puddle,
How they leap and bounce and bubble!
For their only rule is this, that each shall dance just as she fancies.

The Big Bells.

Robert Staples had just finished reading the inscription on the Liberty Bell, "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof," a picture of which he held the while in his hand.

"From this picture of it," he said, turning to his Uncle Richard, who was sitting at the library table, writing, "the Liberty bell must be the largest bell in the world."

Mr. Lockwood laid down his pen and stamped ready for mailing the letter which he had just finished.

"No," he said, smiling, "it isn't."

Robert looked up inquiringly.

"But one couldn't be much larger, could it, than the Liberty Bell?" he asked, patriotically. "See, Uncle Richard," holding up the picture in his hand. "This is what I call pretty big!"

"It's but a tea-bell, my boy," and Mr. Lockwood deliberately pushed back his chair, "compared with the Tsarine Kolokol, or Queen of Bells."

"It is!" exclaimed Robert, incredulously.

"Yes."

"My! but I'd like to see it then," declared Robert. "Is it?"

"In this country?" anticipated Uncle Richard. "No; it's in Russia. This bell—the largest in the world—was for a second time recast by the order of the Empress Anna, in 1733. It weighs the enormous amount of one hundred and ninety-three tons."

"I don't suppose the Kolokol is cracked, as the Liberty Bell is," said Robert.

"No; but a large piece was broken out of the Queen of Bells," replied Uncle Richard, "in the year 1737, before the bell was removed from the mould. A fire broke out in the structure over the great bell, and the people, in their anxiety lest it be destroyed, hurried and poured water on the mould, thus unwittingly breaking out a piece of the very bell, which they were so desirous of protecting.

"The Kolokol was not taken from the mould in which it was cast, until the year 1836, and then by the order of Czar Nicholas I."

"Is it rung with a rope?" asked Robert, wonderingly.

"No; it was never suspended," replied Mr. Lockwood, "but was placed on an octagonal pedestal of granite.

"The largest hanging bell in the world is the Mingun Bell, or Great Bell of Mandalay. This immense bell weighs eighty tons."

"I'd like to hear it ring," declared Robert. "One can possibly hear it for miles."

"The next largest bell is also in Russia, in the old capital Moscow," added Uncle Richard. "The Russian peasants call it 'Bolshoi'—the 'Big.' Its weight is sixty-three tons, and it is suspended in the famous church of St. Ivan, unless it has been destroyed by the revolutionists in these past years when we in other lands do not really know what all has been happening. The Queen of Bells also may have been destroyed."

"Does Russia have most of the big bells?" and Robert laid on the library table the picture of the Liberty Bell, which he had been studying.

"No; China has many large and noted bells. The great bell of Peking is twenty feet high and eleven feet in diameter and weighs only one ton less than does the St. Ivan bell.

"Then Japan is not wanting in big bells. One of these colossal bells is to be found in Kioto, and it weighs sixty-three tons.

"The Chinese and Japanese bells are not rung by clappers, as are our bells, but by long poles, usually struck by priests.

"The largest bell in Europe, outside of Russia, is in Vienna, in the famous old church of St. Stephen. It is very much smaller than the other bells I have mentioned. This bell weighs only eighteen tons—rather too large, however, to be rung in the hand, to call one to dinner."

"I should say so," laughed Robert.

"Among other large bells," continued Uncle Richard, "is 'Great Paul,' in St. Paul's London. Then there is 'Big Ben' in the clock tower of the House of Parliament. 'Big Ben' weighs sixteen and one-half tons. This was once cracked and had to be recast. Two other big bells are 'Great Peter,' in York, Eng., and 'Great Tom,' the large bell at Oxford."

"Well, if the Liberty Bell isn't so large as the others, Uncle Richard," said Robert, proudly, "it has meant a good deal more to the world than they have, I'm sure."

"Yes," laughed his uncle, "and it must surely be louder sounding than all the others, for we know its 'ringing' in 1776 has now been 'heard' quite around the world."—Adelbert Caldwell.

Missy.

Once upon a time Alice and Dorothy lived one summer in a camp. They had a great, big, white tent and just outside the tent was the great, big, blue ocean. Inside the tent were four cots and a big bureau, where their mamma kept their going-to-church clothes.

One day Alice said to Dorothy, "Oh, Dorothy, see what I've found."

And Dorothy said, "Oh, a black kitten!"

And mamma said, "Sure enough! A black kitten!"

Alice said, "What shall we call it?"

Papa said, "Well, we don't know where it came from; let's call it 'Mystery.'"

So they called the little black kitten Mystery; but that took a long time to say, so that finally they called it Missy.

Missy was the nicest cat you ever saw—jet black and so playful that every one loved her.

Now, when it was time to go home, papa said, "What shall we do with Missy? We can't take her home that long distance on the car, and we can't leave her here. What shall we do?"

Just then Mrs. Gibb, the fisherman's wife, came along and said, "I'll keep Missy for you. We need a cat and she's so nice and black, I'd love to have her."

So they put Missy into a market basket and Mrs. Gibb started for home.

But, by and by, what should they see running up the path but Missy. She ran into the tent and under a bed and refused to come out. Soon Mrs. Gibb came back and said, "Missy jumped out of the basket. But when you're gone I guess she'll be glad to come with me. I'll come back again then," and Mrs. Gibb went home.

Papa and mamma and Alice and Dorothy all packed up their clothes. Mamma took nice clean white dresses out of the bureau for the little girls, and packed all the shoes and sandals in the bottom drawer. Then they went outside to help take down the tent. Pretty soon the man came with the wagon to take everything away. Mamma locked up the bureau and gave the key to papa and they were all ready to start home.

They stopped off at grandma's for supper, and when they reached home they found everything there ahead of them. The tent was all folded up, the cots all tied together, and the bureau was in the lower hall.

Mamma said, "I think I'm too tired to unpack the things tonight. Let's leave them until tomorrow."

"All right," said papa, "we will."

"Can't I have my blue bedroom slippers?" asked Alice.

"Oh, yes!" said mamma. "They're in the bottom drawer."

So papa gave Alice the key and she unlocked the drawer. But instead of taking out the blue bedroom slippers, what do you suppose she took out? Missy, all curled among the shoes and fast asleep. She had jumped into the drawer when mamma's back was turned and had gone that long distance in the drawer. And she hadn't made a sound all the way. You see, she loved papa and mamma and Alice and Dorothy, and had made up her mind to go home with them, and she did.—Christian Observer.

Betty and Bee.

"Betty, I wish that you would run over to Mrs. Black's and get that spool of thread that she promised me," said Betty's mother.

Betty looked up from her book, frowning. "Why can't Bee go?" she said. "Bee isn't doing anything, and I'm in the most interesting place in my book."

"It will take you only a little while, and Bee has done more than her share today," replied her mother gently.

"I'll go," Bee announced. "I want to see Tabby's new kittens, anyway." Before her mother could object Bee was out the door and running swiftly across the lawn. Betty curled up contentedly over her book, pretending not to see the look of reproach that her mother gave her.

A few days later daddy surprised them by saying that he was going to spend a week in the city, and that one of the girls could go with him. "It won't be all fun, though," he warned them. "Aunt Alice isn't well, and we shall have to be as helpful as we can. I want some one who will dry the dishes, make her own bed, keep things tidy wherever she is and never refuse to do anything that Aunt Alice asks."

"O daddy, do take me!" cried Betty. "I love Aunt Alice, and I'll do whatever she asks me to do."

"How about you?" asked daddy, turning to where Bee stood, flushed with hope, but silent. Her look was answer to his question.

"Well, mother, how about it?" he said, and the girls knew that mother was to decide. She didn't look happy about it, though. I think she wished that she didn't have to do what she was going to do.

"I vote for Bee," mother said slowly. "I think Bee has earned a treat, and she is the more willing worker. I'm sorry to have to say it, but Betty isn't a helpful little girl to have about the house. She could be, if she would, but Bee so often does her work, that Betty hasn't learned to do many things."

"O mother!" Betty's cry was full of hurt and disappointment, but she begged no more. Not until they had taken Bee and daddy to the train did she speak about it.

"Why didn't you tell me before, mother, so that I could have been learning, too?" she wanted to know.

"I did tell you over and over again, but you never were ready to listen," said mother sadly. "Because you have lost a good time, I'm sure you're going to remember that letting Bee do your work is harming you, and that it is helping her. And now, since you've been the best kind of help today, we're going shopping and we'll have some ice cream!"—The Sunbeam.

Baby Boy's Tree.

It was the first week in March and the children were planting trees in the garden. "My tree is an oak," said William, "and the oak is the king of trees." "Mine is a pine tree," said Bertha. "I love to hear the pine tree sing!"

"I am going to plant a maple," said Rita as she flourished her little spade; "then it will have pretty red leaves in the autumn." "I wish I had a little tree," said Baby Boy. The children were busy, and did not notice Baby Boy till he came up and waved a long willow stick, with which William had been playing horse. "I found a tree!" he said again and again.

Bertha and Rita smiled at each other while the baby dug a tiny hole, in which he set the willow branch; then he stamped down the earth with his little soft shoes. "Don't tell him that his tree won't grow," whispered the thoughtful Bertha. "He will forget all about it tomorrow."

True enough, Baby Boy did forget his tree, and moreover, there came a week of rain, so that the children could not go into the garden. But the willow branch liked the rain; it pushed a little white root into the ground and a little green leaf into the air, and it grew just as rapidly as it could.

"Why, see here!" cried Bertha, one day, when she was looking at the trees. "Baby's tree is alive and growing! Who ever heard of anything so queer?" Every one wondered at the baby's tree when they saw it put out new leaves and shoot up so rapidly that it was soon far ahead of the slow maple and the slower oak. And when Baby Boy grew to be a tall lad his willow tree was a great deal taller than he. The robins sat in it and sang, and built their nests in its branches.—Exchange.

A Lady Slim and Tall.

I often wonder what I'll do
When I'm a lady, slim and tall,
And wear my hair high on my head
And never go to school at all.

I think it would be lots of fun
To make the beds and boss the cook
And wear a brightly spangled gown
So every one would turn and look.

The little folks I'd send to school,
But I would never have to go;
I'd take my pretty work-box out
And sit upon the porch and sew.

When school was out we'd go to town,
And I would give them all a treat.
We'd have ice cream and cakes and jam
And all the candy we could eat.

Helping One Another.

The basket of blocks was on the ground and three rather cross little faces looked down at it.

"It's too heavy for me," said Jimmy.
"Well, you're as big as I am, 'cause we're twins," said Nellie.

"I can't carry it," said their little cousin, with a pout.

Mamma looked from her open window and saw the trouble.

"One day I saw a picture of three little birds," she said. "They wanted a long stick carried somewhere, but it was too large for any one of them to carry. What do you think they did? They all took hold of it together," said mamma, "and then they could fly with it."

The children laughed and looked at each other, and they all took hold of the basket together, and found it easy to carry.

"The way to do all the hard things in the world," said mamma, "is for every one to help a little. No one can do them all, but every one can help."—Christian Leader.

My Talent.

I cannot speak to crowds;
I can to one,
And tell him what for me
The Lord hath done.

I like to think that He,
Whose love I tell,
Spoke to one needy heart
By Jacob's well.

His brother Andrew sought,
For Christ to win;
He preached: three thousand souls
Were gathered in.

When Philip's feet were led
To one strange tryst,
He showed one seeking soul
The seeking Christ.

Amid the ones and twos
My work shall be,
Gladly will I fulfil
This ministry.

Some many talents have,
I have but one;
Yet I with them may share
The King's "Well done!"

RESOLUTION

Adopted by the Vestry of St. Paul's Church, Petersburg, Va., Aug. 4, 1924.

Whereas, in the course of the changes of this mortal world TARTLTON FLEMING HEATH, vestryman and Junior Warden of this church, has passed into the life eternal and the rest of God; and

Whereas, this vestry has sustained the loss of a loyal and warm-hearted friend, a devoted, faithful and consecrated officer and member and wise counselor; and

Whereas, both the vestry and congregation have through the years of his life in their midst been blessed by the benediction of his unswerving devotion to duty, his consistent Christian life and gentle courtesy, his constant manifestation of the Spirit of Christ, whom he faithfully followed in every phase of his life; and have enjoyed the benefit of his unceasing efforts for the upbuilding and prosperity of the church to which he gave devotion unstinted; therefore be it

Resolved, that we record our sense of the irreparable loss we have suffered, thanking God for the example of the life of this His faithful servant and for the inspiration his memory gives us in the labor which he has laid down to enter into his reward; be it further

Resolved, that these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the vestry of St. Paul's Church, a copy sent to his family, and that they be published in the Church papers and the local paper of the city of Petersburg.

J. M. B. GILL, Rector;
W. H. CUTHBERT, Senior Warden;
H. C. LIGHTFOOT, Vestryman.

MRS. H. S. WILLIAMS.

MRS. SUSAN DABNEY WILLIAMS was born at Rock Castle Plantation, Campbell County, Va., on August 4, 1848, the second among the twelve children of Senator Robert E. Withers, and his wife, Mary Virginia Royall. She was educated in the Episcopal School famous in earlier days conducted by the Rev. George W. Dame, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Danville, Va. She was married on December 21, 1865, to Henry S. Williams, who passed into Paradise on January 11, 1910, more than fourteen years ago. She is survived by four daughters, Mesdames W. T. Paxton, of Danville; W. S. Brown and A. S. Gravelly, of Martinsville, and E. A. Williams, of Baltimore, Md.; and three sons, H. S. Williams, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; R. W. Williams, of Richmond; E. A. Williams, of Chicago, Ill.; and by eleven grandchildren and one great-granddaughter. Five sisters, Mesdames E. R. Carter, of Petersburg; J. W. Boyd, J. T. Reed, J. Y. Terry and Miss Willie Withers, all of Wytheville; and by one brother, Robert E. Withers, of Pittsburgh, Pa., remain to cherish her memory.

After her marriage she lived for several years in Baltimore, Md. For ten years she lived in Graniteville, S. C. On the first day of May, 1886, she came to Mar-tinsville, Va.

To those who knew and loved her, her life and example have meant much. Life without her lacks the brightness of her affection and the fragrance of her devotion. She was representative of a type of character and civilization which is rapidly passing from among us.

She passed into Paradise in Martinsville on Sunday, July 27, and was laid to rest beside her husband on July 29 in Oakwood Cemetery.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

MISS ELIZABETH MONTGOMERY SHARPE.

Of Woodlawn Mansion, Near Mount Vernon.

AN APPRECIATION.

By the Rev. Samuel A. Wallis, D. D.
MISS ELIZABETH MONTGOMERY SHARPE, of "Woodlawn Mansion," near Mount Vernon, Fairfax County, Va., is well worthy of remembrance in the columns of the Southern Churchman on account of her life of service and good works for the congregation and people of Old Pohick Church and in the community around her home at Woodlawn. She was a native of the city of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., in the beautiful and historic Wyoming Valley. Her father was a member of the Episcopal Church, while the mother belonged to the Presbyterian communion. Thus, as the family grew up, the most pleasant relations were formed and retained by them between the several churches of these communions in Wilkes-Barre. The rector of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church at that time was the Rev. Henry L. Jones, D. D., a graduate of the Virginia Protestant Episcopal Seminary, who from his regular custom of visiting his alma mater at the annual commencements was well known to most of the alumni of that institution during his lifetime. He was a minister of the Evangelical School, a man of consecrated life, a faithful pastor and an able preacher. St. Stephen's was the leading Episcopal Church in Wilkes-Barre, and Miss Sharpe often spoke of the devotion of their family to Dr. Jones, while the same happy relations existed with the Presbyterian Church and its minister, the Rev. Frank B. Hodge, D. D., a clergyman who enjoyed the same reputation and esteem among the people of that city as Dr. Jones. In Virginia, too, we are familiar with such pleasant associations of the same families in these several churches.

Some twenty or more years ago Miss Sharpe became very much interested in "Woodlawn Mansion," the former fine memorial home of Eleanor Parke Custis, generally known as "Nellie Custis," the adopted daughter of General Washington, and his nephew Major Lawrence Lewis, to whom she was married on the general's last birthday. They lived at "Woodlawn" for about thirty-five years. After they left, "Woodlawn" passed through the hands of several owners, until it was purchased, much diminished in size, by Mr. Paul Kester, a well-known playwright, who began the work of restoration on the mansion, which it needed very much. He then concluded to sell the place, and found a ready purchaser in Miss Sharpe, who was delighted to become the mistress of that historic home, for the building of which Washington had provided most of the materials before he passed away.

Miss Sharpe at once entered upon the work of restoration with all the devotion of an ardent lover of historic shrines. From the foundation to the topmost roof she renewed everything of large or small dimensions that needed restoration or repair, and had the work so well done that "Woodlawn Mansion" will endure for another hundred years or more, as she has left it, with reasonable care on the part of successive owners, which we trust will be descendants of her family.

Our friend had traveled extensively and was a lady of wide culture and fine taste. The interior of "Woodlawn Mansion" is a witness to this, and a library of well-chosen books revealed the remarkable range of her reading, while in conversation she was a delightful and interesting companion.

Miss Sharpe was a regular attendant at Old Pohick Church during the part of each year she made her home at "Woodlawn." To this historic house of prayer and its simple devout worship she was truly attached, and was a generous contributor to its support. The Rev. Everard Meade, D. D., a grandson of Bishop Meade, was the rector of the church for the greater part of the time of her residence at the mansion. While he was rector he had the honor of commencing the real restoration of the church, and practically carrying it through. To this also she contributed liberally. Between Dr. Meade and his family and Miss Sharpe there was a strong mutual friendship, and her thoughtful contributions to the family stores of the rectory, including the winter's coal, added so much to their comfort that the doctor called her the "angel" of the rectory. She was not only that, but also an "angel" to the whole community around Pohick and around her home. She sought out those who were in sickness and need and unable to help themselves "in His name," and no one ever called on her in vain. During the great war she opened her home to the officers and soldiers of Camp A. A. Humphreys, near "Woodlawn," and made every one welcome there. All of those who enjoyed her hospitality will ever remember her kindness and the brightness she put into their lives. When Dr. Meade passed away her thoughtfulness and consideration were a great comfort to his family. Then on the coming of the Rev. E. W. Mellichampe as his successor, she was still "the angel" of the rectory to him and his family in days of sickness and other needs. She was, in addition, for several years a member of the Board of Lady Managers of the Alexandria Hospital, to which she rendered excellent service.

And so the end, when the last call came in the city of Boston on the 6th of June, 1924, she lived in the fear of God and in the service of the Master, and has now entered into the rest and joy of her Lord. When the news of her passing away came to the people of Pohick and the surrounding country a great sorrow came upon all, for every one felt that they had lost a true and devoted friend.

The vestry and other members of Pohick Church, where she had worshipped and for which she had done so much, sent a beautiful memorial wreath to her home in Wilkes-Barre, which was placed close beside her at the funeral service. She was laid to rest among her own people in the lovely cemetery at Wilkes-Barre, overlooking the northern branch of the Susquehanna River, with the view extending to the fair mountains beyond.

On the Sunday after her death there was a service held in Pohick Church, conducted by the rector, the Rev. A. Campbell Tucker, and the Rev. Samuel A. Wallis, D. D., who made the address, in memory of her to whom no greater tribute could be given than that she came years ago as a stranger to "Woodlawn Mansion" and Pohick Church and won the love and esteem of the people of those communities through her life of helpfulness and service, in the abundant manifestation of the fruits of the Spirit of Christ.

ANNA KERANS CHRISTIAN.

"Thou art like unto a flower
So fair, so pure, so bright,
I gaze on thee and sadness
Creeps o'er my heart's delight."

The words of this old song came to us as we think of the young life of ANNE KERANS CHRISTIAN, wife of John Christian, who, with her infant daughter, Jacqueline, entered into eternal life July 14, 1924.

Her flower-like qualities of beauty, grace, refinement, gave a wonderful fragrance to her personality, but behind them were strong virtues, endurance, unselfishness, loyalty and under all steadfast Christian faith.

She was a happy wife, a tender and devoted mother, and a true friend.

The storm is passed. She is in the sunlight, where "the Lord sitteth King forever."

D., Dean of the Theological Department, preached the sermon, and read the Epistle; the Ven. Wm. S. Claiborne read the Gospel, and the Rev. Alex C. McCabe, Ph. D., said the Litany. The Rev. Mr. Hopper becomes priest in charge of Trinity Parish, Winchester, which he has served during his diocese, and will also have charge of the missions at Fayetteville and Shelbyville.

DEATHS.

The Rev. Dr. H. Richard Harris, rector of Grace Church, Philadelphia, died of heart trouble on July 30 at the American Hospital at Neuilly, aged seventy-three. Dr. Harris arrived in Paris last winter, intending to remain a year.

The funeral services were held August 1 at the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity.

Thou standest in our midst
And all our hearts are comforted and calm,
Keep us Thine own—and keep us in the way
Thou first hast trodden—we are going now
Whither we know not: only go with us,
Be Thou beside us and in all our need
Suffer us not to fall away from Thee,
And if, in any hour, at any pass
Of our journey, our hearts should fear
And the betrayal tremble to our lips,
Turn on us Thy reproachful eyes again,
Whose least sad look can strike the falsehood back
Sharper than many swords; Whose least low word
Sets the face steadfast thro' the thundering storm;
Whose least light touch can smoothe the bars of fire
Into a bed of roses; look on us,
Lord, stay with us and we ask no more."

—From "The Disciples."

Babs and the "Birdman."

Babs' uncle had made her a new kite, named the "Birdman," because of the air flights that it was expected to make, and because of the smiling face Uncle Rob had drawn on it.

The name seemed well chosen. On his first flight the Birdman soared very high. Babs' spirits soared high too, for the day was just right for kite-flying, and the Birdman was a kite of which any person might be proud.

Babs had chosen a wide open space near the house from which to send the Birdman flying, and here, for a long while, she had a fine time. Then she ran across the lawn, looking up at the Birdman. She forgot the big elm, until, in pulling the kite downward, she caught the string in the branches, and the Birdman was left hanging there.

Uncle Rob came out, and, after much trouble, rescued a badly damaged Birdman. His head was torn open by a twig on which it had caught.

"Pretty badly wounded!" sighed Uncle Rob. "He'll have to go to the hospital. There's one thing, though, very much in his favor. He's going to help the doctors cure him."

"How do you know?" asked Babs sadly.

"Because," answered Uncle Rob, "in spite of his wound, the corners of his mouth still turn up. How about yours, Babs?"

Babs' mouth had turned down at the corners ever since the accident. Now, at the sight of the Birdman's wide, brave grin, those corners suddenly turned up.

"That's right!" smiled Uncle Rob. "Now, I'm going to save this fellow, if possible, just because he's plucky enough to keep on smiling."

And he did save him. That day the Birdman made several more smiling flights.—Exchange.

Religion of Presidents.

If John W. Davis is elected he will be the eighth Presbyterian President of the United States, and this will bring the number of such Presidents even with the number who have been communicants of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the latter at present holding the palm with eight Presidents.

Mrs. Davis is a communicant of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Mr. Davis attends Sunday morning services with her in the Church of St. John of Lattington, at Locust Valley, the rector of which is the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Hinton.

Few of the intimate friends of the Davises were happier at the outcome of the convention than Doctor Hinton. He sent this telegram:

"Sincere congratulations. I had faith that you would be nominated, and it is strong for your election."

Charles G. Dawes, Republican candidate for Vice-President, attends the First Congregational Church at Evanston, Ill., of which the Rev. Dr. Hugh Elmer Brown is pastor. Mrs. Dawes is a member of this church.

President Coolidge united with the First Congregational Church in Washington last October. He is the first Congregationalist President.

Warren G. Harding was the first Baptist President.

Besides Grover Cleveland, the Presbyterian Presidents were Jackson, Polk, Buchanan, Lincoln, Benjamin Harrison and Wilson. Abraham Lincoln did not unite with the Church, but during the years he was in Washington he was a regular attendant at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church.

The Episcopal Presidents were: Washington, Madison, Monroe, William Henry Harrison, Tyler, Taylor, Pierce and Arthur.

The Unitarians were John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Fillmore and Taft.

The Methodist Presidents were: Jackson, Grant, Hayes and McKinley. Van Buren and Roosevelt were members of the Dutch Reformed Church. Garfield was a member of the Church of Disciples of Christ.

Jefferson was a Liberal.—Press Clipping.

Teach us, dear Lord, to find the latent good

That sorrow yields, when rightly understood:

And for the frequent joy that crowns our days

Help us with grateful hearts our hymns to raise

Of thankfulness and praise.

Education and Religion

"Education and religion are absolutely essential to true democracy," states a Bishop of the Church; and he adds: "It has been the province of Hoiart College to blend the two to a remarkable degree."

That fact is the basis of Hobart's strong appeal to students who come from homes in which a definite religious atmosphere has been maintained. Hobart, ever since its founding, has recognized the value of religion to its students and has always given them ample facilities for the exercise of their religious instincts.

It is not surprising that many students, after entering Hobart, seek affiliation with the Church; nor is it surprising that nearly four hundred Hobart graduates have been ordained to the Protestant Episcopal Ministry.

Applications for admission to the 103rd class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.

THE THIRTY-NINTH ANNUAL CONVENTION

THE BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW IN THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday Evening to Sunday Evening
October 8 to 12, 1924
Albany, N. Y.

The registration fee is $2.00 for Seniors, $1.00 for Juniors.

The first step is to register yourself, then register someone else. Bring a room-mate at least. Better organize a party from your parish. Plan to include this delightful trip in your vacation. The trip alone is worth while. Add to it the splendid inspiration and spiritual growth that are bound to come from and through the Convention, and you have surely sufficient reason for coming to this Convention, even at the expense of something else.

The clergy generally are urged to call to the attention of the men and boys of their parishes the advantage of attendance, and to make an earnest effort to assure that their parishes are represented. Registration cards may be had from the National Office, 202 S. 19th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

You are in God's world; you are God's child. Those things you cannot change; the only peace and rest and happiness for you is to accept them and rejoice in them. When God speaks to you, you must not believe that it is the wind blowing or the torrent falling from the hill. You must know that it is God. You must gather up the whole power of meeting Him. You must be thankful that life is great and not little. You must listen as if listening were your life. And then, then only can come peace. All other sounds will be caught up into the prevailing richness of that voice of God. The lost proportions will be perfectly restored. Discord will cease; harmony will be complete.—Phillips Brooks.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

No man can love God completely, and be selfish.

The seeds of virtue grow best when planted early.

He who studieth revenge keepeth his own wounds green.—Bacon.

Life is fuller and sweeter for every fulness and sweetness that we take knowledge of.

God is content to wait, because He reigneth; man must be content to wait, because he believeth.—Edersheim

The Spartan Mother's advice to her son who feared that his sword was too short was "Add a step to it."

"If earth, Heaven's shadow, shows a face so bright,
What of God's summer past the straits of death?"

Skepticism writing about belief may have great gifts; but it is really ultra vires there. It is blindness laying down the Laws of Optics—Carlyle.

There is nothing in the universe I fear, except that I may not know my duty, or may fail to do it.—Mary Lyon.

"I have always had one lodestar; now As I look back, I see that I have halted
Or hasted as I looked toward that star—
A need, a trust, a yearning after God."

"The authority of conscience is the authority of the spiritual life itself. It is a voice from the angel within, saying: 'Spare me that indignity'."—Yillard B. Thorp.

"War is the denial of Christianity and of all the most sacred things in life. It exalts force. It thrives on lies. It is the product of hate and fear and cannot by any stretch of imagination be waged humanely."—Boston Transcript.

Sure stands the promise—ever to the meek
A heritage is given;
Nor lose they Earth who single-hearted seek
The righteousness of Heaven.
—Whittier.

How often do we look upon God as our last and feeblest resource! We go to Him because we have nowhere else to go. And then we learn that the storms of life have driven us, not upon the rocks, but into the desired haven; that we have been compelled, as to the last remaining, so to the best, the only, the central help.—George MacDonald.

Has he not pointed us to ravens, and to lilies, and bidden us learn from them the lesson of living without care? Your cares, poor anxious one, are not Christ's yoke. They are a heavy yoke that is all of your own making; but if you took another kind of care—the care of not caring—then you would find Christ's yoke to be easy, his burden to be light.—C. H. Spurgeon.

THEY STOLE THE KING

Throughout the world there is still the ferment of discontent. Whatever else the great war did, it did this at least: it vocalized the longings of the human heart. There are so many more people in the world today seeking self-expression than there were twenty-five years ago, that it is as if this earth were suddenly changed from a small star to one of the first magnitude. Men are seeking some principle upon which to build for themselves a new world. They know, as you and I know, that the old philosophies, the old methods of diplomacy, the old dead-sure prophecies of cunning and greed, the old cynical conception of man being at bottom only a selfish brute, have all been discredited.

Men are looking for a principle that will help man to live and grow. They know instinctively that man must have an ideal. That ideal is no longer the successful warrior. The World War did not give the world a dazzling hero to overawe the imagination. The attempt to make an ideal of Haig or Foch has been so futile as to be foolish. The "Unknown Soldier" to whom the world has credited the possession of its mid-war ideal is the only hero. When he "went west" the sky was illumined with the splendor of the aspiration of that time. He did not live to darken that hope with carelessness or greed. The glory of his sacrifice lights the path of the future. The remembrance of the great hour of half the race has become a sacrament of memory. Fortune denied to the unknown one even a name in the catalogue of earth's great ones. Judged by every standard of the market-place, his life was wasted and he himself a failure. His epitaph, if one dared to write it, might be: "Better thus to die unknown and forever nameless, than live to be ashamed."

The honor done to the Unknown is perhaps the deepest religious note sounded on earth since 1914. From the tomb of the Unknown Soldier there are many who have turned their eyes for the first time to the One Who declared in effect that conscience was all in man that could ever die. For the first time in history the world is consciously seeking Jesus. In order to get audience with Him, they have in some lands stripped the priests of their official robes and driven them out. They are flinging aside abstruse theological subtleties. They are mocking at creeds and Churches; but they are in deadly earnest. They are determined to take the Kingdom of Heaven by force. They would see Jesus.

There is a wonderful scene in the life of David. The revolt of Absalom has been crushed; but the land is full of bickering and hatred and suspicion. The throne is vacant. The King has crossed Jordan, for there was no place for Him in the midst of a disloyal people. The kingdom is without a head, and Israel is forced to realize that their folly has ruined them. They meet in council and there recall all He had done for them in the past, and begin to talk of how best to bring Him back. Their factious quibbling is suddenly hushed, for word is brought to them that the King is on His throne again. The tribe of Judah has suddenly surrounded David and compelled him to go with them across the Jordan and now they hold the city for him. Israel sends a delegation to David saying: "Why have our brethren, the men of Judah, stolen thee away?" The King is silent; but all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel: "Because the King is near kin to us. We have neither eaten at his cost nor has he given us any gift." You drove him out and shattered his kingdom. We found him an exile, and we have claimed as our own. We knew him when he was a shepherd boy. "And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah and said: We have ten parts in the King, and we have also more right in David than ye: Why then did ye despise us, that our advice should not be had in bringing back our King? And the words of the Men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel." Still the King kept silence, and "so every man of Israel went up from after David and followed a man of Belial whose name was Sheba."

One thousand years later, while the leaders of the nation were discussing the claims of one who claimed to be their King, the common people surrounded Jesus and tried to "take Him by force and make Him a King." Let the Church that claims to the Kingdom of Christ take warning. The common people who heard Him gladly, no longer claim allegiance to the Church. Today they have gone across Jordan to see Jesus.

As certain as is the truth that "He is the same yesterday, today and forever," so certain is it that when they see Him, they will claim Him for their own, and with the same old cry: "Because He is near kin to us," they will crown Him King. Vain will it be for the Church to say: "We have ten parts in the King. We have more right than ye." They who have neither eaten at His table nor received any gift of Him will not surrender their claim. The readiness with which Israel heeded the call of the son of Belial show how empty were their protestations of loyalty.

PATRIOTISM AND PAGANISM

Lecky in the History of Morals declares that "a candid examination will show that the Christian civilizations have been as inferior to the Pagan ones in civic and intellectual virtues as they have been superior to them in the virtues of humanity and chastity." He also declares that the Roman ideal of perfection represented preeminently the type of the freeman, and that Christianity for the first time gave the servile virtues the first place in the moral type. Magnanimity, self-reliance, dignity and independence, he says, are the Pagan virtues; and humility, obedience, gentleness and patience those of Christianity.

The great critic of history fails to record that when Christianity came into the empire the ancient virtues of paganism had practically become extinct. The whole ancient ethic of Greece and Rome alike was in terms of privileged citizenship. The absolutism of the empire gradually leveled downwards till the individual's worth became nil, and the whole Roman law became little more than an elaborate system for the protection of property. No one can read the Roman law without being conscious that it concerns itself with things not with people. The Christian Church had to exist in a world in which magnanimity, self-reliance, dignity and independence were practically impossible. The world was an enslaved world, and the only virtues possible were those which Lecky calls the servile virtues.

Nothing is more certain than that it was commerce that broke the thralldom of papal tyranny, which was the heir at law to the imperial tyranny. The cities of Italy were rivals in trade. Men became partizans of their own cities. The citizen who had disappeared from history for a thousand years came back. There began to be a civic consciousness. Then when interest in the Pagan literature of antiquity awoke, men found in Plato and Aristotle an ethic of citizenship, and the lost virtues began to emerge. Men had lived first in the Emperor's world, then in the Pope's world; but the Mohammedan and the Jew in Spain through the schools of science taught the new citizen to look into nature; and he suddenly discovered that this was God's world. The local civic consciousness widened into the spirit of nationalism, and local partizanship began to be apostrophized under the name of patriotism. It was the pagan, not the Christian, influence that stayed the development of patriotism so that it never became the Christian virtue of brotherhood.

Science, which was taken over by the Church in her schools of learning, was handicapped from the beginning; for since the times of St. Augustine the Church had been committed to a conception of God and man that degraded man and set ethical limitations upon Deity. This Augustinian theology is the product of a Church in an enslaved world, and is based upon physical sovereignty. Its ethic is incompatible with freedom in man and bases the authority of God over man, not upon the fact that God is the source of truth, but the source of power. Augustinian ethics is as pagan as that of Athens or Rome. It is an ethic of the privileged and has no note of universality which is the criterion of Christianity. The task of the Church, which is only to say, the task of Christian men and women, is to break down the pagan limitations of patriotism, which is the modern world is the child of commerce; and to free itself from the limitations of that conception of Deity, which Augustine bequeathed to the Church, a conception that in spite of the logical acuteness displayed in its construction left him, who created it, a moral skeptic.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF CRIME

By the Reverend Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D.

"The wages of sin is death." Rom. 6:23.

"Every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust and enticed."

"Then the lust when it hath conceived, bringeth forth sin and the sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." St. James 1:15.

EVERY man who really loves his God, his country and his home must have had some very serious thoughts over the appalling increase of crime which we have witnessed of late years. Suicides, once so rare in America, are now nearly as common here as in Europe. Murders in passion have perhaps decreased, but murders for money are terribly on the increase. Sex-criminality is offensively common, and perhaps growing. There is a boldness, a hardness, a brazenness about it which is simply amazing. Men and women, who were formerly held back by their more refined associations, by long traditions of decency, now often throw all such considerations to the winds, intent solely upon guilty self-gratification.

Because the psychology of sex has gone further than other branches of analytical study, some students like Freud have exaggerated it as a factor in life. There is a great deal in life besides sex, and for which the explanation is to be found in quite another region of human motives than either suppression or indulgence. But all the mirrors which are held up to nature, the theatre, the moving picture, the novel, and the press show the tremendous power of this instinct in contemporary life, how it is exploited and traded upon and abused and desecrated by those who have given up conscience and God.

We have had lately kept before us with oppressive prominence a remarkable exhibit in modern crime. Two young men, from average Jewish homes, homes of wealth, but evidently of much religious poverty, deliberately chose a criminal career from childhood. As early as eight years of age one, the leader, "gave up conscience and became a law unto himself." This youth is sprung from the race through whose agency God gave the world the Ten Commandments. Ever since Moses he could hear in history and civilization the thunder-roll of those great words: "Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not kill." But as a selfish egotist he had no use for the Voice of God. He and his chum dreamed of crime, of successful enterprise in notorious criminality, of a career which should attract attention. On their return from robbing a fraternity house, they planned murder. Various victims were thought of at different times—even some of their own family. There was in them no soul, no other regarding faculty, no sentiment; they were only cold, cynical, selfish, dehumanized, sinuous, reptile, deliberate degenerates and a constant menace to society. And yet a soft and maudlin sentiment would let off such men with imprisonment! "Whoso shedeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." The first use of law is to put the fear of God into such criminals, and bring their sins to remembrance. The second is to protect society. And yet law is not and never has been adequate protection for human society. We will look into this later on.

Our first point is that criminality is alarmingly on the increase in this free land. Most of the offenders are young, having life before them. Mentally-twisted, morally perverted youth—it is a sad spectacle! Now why are there so many. What creates them? What are our young people reading and thinking about? You will find the law of suggestion having a great deal to do with it. That is one of the most influential laws governing human beings. And the minds of our young people are too often fed upon melodrama, unhealthy, teasing, suggestive if not salacious or cruel plots, until the mind is seriously corrupted. Since I have been here I heard a young girl not out of her teens say: "I get the New York American because it gives me the details of crimes."

How much going wrong may be traced directly to the vastly increased publicity given to crime in some of our morning and afternoon papers! Now what is the inner psychology of crime? What accounts for its prevalence? First we should say, the decay over large provinces of life of belief in the Living God. Sin is more rarely thought of in connection with God at all. Men have a keen sense of the disagreeableness of getting caught; they are deterred by publicity and by other consequences of wrong doing. But the wrong act as a thing that will be punished by God disturbs them less than formerly—perhaps far less.

But, there are, in the final analysis, only two centres about which human action revolves—self or God. If a man puts self first “regardless”—before humanity, before honesty, before moral purity, before justice, before good citizenship, before the Church of God—he is doing what he can to overthrow the Kingdom of God. Whenever the self-instinct is cultivated at the expense of the instinct which prompts us for the love of God to try to serve our fellow-men; wherever it kills that great Christian Social Energy which has been at once the salvation and the glory of so many men and women; wherever that self-instinct has expelled the other, regarding principle, it has led to some form of wrong-doing, or to the waste of life.

“The only cure for the love of self is the love of man,” it has been said, and “the love of man is the best way that we can express our love of God.”

I am not saying that the social instinct exhausts the religious instinct. Far from it. “Thou shalt love the Lord thy God.” This is the great and first commandment. To be sustained, all social activity must flow out of this. But we know what Jesus Christ did out of love to His Father. He was so busy giving His very inmost and holiest self in helping and healing and blessing that He could not be tempted by evil. It made no appeal to Him. The idle, the un-God fearing, the self-centred, may at any time be betrayed into moral sin of one kind or another. It is because the healthy and intended channel is blocked, because the positive duty and service is left undone that there arises in the soul the lure and vision of the evil suggestion.

If energy is not employed usefully and worthily it will always find sinister employment and endanger our characters. Man has been endowed by his Creator with certain elemental instincts and capacities. The Christian life calls not for a suppression of these, but for their right direction. We are to interest ourselves in people unselfishly, in their improvement, the education and protection of the young and inexperienced, in the betterment of the lot of those who suffer from any handicap or social or economic disadvantage. We are to bear one another's burdens and so fulfil the royal law of Christ. And if people refuse to do this and narrow their program to the gratification of their own selfish desires, why even the primary instincts become the channel of sinful action. “Lust when it hath conceived bringeth forth sin, and the sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.”

Civilization with its release of millions from the discipline of manual labor, with its shorter hours of toil and its multiplied comfort has created “a vast surplus energy.” There is great danger today lest this energy be expended in sinful channels and hurtful ways. The more of release there is from physical toil, the more of conveniences and leisure there comes in human life, the more energy is set free for evil indulgences. Thank God for the multiplied forms of wholesome recreation for the young, for the useful hobbies, the out-of-door exercises, the increased interest in literature, the arts and crafts and all the outlets for action and adventure and romance. Thank God for the founts of man's manifold activity and all the enrichments and glories it has added to human life. These things constitute, as channels of human action, sometimes as forms of service, a real part of man's salvation. They are not to be forgotten or disposed of.

But after all there is only one thing deep enough and strong enough to control the passionate instincts of men, and that is a genuine belief in God as He is brought close to us in Jesus Christ.

St. Paul says solemnly, “The wages of sin is death.” We all know the bitter truth of the words! And then the same Paul cries: “Wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God, through Jesus Christ.” He is Our Deliverer. He can break our chains.

But we must be real in this matter. Except in cases here and there the religious instinct does not dominate men and women as strongly as other and lower instincts do. But without God we can never master the tumultuous forces of our insurgent nature. Men who have given up religion will on close scrutiny be found to be men who have given up the moral battle.

It has been said, “Man's highest form of self-interest is displayed in the care of that in him which is immortal, of God.” “What is a man profited if he gain the world and lose his own soul?” And what about losing the souls of others. To live for the higher interests of society, to witness to that Kingdom and its King Who alone can redeem society, to be ready to sacrifice one's time, one's means, one's self in this noblest and most enduring service is to be better employed than in merely trying to save one's own soul. For this Christ spirit, this love of men for God's sake and for their sake, the only cure for the selfishness which narrows and degrades us, the cynical hate which defiles us, and the guilty lust which “when it is finished bringeth forth death.”

CHRISTIAN LOVE.

Christian love is not a maudlin sentiment, but the practical recognition of a plain fact involving a claim. The plain fact is that we are the children of God Who made us and cares for us, and members one of another, so closely bound together that if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it. The characteristic Christian attitude towards the happiness and sorrow, the virtues and sins, of others, is that we should feel them as if they were our own. The true Christian feels a natural pleasure in seeing others happy; his sympathy with other people's troubles is equally spontaneous, because he feels as if they had fallen upon himself. The sight of goodness in others fills him with thankfulness; he rejoices to see the grace of God at work. And when he is confronted with moral evil, his feelings are equally far removed from the half-cynical toleration of the man of the world, and from the vindictive indignation of the mere moralist. His first feeling is not of anger, but of shame and sorrow, almost as if he had committed the wrong himself. Vindictive anger is most easily aroused when crime seems to have been successful. But the Christian is under no temptation to envy such success. Our Lord unquestionably owed His unique power of reclaiming sinners to His sympathy with them, to His recognition of something lovable in their personality, in spite of all the corruption of their lives. But this redeeming sympathy for sinners can be exercised only by those who have no sympathy whatever with their sins. Admission to redemptive work, which is the sign and fruit of redemption, is the reward of complete self-consecration. In minor degrees we can exercise this power, we can claim for ourselves this Divine privilege, but only in proportion as we have shut the door finally upon such temptations in ourselves.—Dean Inge.

THE FAITH OF CHRIST'S FREEMAN.

Our faith is not in dead saint's bones,
In altars of vain sacrifice;
Nor is it in the stately stones
That rise in beauty toward the skies.

Our faith is in the Christ who walks
With men today, in street and mart;
The constant Friend who thinks and talks
With those who seek Him with the heart.

We would not spurn the ancient lore,
The prophet's word or psalmist's prayer;
But lo! our Leader goes before,
Tomorrow's battles to prepare.

His Gospel calls for living men,
With singing blood and minds alert;
Strong men, who fall to rise again,
Who strive and bleed, with courage girt.

We serve no God whose work is done,
Who rests within His firmament;
Our God, His labors but begun,
Toils evermore, with power unspent.

God was and is and e'er shall be;
Christ lived and loved—and loves us still;
And man goes forward, proud and free,
God's present purpose to fulfil.

—Thos. C. Clark, in The Christian Century (Chicago).

BROWNING'S POTTERS WHEEL

By the Reverend E. H. Ward, D. D.

GEORGE ADAM SMITH, in his Biography of Henry Drummond tells us that Drummond considered Robert Browning the greatest spiritual teacher of the Nineteenth Century. Every one acquainted with him would surely acknowledge him to be a competent judge. In the preface to one of his books, Dr. John Watson said Henry Drummond was the most Christ-like Man he had ever seen, or expected to see in this world. The late Bishop Greer, when asked to what one man he owed most, answered Robert Browning.

Near the close of his great poem Rabbi Ben Ezra, he introduces the figure of the Potter's Wheel, and continues it to the end of the poem. There is unquestionably a reference here to the book of Jeremiah, the eighteenth chapter, vs. 2-6. In the fourth verse we read, "The vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hands of the potter; so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it." There is also a reference to some stanzas of Fitzgerald in Omar Kayam. Browning had greater contempt for Fitzgerald than for any other man who ever lived. The whole spirit of Omar Kayam is materialistic, atheistic, and blasphemous, and with such sentiment Browning had no patience. Here are two of the stanzas to which reference is made:

"After a momentary silence spake
Some vessel of ungainly make:
They sneer at me for leaning all awry;
What! then, did the hand of the potter shake?"

"Why, said another, Some there are who tell
Of one who threatens he will toss to hell
The luckless pots he made in making—Pish!
He's a Good Fellow and 'twill all be well.

"Well, murmured one, let whoso make or buy,
My clay with long oblivion is gone dry;
But fill me with the old familiar juice,
Methinks I might recover by and by?"

No wonder that Browning's great, earnest, God-filled soul could find no fitting word for a writer of such stuff but "Fool."

Many poets have tried their hands at this figure, but Browning has surpassed all others in his use of it; and yet it is a dangerous figure. Even in his hands it lends support to the fallacy that the will is not free, however much he may attempt to guard against it. The wheel of time spins fast and "passive" lies our clay. Then the fool stimulated with wine says "Since life fleets all is change; the past gone, seize today." But the shallow fool is wrong:

"All that is at all
Lasts ever past recall;
Earth changes but the soul and God stand sure:
What entered into thee, that was, is, and shall be:
Time's wheel run back or stops; Potter and clay endure."

The act may be momentary, but its influence abides. Every deed, thought, desire and volition leave an impress upon the soul, and the slow accretion of these, through the years of mortal life, forms the character of the individual man. We are the resultant of all we have said, thought, desired, and done, and in the structure of character, each thought and deed is just as visible to the eye of the all seeing God, as is the stone in the great pyramid laid in its course thousands of years ago.

Man is not the victim of heredity or the sport of environment. The "dance of plastic circumstance" is just sufficient" to give the soul its bent, and "send it forth sufficiently impressed." Here again the figure, beautifully as it is worked out, fails to do justice to the will as a factor in the development of character.

Pain and sorrow come to all the children of men, but their action upon character is determined by the action of the will. As fire softens iron and hardens clay, so one person in the fires of tribulation, like Job's wife, curses God; while another cries, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." It is not the machinery of environment, but the choice of the human will that is the determining factor in the formation of character.

And now the poet comes to the finishing touches of the almost completed cup. Fashioned from the base up he looks down upon the cup, and finds the grooves empty, where once ran "the laughing loves." The delights of those early years when life was irradiated by "loves young dream," are only sad, sweet memories now. But he does not grieve over this, nor long to feel the wild pulsations of youth; nor does he sigh for "the tender grace of a day that is dead." The senses, once keen, are dull and defective now. The step has lost its elasticity, the voice its sweetness, and "skull things" grow out around the rim of the cup. How reconcile the bald head, the sunken cheeks, the toothless mouth with the assertion that age is better than youth?

The answer is: Do not look down but up; look not back to the past, but onward to the future.

"Look thou not down but up To uses of a cup."

Think not of the worn-out casket which has enshrined the jewel, but remember that the jewel will yet sparkle in the crown of the King. Think of the uses of the cup.

"The new wine's foaming flow,
The Master's lips aglow,
Thou heaven's consummate cup
What needst thou with earth's wheel?"

The cup will grace the Master's Table; it will be filled with foaming wine; the Master's lips will touch it when He drinks it new in the Kingdom of God.

The cup is now completed and no longer needs earth's wheel. But the completed cup still needs the Potter; man has need of God. This poem was written shortly after the death of his dearly loved wife, and then the wheel of life was on its dizziest whirl for him. But still he sings,

"Not when the whirl was worst
Did I—to the wheel of life
With shapes and colors rife,
Bound dizzily—mistake my end to slake thy thirst."

The end or purpose of the cup is to slake God's thirst. "Thou hast created him for Thy glory." We need God, but does He need us? Browning answers yes. Man is made to satisfy a want of God, and by the right use of His freedom can make out of his life something which God Himself could not directly create, and which will add something to His glory. If we take God's Fatherhood seriously we cannot doubt that the Son is necessary to the Father's happiness, and the strongest tenderest appeal ever made to man is this: "Grieve not the Spirit of God."

And now the work of this mortal life is ended. All the lessons which could be taught in the body have been learned, and the soul with the rich fruitage of life's discipline is ready to give an account of itself to God. Looking up into the face of a gracious Father it says: "The spark of thine own life which Thou didst entrust to me, I am now ready to yield back to Thee. I have not made the best use of my freedom. I have fallen far short of my own poor ideals. There are many flaws lurking in my character; there are 'warpings past the aim'; but in the lowest depths of my heart the strongest passion is love for Thee. Thou, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known; and from whom no secrets are hid, knowest that I love Thee, and because of that love Thou canst make me perfect. Then gracious Father,

"So take and use Thy work,
Amend what flaws may lurk,
What strain o' the stuff. What warpings past the aim!
My times be in Thy hand!
Perfect the cup as planned
Let age approve of youth, and Death complete the same."

Death complete the same. For death is not the end of life. Life is one and continuous. Its thread is never severed by the shears of death. Not a single thread in the marvelous skein of life is broken by the ruthless hand of death. Death simply changes the conditions under which the life is lived. It takes down the worn out tabernacle of the body and permits the emancipated soul to start out on its "adventure brave and new" in the nobler world of spirit, where its growth in light, in love, and knowledge will continue, until at last it will attain

"the ultimate, angels' law,
Indulging every instinct of the soul
There where law, life, joy, impulse are one thing."

THE HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SOCIAL SERVICE WORK OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES

The Reverend Jos. M. Waterman, A. B., B. D., Baltimore, Md.

THE GIRLS' FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

(From Story of Program.)

SOME fifty years ago there lived in England a woman who was animated by two great forces—her vital faith in Jesus Christ and an abiding passion and sympathy with young girls. This woman was Mary Elizabeth Townsend, who founded the Girls' Friendly Society in Lambeth Palace, London, in 1875. Mrs. Townsend had long recognized the problems which faced girls who were leaving home to undertake work in the industrial world.

In 1886 this Society was formally organized in the United States. There are at present almost one thousand units. More and more the units in America have developed along social service lines, feeling that this is the best way in which to serve the girlhood that the Society seeks to help. Lodges, rest rooms, lunch rooms, holiday houses all care for the physical side. Classes, lectures and libraries offer to those whose opportunities have been few a chance for further mental development. It endeavors to reach girls of every creed and race. It has three groups: candidates for girls under twelve years, members, unmarried women and girls over twelve; married branch helpers, women who have been members previous to marriage.

It works through six departments, the department of candidates which works with younger girls' department of extension, which sends out field secretaries; department of missions, which keeps up interest in this field; department of social service, which conducts work along the lines of health, housing, industry and recreation. It maintains lodges, etc., throughout the country; department of holiday houses—houses where girls can spend vacations at reasonable rates.

Besides what the society is doing by, with and for its own membership, it is engaged in relief and philanthropic work carried on by the parochial units which give money and personal service to needy individuals and families and to institutions and organizations!

Some of the problems which the Society tries to meet are briefly summarized. Infinitely larger dangers loom up before foreign-born girls, or those of foreign parentage, than before girls of long American ancestry. The reason for this is found in the breaking down of parental control, because the ideas of parents' rights differ greatly in the old world from the standards in this country; the children feel that knowing the language of this country and its customs (superficially) they are far better fitted to judge their own actions than are the parents, for their self-support often creates an independence that amounts to license and a disregard for law, the more dangerous because too frequently an ineffectual education has accompanied manual training.

Many foreign families are entirely unchurched; while this is bad for the boys, it is infinitely worse for the girls, for they are left with no proper social contact, and no sense of personal and social responsibility is developed in them. To these girls the Society can render the greatest service by providing the proper living environment and instructing them in the ideals of Christian living and citizenship.

Many girls come from country towns to seek work in the larger cities; great difficulty is experienced in finding homes, and, more than that, in making new church affiliations. Or there are a large number of city workers who have no opportunities for vacation outing, simply because of lack of sufficient funds. The society provides holiday houses for its members and lodges in various places where they can live decently and economically.

The question of child training and child welfare are vital today when instruction in religious matters is totally lacking in so many of the homes. The society enrolls children as candidates and meets with them weekly for instruction; it is estimated that some 11,000 girls are attending such weekly meetings.

The four great principles on which the Girls' Friendly Society rests are Friendliness, Steadfastness, Purity and the acceptance of a personal religious faith. This latter principle does not mean that only communicants of our Church are admissible to the organization because it not only admits, but welcomes members from other communions.

THE CHURCH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF THE INTEREST OF LABOR.

This organization was started in 1887 with Bishop Potter as principal promoter. In 1893 a committee was formed for mediation and conciliation, and this committee actually settled several strikes and smoothed out differences between capital and labor organizations.

This work resulted in the appointment of a joint commission on the relations of capital and labor, by the General Convention of 1901. This committee was directed to do three things:

1. To study the aims and purposes of the labor organizations of our country.

2. To investigate the cause of industrial disturbances.

3. To hold themselves in readiness as arbiters.

This was suggested by the Rev. Dr. McKim of Washington, who also suggested Bishop Potter as Chairman.

This committee made a report in 1904.

At the General Convention of 1907 action was taken under Bishop Potter's influence for the foundation of local Social Service Committees in various Dioceses of the Church.

It can be seen where some of the work of this Association led. The Association itself still exists. It states that its object is: "The advancement of the interests of labor by the application of the Gospel of Jesus Christ." What this embraces is shown by the following summary. It endeavors to advance industrial interests, embracing capital, labor and the public and to promote the enactment of Federal and State legislation furthering the best interests of labor. It is engaged in an effort to take all manufacturing out of tenement houses as an aid to the abolition of the sweatshop and child labor. It strives to promote industrial peace and to further legislation to procure an eight-hour day and a living wage for workers. It works for better factory and housing conditions and whatever seems best for the interest of the community in industrial advancement, and especially tries to promote interest in cooperation as a means of preventing labor conflicts.

How does it endeavor to carry out its program?

By sermons, addresses and lectures it extends information and strives to rouse public interest. It publishes descriptive circulars and has films and exhibit material.

Principles.

1. It is of the essence of the teachings of Jesus Christ that God is the Father of all men, and that all men are brothers.
2. God is the sole possessor of the earth and its fulness; Man is but the steward of God's bounties.
3. Labor being the exercise of body, mind and spirit in the broadening and elevating of human life, it is the duty of every man to labor diligently.
4. Labor, as thus defined, should be the standard of social worth.
5. When the divinely-intended opportunity to labor is given to all men, one great cause of the present widespread suffering and destitution will be removed.

Principles Applied.

Organized Labor recognized.
Fraternal relations promoted with same.
Union Label on all printing of the Society.
Use of Label urged on all commodities.
Eight-hour day—Sunday rest—one day's rest in seven demanded.
Organization of Actors' Church Alliance for abolition of Sunday performances.
Factories and mines investigated.
Adequate number of factory inspectors urged.
Sweating and child labor opposed.
The first practical Committee of Arbitration (outside of Organized Labor) established in New York City.
Aid for Clerks—postal, drug, grocers and department stores.
Better hours for Letter Carriers.
Motormen—vestibuling of cars urged.
Insisted upon improved tenement conditions.
The first Society to demand that all manufacturing be taken out of Tenement Houses, and thus help to abolish child labor and the sweating system.
In 1907 the Society passed a bill in the New York State Legislature fixing hours of work for factory children between 8 A. M. and 5 P. M.

Influence Upon the Church.

The first Society to insist that social questions be studied in the light of the Incarnation.

1890—Labor Day services instituted.

Petitions urged upon the attention of General and Diocesan Conventions looking to the promotion of peace between capital and labor, and urging establishment of permanent commissions for this work. In 1901, Joint Commission on Capital and Labor appointed at General Convention, San Francisco.

In 1907, at Richmond, the C. A. I. L. urged upon the General Convention appointment of Diocesan Commissions, which was accomplished.

Sermons preached and meetings held in parishes throughout the United States.

CHURCH LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY.

This organization was begun in 1919. Its object as stated is to "unite for intercession and labor those within the Episcopal Church who believe that it is an essential part of the Church's function to make justice and love the controlling motives of all social change, and who wish, as Christians to promote all sound movements looking toward the democratization of industry and socialization of life."

The activity of this organization is chiefly educational. It conducts conferences, public meetings, gives lectures and issues literature. It has made particular progress during the past year through the efforts of their energetic secretary, the Rev. Wm. B. Spofford. He has given lectures at a number of colleges, and theological schools.

It requests support on the following argument:

1. Because organized massing of opinion is the best instrument of modern democracy.

2. Because such massing of opinion in the P. E. Church will help that Church to find its true value in the difficult social and industrial situation.

3. Because it will help those without the Church to realize the depth of earnestness and the breadth of opinion to be found among Church members.

4. Because fellowship in this League is experienced by many of the clergy and laity as a blessed and sustaining reality through which the power of corporate prayer and faith is vividly realized.

Its program of work for this year shows how it proposes to reach this objective.

Program for the Year:

1. Strict economy in administration.
2. Democratic support.
3. Intensive work in the seminaries among the future leaders of the Church.
4. Intensive work in parishes. Secretary to be employed to build up classes in parishes. Executive Secretary to visit parish whenever it is possible to address meetings and preach.
5. To devote the summer months to Church Summer Schools. Executive Secretary to give courses at Wellesley, Faribault and Wausau.
6. To follow up the labor leader by conferences.
7. To organize employer conferences.
8. To stimulate Diocesan Departments of Christian Social Service to greater activity along fundamental lines.
9. To cooperate with several radical and liberal organizations.
10. To aid student pastors in colleges in their efforts to develop a social consciousness among students.
11. To develop our publicity by giving news service to the Church and labor press.
12. To build up a dues paying membership.
13. To seek a closer unity between the Industrial Christian Fellowship of the English Church.
14. To publish quarterly an eight-page paper.
15. To stimulate interest and activity among our members by assigning definite tasks.

BOOK REVIEWS

A GREAT IDEAL AND ITS CHAMPION. George Allen Unwin, Ltd., London, Publishers. Price Four Shillings and Sixpence. Pp. 223.

This book, dedicated to his memory, contains the papers and addresses by the late Sir Charles Stewart Loch, whose life was spent in the service of society, and whose great abilities were devoted to efforts to meet and solve the social problems of the day. As Secretary of the Council of the Charity Organization Society, Sir Charles Loch speaks to us in these addresses "as one having authority." The compiler of the book divides it in four sections, i. e., "Charity, A Principal of Social Work"; "Charity and Its Problems"; "Methods in Social Work"; "Aims of the Charity Organization Society". The first three of these sections contain excellent material dealing with social welfare in its broad and general aspects. The last section is more or less local pertaining to the special work of the Society which Sir Charles represented. The author of the preface makes a most excellent comment on the unfortunate misuse of the word "Charity" when he says "The degradation of the beautiful word 'Charity' owing to the impression in the mind of the public that it is synonymous with 'Almsgiving,' was a constant grief to the author. Sir Charles Loch's higher ideal of the true meaning of this word shines out in many places in the papers and addresses which this book contains, and is epitomized in his own definition, that 'Charity is inclusive of all those voluntary efforts which improve conditions and prevent dependence.' The book is well worth reading for those who are interested in social activities, and contains many helpful suggestions.

M.

MEN, WOMEN AND GOD. By the Rev. A. Herbert Gray, D. D. George H. Doran Company, New York. Pages 200.

This book contains a very real contribution to the ever present problem of social morality. The author approaches the subject with a candor that is refreshingly clean in his clear-minded and frank discussion of matters that are usually kept in a mist of facts only partly disclosed. There is also a practical application of the spiritual strength that comes from a Christian faith to the problems of sex in a way that is very helpful. Dr. Gray seems to have a very real desire to help the young people of today in the perplexities of modern life and it would be hard to see how his book could help being of real assistance to any one who is sincerely seeking to find the perfect fullness of life that Christ came to teach.

DOWN THROUGH THE AGES. By Frank E. Gaebel. The Macmillan Company. Pp. 106.

This volume should not be measured in importance by its size. It fills a very much needed place in the religious library, giving the growth and development of the Bible, both Old and New Testaments in a concise and interesting way that will be found most useful to persons who are teaching in Sunday Schools, or Church Boarding Schools. It is an amazing thing how people realize that the Bible, and especially the New Testament literally "grew up gradually," one book after another taking its sacred place, until finally the Canon was adopted and closed. Then for many years, on account of the chaotic condition of the civilized world this sacred literature was withdrawn from general circulation and became practically unknown to the average Christian. Chapter four of this volume is entitled "How the Bible Came to England," and gives a very interesting account of early English Church history in connection with the history of the use of the Scriptures there. Including a quotation from the fourteenth chapter of St. John's Gospel a few sentences of which we quote herewith to show the development in the English language. "And he cwaep to his leorning-cnihtum, Ne sy eower heorte gedrefed; . . . ge gelyfab on God, and gelyfed on me. On mines faeder huse synd manega eardung-stowa." A chapter is given to the events surrounding Wyclif's translation, and a sentence from it will show how much nearer the English of his time approaches our own. A quotation from the forty-second Psalm is as follows, "Oure God, thou art refuyt, and vertu; helperen in tribulations, that han founde vs greetly. Therefore we schulen not drede, while the erthe schal be trobrid." The author rightly considers the King James' Version to be the highest type of English literature.

OUR SENTRY GO. By Jeannette Grace Watson. Ralph Fletcher Seymour, Publisher. Pages 342. Illustrated.

This book is a compilation of letters, diary entries and other manuscripts connected with the war-time period, in Paris, compiled and written by the wife of the Rev. Samuel M. Watson, D. D., rector of the American Church in Paris, during those terrible days.

Mrs. Watson presents a vivid picture of the tragedies that occurred during those eventful four years, when she and her husband were serving their Church and their country in a splendid way. Its perusal brings back to remembrance the fearful suddenness with which the storm broke in Europe, leaving people stranded and bewildered.

Her opening pages present Ambassador Myron D. Herrick as one heroic figure performing almost herculean tasks, for American citizens, who found themselves overwhelmed by the storm of war. The book has peculiar interest for Church people, for reason of the fact that our clergymen and Bishops made the rectory of Trinity Church their headquarters when in Paris. The book is beautifully bound and abundantly illustrated, and, although the style is somewhat sketchy, the material it contains make it exceedingly interesting reading. The horrors it records should make every Christian redouble their efforts in behalf of world peace, to prevent the recurrence of such a catastrophe.

S T. PAUL ON TRIAL. By J. Ironside Still, M. A., D. D. George H. Doran, New York. Pp. 300.

The author of this book attempts something entirely new in his discussion of St. Paul's Epistles and the Acts of the Apostles. He believes that the Acts, which has heretofore been looked upon as the first volume of Church history, was written as a brief for the defense of St. Paul in his trials at Rome. Having assumed this position he proceeds to prove it with considerable skill, showing a thorough knowledge of the book itself, and of careful reading relating to it. We doubt if many will be brought to Dr. Sill's own conclusions. However, his presentation of them will be found interesting to those who care for Bible study of a critical character.

M.

THE SHOUT OF THE KING. By the Rev. Ernest Raymond. George H. Doran, New York. Pp. 176.

The twenty sermons contained in this book will be found interesting by those who care for reading of this character. Ministers and lay-readers who wish to make an address in connection with their services will find the book thoroughly suggestive, and fresh in the material used. These addresses were prepared to be used before large audiences, covering every class of society. They show a literary taste in the selection of brief metrical verses for carrying home an idea. The divisions are short and forceful.

THE EVERYDAY BIBLE. By Charles M. Sheldon. Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. Pp. 640. Price $2.00.

The author of this volume is already widely and favorably known to a great circle of readers through his former production "In His Steps," and his other Christian activities in the literary field. The present book is designed to fill what is rapidly becoming a well-nigh universal desire, namely, to read the Bible with greater intelligence, and greater ease by having it arranged as any other book would be in a chronological order. Mr. Sheldon has simply taken the American Version of the Bible and omitted genealogies, repetitions and duplications, and used it in short chapters, arranging it historically down to "The Story of Nehemiah" in the Old Testament. There he inserts under the heading of drama and poetry the Books of Job, Psalms, The Song of Songs, and Lamentations. It is interesting to note that he does not place the Book of Jonah with the books of prophecy, but classifies it under the reading "Stories of Jewish Life in Contact with Other Nations," in which group, he also places the Books of Ruth, Esther and Daniel.

In the New Testament, "The Life of Jesus" is followed with extracts from the four gospels. The Book of the Acts is entitled "The Rise and Growth of the Early Church." It is rather a pity that he has not arranged the Epistles in the date of their composition, but gives them in the Biblical order, according to their length. The book is attractively and substantially bound, with marker and gold edges, and will be found valuable for daily devotional readings, or as a reference volume, since it is exceptionally well indexed.

M.

STUDENTS' HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND. By the Rev. William Walter Smith. George H. Doran Company, New York.

No less an authority than Professor Foakes-Jackson commends this little volume in the highest terms. The position of the author as secretary of the New York Sunday School Commission has brought home to him the importance of wider knowledge of the geographical conditions of the Holy Land, and he has prepared this book with its numerous maps and illustrations especially for the Sunday-school teacher and Bible student. The most recent road and railroad construction in Palestine is included in the author's survey as well as the ancient journeyings of the Israelites. It is somewhat unfortunate that both the illustrations and maps are on a very small scale. If it were otherwise, however, it would have been impossible to get so many into such a small space.

M.

A GUIDE TO RELIGIOUS PAGEANTRY. By Mason Chum. The Macmillan Company. New York. Pp. 134.

The title of this volume describes it. It is exactly what it purports to be, simply a "Guide" to religious pageantry, not confined to Biblical scenes, but including missionary travels and scenes from Church history of both ancient and modern times. The book will be found exceedingly useful to the heads of Church organizations finding pageants either for money-making or to hold the interest of young people.

M.

STOWE'S CLERICAL DIRECTORY OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH—1924. Edited and Published by the Rev. Andrew David Stowe, D. D. Pp. 359. Price $5.50.

This is the last edition of the directory which the author has published for several years. It contains a brief sketch of practically all of the clergy in the American Church, and a list of clergy in the Church of England in Canada. It is most valuable as a ready reference for getting the important events in the life of any one of our clergy. It is convenient in size and clear in print and should be in the office of every Diocesan Secretary and editor of the Diocesan paper.

M.

THE WALKS AND WORDS OF JESUS (Revised Edition). Originally compiled by the Rev. M. N. Olmsted. The Oxford University Press (American Branch), Publishers. Pp. 404. Price $1.50.

Often a clergyman or Sunday-school teacher desires to get the words of Christ upon some specific subject or incident, and in such case this little book will be found of tremendous value as it publishes in contrasting type the events of Our Saviour's life, and His actual words. In eighty-one short chapters it follows the life of Christ in Bible language from His birth to His ascension. As an appendix it contains "New sayings of Jesus" and "Fragments of a Lost Gospel," as discovered and translated by the Messrs. Grenfeld and Hunt. "On behalf of the Egypt Exploration Fund." A convenient and useful little volume.

M.

WHITE LIGHT NIGHTS. By O. O. McIntyre. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. Publishers. Pp. 274.

A series of brief and clever sketches that will appeal to admirers of the O. Henry style. The incidents which make the basis for the witty and sometimes satirical comments are gathered in all parts of the country, and deal with many phases of human experience. The reader will find it attractive reading, especially for odd moments, as it is broken into divisions that can easily be read in a short time.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Editor.

HELLO, NEIGHBOR!

What would you think of a neighbor who only called every fifteen years? On the face of it it would seem that such a friend was neglectful of his community obligations. Visits, however, like all other things are very dependent on circumstances. It makes a good deal of difference how far one has to come, how often you expect them to do so.

The neighbor we have in mind has to travel about sixty million miles to make the call that will be paid us on the date printed on the current number of the Southern Churchman, August 23, 1924. Traffic laws, however, do not interfere with its progress, as he comes sailing along at the rate of nine hundred miles a minute, and travels day and night. There is nothing intrusive about his visits. He does not poke his head in at the kitchen window or do anything impudent like that. In fact, when we say, "How do you do?" to him he will still be thirty-four million miles away from us. As some of you may have already guessed the visitor of whom we are writing is none other than the planet Mars, which will be "In Opposition at perihelion" on the above date, which interesting event occurs about every fourteen years. This year he comes closer than he ever has before since people have been measuring the spaces between planets.

We know a good many things about Mars, for instance that its year is six hundred and eighty-seven days, and its day is twenty-four hours and thirty-seven minutes and twenty-three seconds, that its density is about one-tenth of that of the earth. This latter fact tells us that its temperature must be very much colder than ours; for it is the density of the atmosphere that effects temperature more than the distance from the Equator, as is evidenced by the snow caps on Mount Kenia, which are continually bathed in the most direct and brilliant sunshine.

Another thing that is certainly known about Mars, is that it has straight, dark lines, which have been called canals, across its surface, and that there are large circles of darkness at the intersections of these lines. At the last visit of the planet in 1909 it was discovered that there were at least fifty-seven twin canals, that is, running parallel to each other; and apparently of the same width and length.

These canals point to the almost certain fact that there are intelligent beings on this planet, and that, therefore, it is worth while to try to speak to them. Of course, the Martian language is somewhat vague to us, as we have not discovered any megaphones as yet that will carry across the millions of miles between us. So in seeking for a universal language that will be common to planets as well as to nations our astronomers have decided to talk in arithmetic. If there are intelligent beings on Mars they are probably a great deal more intelligent than we are, because they have been there a good deal longer, at least they may have been, for Mars is several hundred thousand days older than the Earth. Nevertheless, when you begin to talk in arithmetic it doesn't do to start too far along. It would be extremely difficult to use the square or cube root as a medium for conversation.

Scientists are going to say "Hello" to Mars by telling our friends over there that two and two are four. The way they are going to do it is by huge light flashes from the Jungfrau, Switzerland. They will send two flashes in rapid succession, then make a pause and send two more in the same way, then another pause, and four in rapid succession. These flashes will be sent from a gigantic electro-heliographing apparatus that is designed to concentrate the rays from the dazzling snow-fields and hurl them in a super-searchlight beam through space.

After this is done telescopes from all parts of our Earth will be concentrated on Mars, watching for a reply. The Martians, if there are any, will certainly know a great deal more about arithmetic than we do, but they may condescend to "men of low estate," and reply with some such simple remark as "three times two are six." They could say this with three pairs of signals followed by six signals in short succession.

Our readers must not think that we have abandoned the avocation of preaching Christianity in the Community, through the columns of the Southern Churchman to take up the study of astronomy, for all that we have said and more, too, can be found in the July number of the "Worlds Work."

This visit of Mars, however, has a community value, as has anything that concentrates world-wide thought upon one subject. Our scientists will make observations from Flagstaff, Arizona. Professor Camille Flammarion is said to have arranged a telescope in a mine in Chile to make his observations with underground surroundings. Swiss and German astronomers will be watering from the Jungfrau. There will be thousands of other minor observatories filled with eager watchers throughout the world. All these curious minds will be concentrated upon one line of thought, and, after it is all over, the information required will be compiled and compared by men of many nationalities. This will create a common unity, and a common unity makes a Community.

Another value that the invasion of Mars has in a religious journal is to call attention to the fact that astronomy is a very exact science. Weights, movements, and densities are calculated with the utmost accuracy. The reason that this can be done is because the men who do it are basing their figures upon the operation of God's machine, and that mechanism never fails, or alters, or gets out of repair.

Once the writer was inspecting a power plant at a mining town. In the engine room a huge fly wheel was revolving in silent speed with a power that seemed almost limitless. The engineer pointed to it proudly and showed the points of interest and value that the machinery had with that pride which all good mechanics feel in the implements with which they work. We then stepped into an adjoining room, where were shelves upon shelves loaded with bolts and taps and rods and nuts and cog-wheels, and every conceivable piece of casting. "What in the world is this place!" we exclaimed, thinking we had passed into a wholesale hardware establishment by mistake.

"This," said the engineer, "is the room for the duplicate parts. We could not run a week, unless we had the facsimile for each part of our machinery, so that when it breaks we can come in here and replace it immediately."

Have you ever heard of any "duplicate parts" for God's machinery?

Yet His machinery in the heavens has been running for millions of years with a precision which enables men to use its movements for the most delicate calculations.

Will not the Hand that guides the worlds guard and protect us, His children, with equal care and solicitude?

A VACATION THOUGHT.

God has given us three books in which to read the story of our relations with Him—the Bible, the human soul, and Nature.

This is the time of the year when we have the best chance to look into this last. Never is the outdoors world so beautiful and so alluring as in summer. It calls us away from all our ordinary walks and ways and fairly begs us to share in its freshness and inspiring beauty. Those of us who can do respond to the call, and find rest and peace for jaded nerves and tired bodies.

But let us not forget that it is God's book in which we are reading again of His loving-kindness. It is His gift of rest and peace that we enjoy. In the enjoyment of the gifts let us not forget the Giver.

Worship as well as play are needed to really furnish that spiritual restfulness which we all need in these hurried days.—Frank Arthur McElwain, Bishop of Minnesota.

A VISIT TO THE MISSIONARY DISTRICT OF WYOMING

By Fannie P. Brady,

Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, Diocese of West Virginia.

THREE years after Bishop Thomas had taken charge of the Missionary District of Wyoming, I visited him and Mrs. Thomas at Cheyenne. I also had a most interesting trip with the Bishop through a great part of the State, visiting the Indian Reservation and many other places. I have always recalled that trip with as much interest and pleasure as that felt for a trip abroad.

We traveled by stage coach, with horses, forded rivers and found very few good roads for automobile. This summer I had the pleasure of another trip to Wyoming and was so struck with the great development of both State and Church that I wish to tell something of it.

During the twelve years just passed the frontier has almost disappeared, a tunnel lets the train go under the 10,000 foot pass, over which we went in a stage; fine roads allow automobiles in every direction, large auto busses have supplanted the stage coaches and the country is becoming more populated. Not closely populated by any means, but still only once in our drive across the State did we go fifty miles without seeing any living human being! Twelve years ago they told me they hoped the foothills would prove to have oil and gas, and now Wyoming is, I believe, the largest oil producing State in the Union.

But I am more interested in telling of the growth of the Church than of the State. The clergy of the District now number twenty-four instead of the sixteen twelve years ago, and many churches have been built. In this District the old reproach that the Episcopal Church comes in with the Parlor Car can never be made. The work started by Bishops Randall and Talbot has been ably carried on by Bishop Thomas, who has never missed a chance to get in among the first. I remember hearing of his jumping from a train in the first year he was out there to be among the first bidders for town lots just being sold by auction in the wilderness, he securing one of the best lots for a future church in a future city.

But I was particularly struck with the Institutional work. In his first year in Wyoming, Bishop Thomas discovered that, in the vicinity of Jackson Hole, three women out of seven had died in childbirth. He determined there should be a hospital in the State near the place, and, by the help of friends of the Church in the East, it was made possible. In 1912 I saw it in Lander just under roof; this summer I saw it again a well established, self-supporting hospital of twenty-five beds. Indeed, I believe it has been self-supporting almost from the start. Another hospital of sixteen beds has been established in the Jackson Hole country and it is also self-supporting.

In Laramie the first orphanage in the State was founded by Bishop Thomas in 1912, and it cares for fifty-four children, and has found homes for many; the securing of good homes for the children being the primary object, rather than keeping them for years in the orphanage. The building and grounds for the orphanage were secured from the Roman Catholic Church at a great bargain, and are now worth many times the price of purchase.

In Laramie is the Cathedral Church built by Bishop Talbot with the beautiful side chapel which is adorned by a remarkably fine mural painting of the Transfiguration placed there by Mrs. Thomas and her sister in memory of their mother, Mrs. Prince. This chapel is used on many occasions. By the generosity of friends of the Church within and without the District it has been made possible lately to secure the group of the whole city square upon the corner of which the Cathedral stands. The Dean's house and the Canonry, now used as the Bishop's house, are the only other buildings upon the square. Two buildings were moved across the street and form the temporary quarters of Sherwood Hall, the Cathedral School for Boys, which will be opened by the Church this fall. They are frame, but will make a comfortable beginning, housing thirty boys. No doubt these quarters will soon be outgrown if Sherwood Hall attains to the same degree of popularity which is enjoyed by Ivinson Hall, the Cathedral School for girls, which was established by the Bishop in 1920, when the handsome house and grounds were given the Church by Mr. Ivinson in memory of his wife.

The plan upon which these schools are run is new to me and I think admirable. The Church gives the children of the far distant ranches a Christian home in the town, and confines the teaching of that home to that of religion, manners and morals. The boys and girls attend the High School, which is one of the best in the State, and the University Training School. Laramie is the State's educational center, so that there are many advantages. An exceptionally fine library in Ivinson Hall is at the disposal of the pupils, and the supervision and care of both schools will be under trained specialists.

The Church is strongly entrenched in Laramie, although with the exception of the Cathedral and Ivinson Hall, the buildings are not handsome. The Bishop's house is much too small and inadequate, and, as has been just stated, the buildings for Sherwood Hall are only temporary; but the Church owns the ground, which will be increasingly valuable, and, in time, a handsome group of buildings will, no doubt, adorn the Cathedral square. It is beautiful now with the smooth green lawn and the Memorial Peace Cross in the center.

I was very happy to be present on July the Fourth when this handsome cross was dedicated to the memory of the twenty-nine sons of the Church in Wyoming who gave their lives in the Great War. It was a solemn and beautiful occasion—practically all of the clergy were present in their vestments, the Bishop, the choir and a delegation from the Post of the American Legion, while a troop of cavalry from Cheyenne formed three sides of a square about the Cross. A service was conducted by the Bishop, and excellent addresses were made by General Jenkins and by the Hon. T. S. Taliaferro, Jr. The Rev. Mr. Smith, whose son's name, "Franklin C. Smith, Jr.," is graven upon the cross, pronounced the sentence of dedication.

The next day I attended the consecration of a five-acre tract, which had been given the Church for a burial ground for those who might need it. The first interment was that of one of the Church workers, the gardener of Ivinson Hall, who was much lamented.

The Clericus was assembled at this time for the annual meeting, which lasted a week, when they were the guests of the Bishop and Mrs. Thomas. This reminded me of the old Councils in West Virginia, now limited to two days. I believe nothing can be of greater value to the District than this—for the clergy to come together for instruction, for inspiration and for the development of that most valuable part of all organization—a strong feeling of esprit de corps. I was greatly struck with the fine personnel of that body of clergy whom Bishop Thomas has enlisted. At this meeting the Rev. Dr. Gardner of Stanford University gave them a series of addresses on the intellectual life of the Ministry.

But the most interesting part of the work of the Church in Wyoming is that carried on for the Indians. We drove from Laramie to the Wind River Reservation and stayed at the mission for several days. General Grant, when President, committed to the Protestant Episcopal Church the responsibility for the religious teaching of both the Shoshoni and Arapahoe Indians upon this Reservation. For thirty-three years the work was carried on according to the best plans of the day, but with results which were not satisfactory. For no matter how great adaptability and improvement the young people might show while at the schools there was always seen an alarming tendency to revert to type.

Eight years ago St. Michael's Mission, under the care of the Rev. Royal H. Balcom, started upon what is, I believe, a pioneer method of work among the Indians. It has already proved itself a success, and has met with considerable notice from psychologists and experts in Indian work, who are watching the experiment with great interest.

Perhaps the fundamental reason for this success is in the approach to the Indians themselves. Instead of trying to make white men of them, they are encouraged to have pride in their traditions and ways, and to hold on to the best in the old life and to take from the white man's civilization only that which is practical and good.

The group of buildings in St. Michael's Mission was laid out after Indian ideas in a circle. Here is a chapel, school, work shop and store and a number of interesting little houses in which the members of the staff and the Indian girls live. The Unit houses for the girls are for a family of ten girls of different ages, presided over by a white house-mother.

These girls are to be the future home-makers of the tribe living in the teepees on the ranches and they are taught to do the work with only such implements as can be bought in the store and used in the teepees. Mr. Balcom tells of seeing in a large government school a number of girls using electric irons, and it occurred to him that the boys might just as well be taught to run elevators—for the knowledge would be just as useful in their four wall ten by ten teepees. The water is even carried to these Unit houses by the boys, and stored in barrels and cisterns; as that is the way it must be kept on their allotments. Since much of the sickness among the Indians comes from filth, they are first of all trained to keep their houses clean, and to place emphasis upon this, the kitchen is the first room one enters.

The boys being the future providers of the homes are quartered in one large building as much cheaper, and they are trained to run the farm and its varied activities. The farming is diversified according to the needs of this Reservation, and close touch is kept with the Agricultural Departments of County and State. Their herd of pure-bred Holstein cattle ranks among the best in the State, also their pure-bred hogs and sheep. The chickens have taken many prizes and the poultry yard is quite up to date and paying its way.

In all departments, although there is regular school work, the aim is to give practical instruction to both boys and girls in the kind of work they must be able to do when they return to their ranches, including the necessary trades of blacksmith, wheelwright, carpenter, etc. The store is for the benefit of the Indians to teach them how and what to buy. It is planned soon to start a bank to teach them thrift. The simple chapel is a beauty with the heavy door and the walls adorned with Indian and Christian symbols in rich colors. The seats are rustic benches, and the clear window back of the altar frames a marvelous view of a snow-capped mountain range—snow-capped in July.

We saw a number of Indians, although it was vacation time. A number of the men called in the house in the evening and smoked—passing the pipe from one to another. We wished we could have stayed over Sunday to see them in the services at the church. At Easter time it must be most impressive to see sixty or more Arapahoe men in their bright blankets take the Communion. The Arapahoe is naturally religious and they are custodians of the sacred pipe. Already the influence of the ninety or more children, who are trained each year in St. Michael's Mission, is seen upon the ranches, and the approval of all experts for work among the Indians lends great encouragement to those in charge.

The most distressing problem is that of the eradication of Trachoma, the disease which causes so much blindness among the Indians on all the Reservations. A great deal has been written of it lately in the papers, but while the Government has been for years very particular about admitting any immigrants with Trachoma, every Reservation is a hot bed for it and no adequate steps have ever been taken to stamp it out. In this case, as in many others, the Government's policy has been one of neglect, well deserving of the reproach "A Century of Dishonor." The latest report of the Government Physician on the Reservation (June 1924) shows three hundred and thirteen new cases of Trachoma out of an examination of three hundred and forty-one Arapahoes of all ages and both sexes. This is a fearful state of affairs. The Physician urges upon the Government the formation of several hospital camps or clinics for the treatment of the disease, stating that, in his opinion, a sufficient medical force could eradicate it in from five to seven years.

Without waiting for the probable tardy action of the Government, the Church is planning to have a graduate nurse at the dispensary on September 1, who will specialize in the care and treatment of Trachoma under the direction of the Government Physician. This is entirely inadequate but it will help.

Except for the work here and at Fort Defiance, Arizona, in which our West Virginia Women's Auxiliary has been especially interested, I am told there is no other effort made by the Church to prevent and to cure the suffering caused by this frightful, yet preventable disease.

It is with a note of profound thankfulness that I close this sketch—thankfulness that here among these people of the plains the Church is showing a true and wise leadership; caring for the bodies as well as for the souls of the people and building a sure foundation for the future by the training and education of the young; so that—the words came often to my mind as a prophecy as we crossed over it—"They that dwell in the wilderness shall kneel before Him."

Church Intelligence

Important Meetings To Be Held in October.

The Secretary of the National Council sends the following information about several important meetings to be held in New York early in October.

October 1-5: The Executive Board of the Woman's Auxiliary will meet in the Hotel Gramatan, Bronxville, N. Y. Miss Lindley is to be back before that time.

October 2-3: The Continental Domestic Missionary Bishops will hold their annual meeting. This organization has been of the greatest service in establishing a unified policy for missionary work in continental United States. At this time the Bishops will consider the budgets of the missionary districts in the United States and make their recommendations to the National Council through the Department of Missions.

October 6-7: The six Departments of the National Council will hold their meetings prior to the meeting of the National Council on October 7.

October 8: A special meeting of the House of Bishops has been called for October 8. Among the matters which will come before this meeting of the Bishops will be the election of missionary Bishops for Mexico, Nevada, and North Texas, and the election of a suffragan bishop for the District of Hankow, China.

There is also to be a joint session of the House of Bishops and the National Council, at which conferences will be held on the preparation of the program for the coming Triennium, which must be presented to the General Convention in 1925 for its consideration and action. This will be the first joint meeting ever held by the House of Bishops and the National Council.

Technical Material.

There is shortly to be a new leaflet, No. 4533, for use in connection with the children's Birthday Thank Offering. It has a new story about Liberia, where the Offering is to go. There are also new envelopes, No. 4512, more attractive than the old ones, for the children's use, to hold their offerings. Both the leaflet and the envelopes are free to Church Schools on request, from the Department of Religious Education, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

There are now four study books on China for Divisions II to VI of the Church School Service League: ages 4-7, China Primary Picture Stories, 50 cents; ages 8-11, "Mook," 40 cents (teaching programs, 15 cents); ages 12-14, Forward March (revised), 35 cents (teaching programs, 20 cents, pictures, 10 cents); ages 15 and over, China's Real Revolution, 50 cents (teaching programs, 20 cents, pictures, 10 cents). There may also be had a postcard painting book, Children of China, 60 cents, and a set of "cut-outs," the model of a Chinese street, Shopping in China, 50 cents. Any of these may be ordered from the Bookstore, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Church Boarding and Day Schools.

A revised list of Church Boarding and Day Schools is to appear in September as Bulletin 47 (No. 30 revised) of the National Council's series. The Bulletins are sent to parochial clergy. Copies may be obtained free from the Department of Religious Education, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York. One of our missionaries in Latin America, by the judicious use of a single copy of this list, when it first appeared, succeeded in sending four American boys to Church Schools.

Millions Take Part in Wembley Service.

At the service held at Wembley in connection with the observance of Empire Day, the Archbishop of Canterbury was the preacher. His Grace took for his text the words "Thy Kingdom Come" and in introducing his sermon, which was a gem of literary expression, patriotic sentiment and statesmanlike insight, the Archbishop commented on the uniqueness of the occasion. He said: "At this hour and in these surroundings, no other text seems possible than the words from Our Lord's own prayer for the world which He came to save. Does every one who hears me realize the tremendous fact that we are at this moment taking part in the largest religious service which, as a deliberate act, the world has ever seen? In our prayer and praise and purpose, millions, it may well be, are taking personal part. Perhaps 80,000 people gathered here, and illimitable thousands far away, paused a few minutes since, to face that fact in silence. My few words, short and simple, are a mere trifling item in the great output of uplifted thought."

Missionary to the Deaf Honored.

At the thirty-eighth convention of the Pennsylvania Society for the Advancement of the Deaf, held in Trinity Parish Hall, Williamsport, Pa., August 14, 15 and 16, the Rev. Franklin Charles Smielau, one of the Church's rapidly increasing number of missionaries to the Deaf, was presented with a testimonial purse of $400 in gold. Over three hundred deaf people were present at the Convention.

This tribute to the Rev. Mr. Smielau was by no means of sudden or spontaneous growth, but the cumulative outpouring of many years of sincere appreciation on the part of his deaf parishioners and friends. Since his ordination to the ministry over twenty-five years ago, the Rev. Mr. Smielau has been a forceful and beneficent leader in all movements for the social, moral and spiritual advancement of the Deaf, and not alone of the state of Pennsylvania, but also of the entire nation. Through his energetic efforts the Pennsylvania Home for the Aged and Infirm Deaf has been made self-supporting, new men have been brought into the ministry of the Church, new societies and missions of the Deaf have been organized and old ones endowed with new lease of life, the right of the Deaf to operate automobiles has been recognized by legislative enactment in many states, and their educational, social and industrial interests have been promoted in many ways.

Work Among the Deaf.

The Rev. Oliver J. Whildin, Missionary to the Deaf, Baltimore, Md., is arranging for his annual celebration of Ephphatha Day, which comes on the twelfth Sunday after Trinity, September 6. Similar celebrations are doubtless being arranged by other missionaries of the Church, also.

The Gospel for the twelfth Sunday relates the miracle of the healing of the deaf and dumb young man of Decapolis by Our Saviour, and is very properly regarded as the Magna Charta which led to the establishment of schools, churches, homes, associations and other beneficent institutions for educating and promoting the welfare of the Deaf. The first School for the Deaf in the United States was founded in Hartford, Conn., in 1815; the first Church Mission for the Deaf in New York City in 1856; the first Home for the Aged and Infirm Deaf in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in 1870. The first ordination of a Deaf man took place in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1876, and the first Bible Class was started in Baltimore, Md., in 1859.

At the present time there are more than one hundred and twenty schools for the Deaf in the United States, one college for their higher education, several churches, several hundred missions, and half a dozen homes for their aged and infirm. It is worthy of mention, and indeed a cause for congratulation, that our Church has from the very beginning assumed an active and advanced leadership in all these movements for the welfare of the Deaf.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D.

Trinity Diocesan Church.

The preacher at Trinity Diocesan Church at the eleven o'clock service and at the afternoon open-air service at the Washington Cathedral on Sunday, August 17, was the Very Rev. Samuel R. Colladay of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, Conn. Trinity Church is under the direct supervision of the Diocese and during the summer it has been arranged that the special preacher for the open-air service at the Washington Cathedral shall have charge of the Trinity morning service.

The Rev. Joseph Fletcher, rector of St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek Parish, is spending his vacation at Blue Ridge Summit, Pa. While there Mr. Fletcher has assisted the Rev. Frederick A. Cook, rector of the Church of the Transfiguration. Many Washington people spend their summers at Blue Ridge Summit enjoying the services of its beautiful church and the ministry of its able rector, and it is good that from time to time there are visiting clergymen to help in this good work. Mr. Cook has several missions under his care and could hardly cover the ground without the aid now and then during the summer of a visiting clergyman.

Mr. Karl B. Keferstein, of St. Margaret's Vestry, has his summer home at the Summit and is treasurer of the Church of the Transfiguration there.

The Rev. Thom Williamson, former rector of Advent Parish and well known for his diocesan activities, was the preacher at the Church of the Advent on Sunday, August 17. Mr. Williamson is now the rector of the Church of the Ascension, Middletown, Ohio. He and his wife are taking a motor trip through several nearby states and much to the delight of his old Advent parishioners, included a visit to Washington.

The Rev. Dr. J. J. Dimon, rector of St. Andrew's Church, is spending the month of August at Greenwich, Conn., and during his absence the services at St. Andrew's are being conducted by the Rev. Charles Crusoe, of Aquasco, Md.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan.

Tragic Death of the Rev. and Mrs. D. D. Waugh.

The Rev. Daniel D. Waugh, rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Watertown, Diocese of Albany, came with Mrs. Waugh to New York to serve in St. Agnes' Chapel, Trinity Parish, during the vacation period of the vicar, the Rev. Dr. William W. Bellinger. They went to live in an apartment in Ninety-second Street, quite near to the Chapel. A fire of incendiary origin broke out at night. Confused in the strange house, and seemingly cut off by the flames, Mr. and Mrs. Waugh jumped to the street, from a fourth story window, and Mrs. Waugh died soon afterward. A few days later Mr. Waugh died from injuries. With the rector and his wife were two sons, but they are uninjured, and a daughter who was in California. She came to New York upon learning of her father's serious condition, but arrived after his death. Mr. Waugh was once an assistant in Trinity Parish, and later at Grace Church, Utica. He has been at Watertown for six years. The funeral was held in his parish church on August 12. The fire is declared to have been set by some one who was crazed with liquor, and sought excitement.

Ninetieth Anniversary of Zion Church, Dobbs Ferry-on-Hudson.

The rector, wardens and vestrymen of Zion Church, Dobbs Ferry-on-Hudson, are making preparations for the celebration of the Ninetieth Anniversary of the Consecration of the Church. This celebration will take place in the fall.

The original church building, which has been enlarged twice, was consecrated in 1834. Washington Irving was among the first vestrymen of the church and his cousin, Oscar Irving, was the first junior warden. Former parishioners are asked to communicate with the rector, the Rev. Charles E. Karsston, Zion Church Rectory, Dobbs Ferry-on-Hudson, New York, as their interest in the coming celebration is earnestly solicited.

Service For War Veterans.

Forty Civil War veterans, the oldest ninety-four and the youngest seventy-seven, passed through New York from Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky and Missouri, on their way to the Grand Army Encampment at Boston. Upon invitation of the Little Church Around the Corner, through the assistant, the Rev. William L. Phillips, they attended service at ten A. M. on Sunday, August 10. Choir and organist volunteered their services, it being vacation time. Patriotic hymns were sung, and Mr. Phillips gave a brief address. The old soldiers wore their 1865 uniforms and medals. The Grand Army train resumed its journey to Boston at noon.

Visiting Preachers.

On Sunday, August 17, the pulpits of many New York churches were filled with well-known visiting clergymen.

The Rt. Rev. John Newton McCormick, D. D., Bishop of Western Michigan, preached morning and afternoon, in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine.

The Rt. Rev. Hiram R. Hulse, D. D., Bishop of Cuba, was the preacher in the Church of the Heavenly Rest, Fifth Avenue.

In St. Bartholomew's Church the Very Rev. Walter Robert Matthews, a chaplain to King George, Dean of King's College, London, and chaplain to Gray's Inn, was the preacher at the morning service.

Services in the morning in the Church of the Incarnation were in charge of the Rev. Dr. Franklin J. Clark, Secretary of the National Council of the Episcopal Church.

The Rev. Dr. Duncan H. Browne, now rector of St. James' Church, Chicago, and formerly Dean of the Cathedral, Denver, Col., preached in the morning at St. Thomas' Church.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The Church Institute For Colored Churchmen.

The twelfth annual session of the Church School Institute for Colored Churchmen in the Diocese of South Carolina was held in the Church of the Redeemer, Pineville, on August 8-10, inclusive, the Rev. J. J. Thomas, rector.

The institute was opened with the celebration of the Holy Communion by Archdeacon Baskervill. The opening address before the Institute was made by its President, Mr. Wm. L. Pyatt.

Among the instructors for the Institute were the Rev. Messrs. C. A. Harrison, George E. Howell, H. C. Banks, J. J. Thomas and Archdeacon Baskervill. Nurse Maude E. Callen delivered an unusually strong address on Health and Sanitation.

A large number of delegates and Church School workers throughout the Diocese were in attendance. The members of Redeemer and their friends in the large rural community crowded the church edifice at all sessions of the Institute. It was the consensus of opinion that it was the most helpful and instructive meeting ever held at Pineville. The next session of the Church School Institute will convene in the Church of the Epiphany, Summerville, in August, 1925.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. H. B. Delaney, D. D., Suffragan.

Emmanuel Church, Warrenton, Observes One Hundredth Anniversary.

The one hundredth anniversary services of Emmanuel Church were held on Sunday, August 3, the church having been consecrated on the first Sunday in August, 1824, by the Rt. Rev. John Stark Ravenscroft, first Bishop of North Carolina. The morning service at eleven o'clock was conducted by the rector, the Rev. B. N. De Foe Wagner. His eloquent sermon on "Mastering Memories," from the text, "It is good to be here," developing his theme from the thrilling experiences of St. Peter, one of the three witnesses of the Divine Transfiguration, was followed by a celebration of the Holy Communion. The following lines written by the Rev. Mr. Wagner were sung immediately before the sermon:

Emmanuel Centennial Lyric.

God of our fathers, Lord enthroned o'er all;
Lo, we Thy sons in this Thy temple meet;
Before its holy altar-shrine to fall,
Off'ring devotion as the incense sweet.

Jesus, Emmanuel, through these hundred years
A myriad of Thy mercies didst reveal;
Dispelling by Thy presence gloom and fear:
Heirs of a hallowed past before Thee kneel.

O, Holy Comforter, Our Guide and Friend,
O'erflow the confines of this sacred place:
Vouchsafe Thy sevenfold light unto the end,
Till we Christ's glory see with unveiled face.

When earthly tabernacles silent lie,
And all our sacraments below shall cease;
Lead Thou to newer temples, fair and high,
Raised up in beauty to eternal peace.
Amen.

The organist and choir did fine work and the old familiar hymns took on new meaning as the congregation joined heartily in the singing. The church was crowded with an interested and reverent congregation, including many from a distance, and some whose great grandfathers were among the first vestrymen. The light shed from one hundred candles and the flowers arranged in and about the chancel, added beauty and impressiveness to the service.

In the afternoon the Centennial reunion at four o'clock, brought together a congregation which filled the church to overflowing. The gallery was occupied by the colored people, most of them members of All Saints Church, which was started as a mission years ago, by members of the congregation of Emmanuel and has grown to be an independent church. After a welcome by the rector and a selection at the organ by Miss Alice Vaiden Williams, who was organist when a school girl here, fraternal greeting from the other churches were extended, the Rev. T. J. Taylor, D. D., representing the Baptist, the Rev. J. T. Gibbs, D. D., the Methodist, and Mr. James Moore the Presbyterian. They were warm and sincere, going straight to the hearts of those to whom they were addressed, and cementing the good fellowship already existing between them.

A paper was read by Mr. Walter G. Rogers, Senior Warden, containing a condensed history of the parish from the time it was organized in 1821 to the present date. The closing address was made by the Rev. Louis N. Taylor, of Roanoke Rapids, in which he treated the future work of the Church. Steeped in the history of such a past, the future sends a challenge to the Church today. He made an earnest appeal for aggressive Christian Endeavor.

The benediction was pronounced by the rector and thus ended a service, the memory of which will linger long in the hearts of all present:

"Emmanuel, Emmanuel,
'God with us yet' we pray:
The music of the sweet-toned bell
Peals out in praise today.

"O memories, dear memories;
How ye around us throng!
As one of many centuries
Ends with thanksgiving song."

The Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire is having erected in Raleigh an apartment house, about which the "Asheville Citizen" makes the following editorial comment:

"Bishop Cheshire, as patriarch of the Episcopal Church in North Carolina, could preach timely sermons against the social customs of advertising houses for rent with the proviso, 'No children.' But the Bishop has done better; he is building in Raleigh an apartment house out of his lifetime savings with the announcement that couples with children will be given a preference of $5 a month less in rent. The Bishop evidently believes that 'Suffer little children to come unto Me and forbid them not' applies to the kingdom of home as well as to the Kingdom of Heaven. He must be persuaded that a civilization which in any way levies a tax on children is the opposite of a Christian civilization."

The Rev. Edgar C. Burnz, who recently resigned the rectorship of Preston Parish, Saltville, Va., has taken up headquarters at 307 Robinson Building, Charlotte, N. C., in the capacity of State Director of Near East Relief. Mr. Burnz comes to this position with a business experience acquired before he entered the ministry under Archdeacon E. A. Rich in Southwestern Virginia three years ago. It is hoped that he is leaving the active ministry only temporarily, as he is well equipped for a successful career in the Church.

Church Workers in the Carolinas are all invited to the conference on religious education to be held at Valle Crucis in the Diocese of Western North Carolina from August 23 to 29. The Rev. J. W. C. Johnson, of Gastonia, chairman of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, is in charge of arrangements.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

More Progress in Campbell County.

At Christ Church, about four and one-half miles northeast of Gladys, in Campbell County, a Parish House or Community Building is being erected. The Rev. T. C. Page, of Altavista, rector, is directing the work, in which he is receiving splendid assistance from the local people. The building is twenty-five by sixty feet, and contains a large stage for use in connection with assemblies of various kinds.

While modest in design and cost, this Parish House will undoubtedly prove a valuable contribution to the life of the community.

The Rev. Mr. Page now has under his care six churches: St. Peter's at Altavista, St. Andrew's Mission near Altavista, and the Church of Our Saviour near Evington, were recently referred to among the Church news items. The others are: Christ Church near Gladys, noted above, St. John's in another direction from Gladys, and the Church of the Good Shepherd at Evington.

Diocesan Department of Publicity.

The Rev. Messrs. Devall L. Gwathmey, Carleton Barnwell, Charles W. Sydnor and W. J. Alfriend and Mr. H. Powell Chapman, editor of the Roanoke Times, have recently been appointed by Bishop Jett as Associate Members of the Department of Publicity, of which the Rev. G. Otis Mead is Chairman.

31. Eleventh Sunday after Trinity.

Collect for Tenth Sunday After Trinity.

Let Thy merciful ears, O Lord, be open to the prayers of Thy humble servants, and, that they may obtain their petitions, make them to ask such things as shall please Thee; through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. Bartholomew's Day.

O Almighty and everlasting God, Who didst give to Thine Apostle Bartholomew grace truly to believe and to preach Thy Word; Grant, we beseech Thee, unto Thy Church, to love that Word which he believed, and both to preach and to receive the same; through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

I Often Wish—

I often wish that I might be Sailing o'er blue Galilee.
It seems as if that storied sea
Would bring the dear Christ nearer me.

At times I feel that I could sail
Its water in the fiercest gale
And know my courage would not fail,
Because His presence would prevail.

I've thought if I could press the sod
Made sacred by the Son of God,
I'd feel His touch on every clod
And find the bloodprints where He trod.

It seems to me if I could tread
In Galilee, even where the dead
For centuries have made their bed,
I should not find His presence fled.

Yet here at home, why should I sigh
For earth and sea that are not nigh,
When o'er my head the stars, the sky,
That arched o'er Him, I can descry?

There is no land but has a trace
Of sky, or air, or windswept space
With twinkling stars that lit His face,
Yet virtue lies in no such place.

He left no power in dirt or stone
To draw Him nearer to His own;
But where hearts yearn for Him alone
He comes and makes His presence known.

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST

The Institution of the Lord's Supper. I.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

St. John does not record the Institution. Suggested reasons vary from the claim that there was none to record and no John to record it, through quarrels of John's followers and Paul's, accusations of forgery and what not, down to sheer muddle-headed bewilderment. The traditional reason seems the most probable. It is, that John wrote to supply information the other Gospels lacked, and, therefore, had no need to record this.

There were some whom Our Lord eliminated from His bounty. At both miracles of the Loaves and Fishes the Scribes and Pharisees were absent. The Lord's Supper was postponed until Judas left the room.

After the tremendous tension of giving the sop, there could be no pause, or the eleven would compare notes and act. Our Lord took bread. The Greek means a loaf or cake of bread. Ederheim thinks it the half of the broken loaf or cake of Passover bread set aside, for ritual reasons, at the beginning of the feast. It was Pasch-bread, unleavened. This, having blessed, He broke and gave to them. He spoke in Aramaic, and Aramaic omits the copula "is," although Greek inserts it. Remembering this, and combining the four accounts, we find that He said:

"Take, eat this my body being given for you. Do this in remembrance of Me."

Also, after supper, He took the cup full of mingled wine and water, and, having blessed it, gave it to them. Remembering the Aramaic omission of the copula and combining the four accounts we find He said:

"Drink all ye of this cup, My blood in the new covenant, being shed for you and for many for the forgiveness of sins. Amen I say to you that I will not drink hereafter of the fruit of the vine until I drink it new with you in the Kingdom of God My Father. Do this, as often as ye drink, in remembrance of Me."

We have tried to make a fastidious-ly correct translation. Its first effect is surprise. Did He really say so little about the bread and so much about the wine? Perhaps the next is that, to the mind of Christ, the body was being broken, the blood being shed, though the physical body stood unwounded with the blood coursing through its unsevered veins. The bread is uncompromisingly His body; His breaking body. The wine is undoubtedly His blood; His flowing blood. Controversy rages, comment is reduplicated and supercompounded. Transubstantiation, consubstantiation and no substantiation; real presence, figurative presence and no presence at all, read their meanings into the scene. He said of the bread, "This, My body," of the wine, "This, My blood." At the time He said it His unshed blood was coursing through His unbroken flesh. The bread, then, was not His body in the same sense as the flesh of the hand that held it. Yet it was His body, for He said so. The wine was not His blood in the same sense as was the blood in the veins of the hand that lifted the cup. Yet it was His blood, for He said so. In what sense, then, was it His?

Frankly, we do not know. We affirm the Real Presence from the record, but lack information to define the manner of that presence. Logically, there are four possibilities and illogically a fifth. The bread and wine may be His body and blood in the sense in which the bread and wine at any memorial supper are the body and blood of the person in whose memory the supper is given—that is, illogically, poetically, or not at all. The bread and wine may be Our Lord's body and blood of the New Testament as the flesh and blood of the Lamb of God offered daily for the sins of the people, were His flesh and blood of the Old Testament; that is, not at all except in a covenant sense. This, the Covenant view, is implied by some of the extreme Protestant bodies, more or less clearly, and is logically possible. The other three possibilities have appealed respectively to the Greek the Latin and the Teutonic intellect. In each case the theory as to the bread applies to the wine also.

The earliest view, and, at one time, the only view, held by all Christendom, is that of the Greeks. Noting that Our Lord said, "Take, eat," before He said, "This is My Body," all Christendom at one time and Greek Christendom now holds that an essential part of the sacrament is the faithful consuming of the elements. The bread and wine, after the words of consecration have been said, but before they are consumed, are not yet fully the body and blood of Christ. They are not mere bread and wine; they are partially consecrated, since the prayer has been said which gives them power, when consumed by the believer, to become Our Lord's body and blood. But they are not His body and blood as yet. It would be an inaccurate, but not untrue statement to say that they are not yet fully consecrated. They become the body and blood of Christ just as they become the body and blood of the faithful believer. The offering, therefore, is an offering by the believer of his own being, body and spirit, to God; not an offering of the body and blood of Christ by themselves as distinct from His own body and blood. It is difficult to compress a whole theology into a sentence. When done, as here, the result is crude, imperfect, unpolished, but, we believe, not unfair or untrue.

Centuries later, among men who had forgotten Greek and viewed all life from a Latin standpoint, the next logical possibility was exploited. It is, that the bread becomes the body of Christ at the prayer of consecration, and so ceases to be bread. Its appearance, form, consistency, does not change, but in the deepest sense its real nature ceases to be bread and becomes Christ's body at a certain point in the prayer of consecration.

Shortly after, among men who looked at the world from Teutonic eyes, the next logical view was advanced. It is possible that the bread remains bread, but, after the prayer of consecration, becomes Christ's body also. It is thus at one and the same time bread and the body of Our Lord. Shocked by the terrible deductions of the logical Latin mind, which ends by worshipping the bread, they felt driven to this view.

The Anglican Communion has definitely pronounced against the Roman view. As to the others, it has refused to define. Our Articles, our Prayer of Consecration, our whole Communion office, may be read in perfect harmony with the Greek view or the Teutonic. The Greek view is so nearly forgotten in Western Christendom that many have never heard of it; but, when tested, our liturgy nowhere faults nor contradicts it.

To recapitulate: One school affirms Memorial or Covenant presence and gives reasons. Another affirms Transubstantiation and gives reasons. Our Church has pronounced these reasons inadequate. Another affirms that we have here called the Greek view. Another affirms Consubstantiation and gives reasons. The reasons seem inadequate, though back of them lies a half-truth. It is a half truth only. The Bread-o-Life speech at Capernaum gives the other half.

The best definition would affirm the real presence without glancing at the manner of that presence. It would be best, because we really have not the necessary information on which to state the manner. The nearest approach to such an ideal affirmation is that of the Anglican Communion, which says that the bread and wine are Christ's body and blood "Spiritually taken and received by the faithful at the Lord's Supper." Its excellence is that, in theology, "Spiritually" means "In a real but unknown manner," so that the Anglican Communion affirms that the bread and wine, when received with faith, are Christ's body and blood truly, but in an unknown manner. The defect is that "Spiritual" is colloquially used to mean quite a number of things besides "Unknown," and these are often and confusedly read into the saying.

The bread is His broken body because He said so. The wine is His shed blood because He said so. He did not say HOW: and, when He spoke, His blood ran unshed through His unbroken flesh.

A broken body and shed blood set forth a death; a body being broken, a blood being shed, herald the fact that some one is dying more surely than does any passing bell. The early Church knew well, before St. Paul told the forgetful ones of Corinth, that thus we show forth the Lord's death till He come.

Failure.

Gene Scott Wright.

You have played me false, O Life!
(Heavy years lie on my head)—
What was it you promised me
When Youth's heart beat strong and free,
Ere beginning of the strife,
Ere Ambition's fires were dead?

High my hopes, my courage high;
Eager-eyed, I faced the field:
Armored, nothing daunted me;
All my foes should conquered be.
Life, I challenge you, reply!
Why thus mocking deal with me?
Be your treachery now revealed.

The vessel to the potter cries,
"Why have you made me thus? But nay,—

Remonstrance useless and unwise
Ill becomes a thing of clay.
"One for honor, one for shame,
Who for this must bear the blame?"
None but you could make your shame,
And you to Honor's seat might rise.

You were shaped for common things,
But thought yourself of knightly mould.
Vainglory touched you with her wings,
And Pride held out her spurious gold.
The humble duties portioned you
Were steps to climb to higher things—
Had you but kept that path in view,
You might have come to sit with kings.

And Now What Next?

One reason why religion lacks popularity is its constant urge. In a small way, it produces action and in its larger scope it demands reforms. Neither an individual nor a group is ever satisfied if they are motivated by Christianity.

Hence we rightly say it is "living." A seed which comes to rest in the soil immediately starts to grow. If one gives it the most favorable surroundings of soil, moisture and sunshine, there is the greatest promptness and rapidity of change. There must come roots, and stem, branches, blossoms, fruit. And then, the tree sets about multiplication into forest.

And then forests develop an environment. They shade the ground, strew it with leaves, attach loose soil, anchor rolling stones, collect and conserve the rain, check the sliding snows and change the very face of nature. Places are never quite the same after something living has dwelt there. Not even the fury of storms nor the outpourings of volcanoes can cause more than a migration of that which is alive. Disasters and unfriendly surroundings may check development or compel another start. It is the glory of good husbandry when the advance is constant.

One need not worry lest Christianity be destroyed. What one fears and what one plans to prevent is opposition to its urge toward larger, wider influence. Naturally, its foes are hostile. They jeer, and sneer, and revile it. Evil is primeval rock with no power of production. Sin is slimy mud, swirled by currents and tides. Both resist intrusion. Evils seek to crush and sin tries to smother. Neither prevails when the Church intelligently pursues an onward course. We say intelligently, because the Christianity of our Age is of that highly developed type that has followed centuries of faithful cultivation.

"What next" for the disciples of Jesus-Christ is such an appreciation of the heritage from our fathers, as will make us value not only the inherent vigor of living faith, but likewise the acquired qualities of organization, beauty, tradition, freedom, property, and optimism. We need to realize that our religion is living. Because of its life, it will year by year reach out for more and better things. To resist this urge aids the world's evils and joins with its sins.—The Lutheran.

On Reading.

The Rev. Thos. F. Opie, D. D.

Few pastimes yield the large dividends that reading does. Pleasure, entertainment, knowledge, information, mental stimulation and spiritual growth are some of the returns that one gets for his reading. Reading gives us "the best thoughts of the greatest sages." Reading puts us in touch with "the tongues of the silent dead."

There are some who are "deep versed in books, but shallow in themselves," as Milton says, but they are few. Acquaintance with the literature of the ages gives the careful, appreciative reader depth and breadth.

The thoughts of the great are ours, if we will. Give heed to reading urges Paul, in writing to Titus. One's conversation soon betrays him, if he be not a reader. He has little to talk about and is dull, insipid, shallow, trivial. While there are today more books, more magazines and more daily papers by the millions than ever before, there are also more people by the millions who are doing little or no constructive reading.

Comparatively few read the daily press, fewer the current periodicals, still fewer the stimulating narrative, biography, history, fiction and travel found in good books, and almost nobody reads systematically, thoughtfully, searchingly the Bible! Tests by the scores have revealed the fact that the average person is distressingly ignorant of the greatest literary masterpiece of all time, the sacred Scriptures. The majestic periods of the ancient prophets, the poetic beauty of the Psalms, the wisdom and counsel of the Proverbs, the sweet simplicity of the Gospels, the impelling ethics of the Beatitudes, the excellent advice of the Epistles with their personal and doctrinal narrative, the mysterious, stirring diction of St. John's Revelation—what grandeur here! What profit in the reading! What spiritual and mental exercise! Give heed to such reading.

One should read broadly and deeply—systematically, discriminatingly, thoughtfully, absorbingly. As is your reading, so will be your thinking; as is your thinking, so will be your mind, your life, your spiritual trend—so will be your destiny! Upon reading depend learning, thinking, progressing. Take heed how and what you read! Follow Bacon's advice, "Read not to contradict and confute, nor to find talk and conversation (merely)—nor yet to believe and take for granted—but to weigh and consider."

His Pierced Feet.

Martha A. Kidder.

His pierced feet I see,
Who hung in anguish on the cruel cross,
So when I suffer bitter pain and loss,
Dear Lord, I think of Thee!

His pierced feet I see,
My own have faltered on the thorny way,
Yet Love shall turn my darkness into day,
Dear Lord, I think of Thee.

His pierced feet I see.
The road of life for me is rough and long,
But I can hear the holy angels' song,
Dear Lord, I think of Thee!

"Forbid Him Not."

There is no portion of Scripture that needs to be studied afresh for present application more than the story, often misapplied, still oftener hurried by as if one would rather not face its implications, the story of the man whom John and his companions forbade to work in the name of Jesus. Mark's account of it is fullest and offers a broader context in which to feel the force of its searching significance. The disciples thought they verily had good reason for silencing that witness for Christ. They considered themselves leaders, and rightly considered themselves leaders, in the Christian enterprise. It was no vain assumption of theirs that they were in a position to speak with unique authority in the field of following Christ. The story is to be studied, not for finding fault with the disciples, but for finding out the mind of Jesus in such premises.

Jesus was never more peremptory. "Forbid him not." The Master's reasoning invites study. The gist of His argument is the divine recognition, in the heart of the man forbidden to work because he followed not the lead of the disciples, an incipient force to be tolerated and cheered, not to be suppressed. "There is no man who shall do a mighty work in my name, and be able quickly to speak evil of me." The arresting word there is "quickly." Doing works in the name of Christ gets up an inner momentum which cannot be quickly reversed. The man was going in the right direction and going strong. Any one having such an inward drive toward service in the name of Christ cannot stop himself easily. Then let not other disciples of Christ try to stop him! That inward force, like the Father's revelation to Peter, is of God and to be held in reverence by all men.—The Rev. G. N. Luccock.

Light and Shade.

Life cannot all gladness be,
Neither yet all sorrow.
Cares that vex the heart today,
May all be gone tomorrow.

Do not grieve for pleasures past,
Nor pine that joy is fleeting.
Our days of sadness pass as soon;
Our griefs we see retreating.

Love the sunshine while it lasts,
Soon 'twill not be shining.
Then when clouds are overhead,
Find the silver lining!

Birds are singing, flowers bloom,
Mid the springtime gladness.
While they're with us feel the joy,
Look not out for sadness.

The Lee Triplets.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Little Lucy Lee smiled wistfully at Miss Ophelia, as she murmured with the rest of the first grade pupils, "Good afternoon, Teacher."

Slowly she left the schoolroom. And while most of the children ran joyously homeward Lucy lingered thoughtfully behind, thus trudging on quite alone.

"I wish Mother were like Miss Ophelia," she murmured. Then startled at her thoughts, she hastily apologized for them. "Course I don't mean 'xactly that. Mother is beautiful, and her dresses are beautiful, and her hair is lovely, and Miss Ophelia is—well, she is just Miss Ophelia—but I do love her!"

Indeed, Lucy loved her beautiful Mother. But unfortunately she saw very little of her. Mother had so many social duties and clubs and civic calls that 'most every minute of her time was taken. Sometimes, for a whole day, Lucy scarcely had a glimpse of her. And then at night when she was hoping that her mother would come in and hear her say her prayers, instead of Babette, the maid, and perhaps tell her a Bible or fairy story, mother would be so busy that she would just put her head in the door and say, "Good-night, Lucy, darling!" Father! Well, of course, Father was at the office all day. And every evening Mother would carry him off with her to a party or concert.

Lucy was lonely, as any little girl left to the care of servants would be. Lucy sighed as she walked up the stone steps that led to the big Lee mansion. A bark, sharp and clear, made her pause, then she turned and ran to the rear of the house. There at the back door, were three little puppies, shivering in the wind. For a minute, Lucy gazed at the friendly little creatures in amazement. Then, as they jumped up to her, wagging their tails in friendly greeting, she gave a cry of pleasure, and, dropping to the step, gathered the three tiny waifs into her arms.

"There are three of them," she said, as she looked at them and patted their black noses. "Triplets! And right here on our doorstep, too! It's a good thing they came when Mary's away." Mary was the Lee cook, and she strongly objected to dogs and cats. As Lucy petted the pets, her active mind was busy thinking how to care for them.

"If Mary would only let me keep them," she murmured. "But she won't! She says she'll leave if I bring a pet to the house. So of course I can't have one! But I do wish I could keep the triplets." Her eyes traveled to the end of the lawn where there was a large stone garage. Why not put them in there? Lucy arose holding her pets close and started for the shelter. In the garage she found a box. And after lining it with an old rug, she dragged it to a corner and put the puppies within. Then she hurried to the house for milk and food while the puppies whined their appreciation of their comfortable new home.

"Well, the first thing to do is to name you," Lucy announced in quite a matter-of-fact tone as she watched the last drop of milk disappear. "I'll call you Tom, Dick and Harry."

The next week Lucy was so busy caring for the Lee triplets that she had no time to be lonely. Tom, Dick and Harry were hungry little animals. And Lucy was a good nurse, so in a few days they were showing the result of the good care and food she gave them. For two weeks Lucy kept her pets hidden in the box, but as they grew bigger and stronger, they nearly climbed out of their quarters. One afternoon, Lucy skipped joyously homeward, not lagging behind as had been her custom before the coming of Tom, Dick and Harry, but hastening with all possible speed, so that she might enjoy playing with them in the garage for an hour or two before dinner.

She was within a square of her home when just ahead of her, in the center of the street she saw three familiar figures. They were Tom, Dick and Harry! They had succeeded in getting out of the box and away from the garage. Lucy ran towards her pets. But she had scarcely covered half the distance when the strangest thing happened! A man ran into the street and threw a net over the dogs. He gathered up the net, dogs and all, thrust them into a wagon, in which were many other barking animals, then drove away while Lucy stood still and watched him in stunned amazement.

Suddenly, Lucy awoke from her spell. She gave one more glance at the disappearing wagon and ran home as fast as her feet could carry her. Up the stone steps she sped and into the hall. No one greeted her or seemed to hear her. To the 'phone she ran and took down the receiver with a determined air. Lucy knew exactly what to do, for just a few months before a child in the neighborhood had been lost and she knew the police had found him.

"I want the police!" she demanded. And when the connection was made she explained hastily but clearly: "Policeman, the Lee triplets have been stolen. I said the Lee triplets. Yes, Tom, Dick and Harry Leé. A man just grabbed them and put them in a wagon and drove away. Find them please! Oh, do find Tom, Dick and Harry just like you found the Mrs. Smith's baby when it was lost."

Then Lucy called Miss Ophelia's number. This time she could not restrain her tears, and it was a sobbing voice that asked for Miss Ophelia and talked to her.

"Oh, Miss Ophelia, Tom, Dick and Harry are gone! You know Tom, Dick and Harry. I told you all about them. I haven't told any one else, 'cause no one would understand but you, Miss Ophelia. Yes, they're gone. A man caught them in a net and put them into a wagon and went off with them. Please, pray for Tom, Dick and Harry to be brought back." Then the forlorn little girl ran to the garage and huddled beside the empty box and cried.

An hour later she came into the house. Suddenly she paused and listened. Then she crept to the living room where her father, mother and three men were gathered. Two of the men were in blue uniforms. The third one held a paper in his hand, on the first page of which was the glaring headline:

"Lee Triplets Lost!"

"But we have no triplets," Mr. Lee told the men while Mrs. Lee insisted:

"I assure you we never heard of Tom, Dick and Harry. We didn't call the police and say that they were lost. They aren't our children, and we don't know anything about them."

Lucy ran forward eagerly.

"Oh, you mean my Tom, Dick and Harry, my triplets," she cried. "Have you found them?"

"Your triplets? Your Tom, Dick and Harry? Why, Lucy, child, what are you talking about?" Mr. Lee demanded.

"Why, I'm talking 'bout my triplets, Tom, Dick and Harry Lee. They were kidnapped by a wicked man and carried off in a wagon. An I 'phoned the police to find them—like they found the Smith baby, and I 'phoned to Miss Ophelia to pray about it, too."

"Lucy, dear, come here to Daddy and tell him all about it," Mr. Lee held out his arms. And his little daughter ran to him and was lifted to his knee.

While Mother, Daddy and the men listened in silence, Lucy told of her loneliness, because she had no brother, sisters or pets to play with; how she had found the three puppies and hidden them in the garage because Mary disliked dogs; how very happy Tom, Dick and Harry had made her; how distressed she was over their being carried away by the man; and how she had 'phoned just as Mrs. Smith had done about her baby.

When she finished Mr. and Mrs. Lee gazed at each other in hurt surprise. How could they have been so thoughtless of their little daughter! The reporter and policemen arose.

"Mr. Lee, you will want the three puppies? One policeman asked.

"Surely. Tom, Dick and Harry must be brought home—even though we lose a good cook because of them. I'll go after them at once. Lucy, your triplets will be here soon."

"May I have Miss Lucy's picture and that of the puppies for my story tomorrow?" begged the reporter.

Mr. Lee agreed.

That evening the very strangest and nicest thing happened to Lucy. After dinner Mother said that she and Daddy had decided it was quite time they became acquainted with the three new members of their family. So while Lucy nestled in her beautiful mother's arms and listened to a story, Daddy sat in his big morris chair with Tom, Dick and Harry stretched on the rug at his feet.

"I'm so happy," Lucy said. "God was good to help me; He always does. And tomorrow I must tell Miss Ophelia all about Tom, Dick and Harry coming back. She'll be so glad 'cause I'll never be lonesome again."

Our House.

Our little house is painted white,
With blinds of green outside,
And there are lots and lots of rooms.
With windows long and wide.

I have a bedroom all my own,
As pretty as can be,
With roses climbing up and down
The walls just like a tree.

Our dining-room has colored cups
And saucers everywhere,
And in the corner by the door,
My very own big chair.

I love our pretty little house,
All painted white and green;
I think it is the nicest house
That I have ever seen.

How Grandma's Wood Box Got Full.

It was a windy morning in March and cold as could be. I wouldn't say for sure, but I think nearly everybody was a little bit cross. Anyway, folks kept saying every little bit: "Shut that door!" And then some one would slam it to real hard.

Aunt Kate is a school teacher, and she said it got on her nerves the way everybody slammed the doors. Aunt Mollie isn't a school teacher: she just keeps house and she is always nice and jolly. "Let's everybody play a joke on everybody else," said she. "Whenever any one slams the door, he's got to go and get a load of wood for grandma."

The woodbox had a way of always being empty. Everybody said "Yes," right away, for each one thought it was some one else who slammed the door. Willie and Dot were glad as they could be about it, for they thought it would save them from having to get in the night wood. The first one to slam the door was grandpa; but grandpa is rather deaf, so nobody blamed him. However, as quick as he heard about the game, out he went and got such a big load of wood that it almost filled the box. Willie and Dot giggled. Everybody thought it would be the children who would have to keep bringing in loads of wood.

Not another load of wood was brought until noon, when Willie forgot and gave the door a big slam, and out he also went after his load. Then the telephone rang, and Aunt Mollie heard it just as she was coming in; so she slammed the door quick, and, of course, just as soon as she was through at the telephone she had to go and get a load of wood. Then Dot ran out in a hurry to see if there was an egg, because she heard her hen cackling, and that meant another load of wood. It was getting to be lots of fun. By this time the box was clear full, and it is a big one, too.

But the funniest thing of all was that night when Aunt Kate had to go to a board meeting, and she forgot a report and ran back after it and slammed the door after her. Everybody laughed right out, and Aunt Kate couldn't help laughing with the rest. I guess it didn't get on her nerves that time. "Go along," said grandma. "We'll let you off this time; you're in a hurry." But Aunt Kate wouldn't be let off. She ran right out to the woodhouse—and it was dark, too—and brought in the biggest load of wood of any and threw it down quick on the wood box. It was so full already that most of her load fell off on the floor, and next morning the wood was piled so high on the floor around the wood box that grandpa said we'd have to put up a sign: "Stove-wood for sale."

The Brown family only played the game one day, but Willie and Dot thought it worked so fine that they wish they could play it every day. Would some of you little readers like to try it?—Christian Advocate.

Betty and George Make Mud Pies.

Betty and George had been making mud pies all the morning in the back yard, and both of them had been having a very good time indeed. But suddenly Betty realized that George was making much better mud pies than she was. It made Betty angry, and that of course put a stop to their good time.

"What do you make mud pies for?" asked Betty in a cross tone. "It is the business of ladies to make pies. Men don't do things like that."

George was astonished. He and Betty had made mud pies every summer for the last three years at least, and Betty had never talked like that about it before.

"This man does," said George, who at the moment was putting the finishing touches on a lovely mud pie; it had a beautiful top with holes all around the edge to make it look like real pastry. George was making the holes now, and he was so much interested in getting them exactly right that he did not notice how cross his sister's tone was. To tell the truth, he was so busy that he did not have time to quarrel.

That made Betty still angrier, for, as every one knows, it is disappointing to try to quarrel with some one who will not quarrel with you.

"Well," she said, "there's one thing certain. I'm not going to make mud pies with you any more." And Betty tossed her head and walked off.

George felt very bad indeed to think that Betty was not going to play with him any more, and he was sorry to see her go into the house; but after all he had business to attend to. He had made a mistake in putting the holes in the pastry top, and it took all of his attention to put things right again. Before long he was so busy that he had forgotten how cross Betty was.

But Betty had not forgotten. She went straight into the house as fast as her two little legs could carry her, straight into the front hall and straight up the steps to the children's playroom.

"Now," she thought, "I'm going to play with my dolls. They are much better company than brothers anyway, and they never do things that you don't want them to do."

But Betty was determined to be unhappy, though perhaps she did not know it, and when you are determined to be unhappy even dolls can help to make you so. Jane, for example, who was the oldest member of Betty's doll family and the one most likely to know Betty's disposition, failed to sit up in the proper way. Every time Betty set her up straight with her hands in her lap, she fell over on the chair.

None of the dolls seemed willing to behave as Betty wanted them to behave, and so she finally gave up. She was so miserable that she felt as if she should like to sit down in the middle of the playroom floor and cry, and that is just what she did. She sat right down in the middle of the playroom floor and cried as if her heart were going to break; but she could not have been very unhappy, for, you see, she was doing exactly what she wanted to do.

After a while George finished his lovely mud pie with the almost-real pastry top, and then he began to think about Betty and how cross she had been when she had left him. He remembered that she had said she was not going to make mud pies with him any more. He felt sorry about it and wished that he had not made Betty unhappy.

"I know!" he said to himself suddenly and reached down into his pocket to see whether his dime were still there. "I'll ask Betty to go and have a soda with me."

He ran into the house and called: "Betty! Betty!"

But, as Betty did not reply, he ran up stairs and opened the playroom door. There was Betty in the middle of the floor. When she heard the door open she looked up with big round red eyes.

"See, I have a dime! Let's go and get a soda," said George.

"Oh, cried Betty, and the big round red eyes began to twinkle.

In a few minutes the two children were on their way to the drug store, and George was talking fast and laughing a great deal because he wanted to make Betty forget that she had been unhappy.

Betty did not forget. She thought about it all the way to the drug store, but instead of remembering how unhappy she had been she remembered how cross she had been to George. So she turned to him and said: "George, will you make mud pies with me tomorrow?"

"Of course," said George; "I'll be the baker, and you can come and buy supplies for your doll family."

"Oh!" cried Betty. "That will be the very thing."

Betty said afterwards that the soda that she had that afternoon tasted better than any that she had ever had before.—Youth's Companion.

Three Gifts, and How They Were Used.

Aunt Ellen gave each of the children a Christmas gift of a hyacinth bulb, a purple, a white and a pink. "Plant them, and watch them all the winter," she said, "and tell me next summer what you did with them. I hope they will give you a great deal of pleasure."

The children thanked her, and ran away to find jars to plant their bulbs.

"What an ugly thing! It looks as if it were dead already," said Arthur. "I don't believe it will grow."

"Oh, Arthur! But we must plant them, because Auntie would be so sorry if we did not care for her present," said little Nell; and Ruth added,

"They will have lovely flowers after a while, you know."

The gardener gave them each a pretty red flower-pot, and showed them how to plant and care for their bulbs. Arthur soon grew tired of his, and finally forgot about it altogether; but the little girls took good care of theirs all through the winter. After a while green shoots appeared, and then the flowers, sweet, fragrant blossoms. Nell had quietly cared for Arthur's along with her own, and now it was time to place them on the sunny windowsill, so that the flowers might delight every one with their color and fragrance.

In the summer Aunt Ellen came back to visit them, and she asked the children if their bulbs had grown.

"Oh, yes, Auntie, and they were so lovely," said both Nell and Ruth at once.

"I am very glad. I thought you would like them. And now tell me what you did with them," said Aunt Ellen. "Arthur, you may begin. What did you do with your flower?"

Arthur blushed and hesitated. "Why, Auntie, I—I forgot it; but Nell took care of it for me, and it was the prettiest of all, I think, the pink. Nell gave it to mother, and she carried it to the hospital to the sick people. They liked it so much."

"Then it was Nell's flower, and not yours," commented Aunt Ellen. "And yours, Ruth?"

"Mine was the purple, Auntie, and such a beauty. I couldn't give it away. I kept it in the parlor until the bloom was over, and next winter we will enjoy it again. You meant it for us to enjoy, didn't you?"

"Yes," said Aunt Ellen. "And now, Nell, for yours?"

"Mine was white—such a pure, lovely blossom," said Nell, joyously. "I just loved it, Auntie, and on Easter morning I took it over to old Mrs. Blake, who has been sick all the winter. She said it was just as if I had brought the spring into her sick room. I want to have some more next winter, to give away."

Aunt Ellen smiled, and kissed Nell. "What we give we have," she said. "Dear child, you have the sweetness of your flowers far more than if you had kept them for yourself, for you have the joy of sharing with others." —Presbyterian of the South.

Mother.

Mother is a little girl who trod my path before me;

Just a bigger, wiser little girl who ran ahead—

Bigger, wiser, stronger girl who always watches o'er me,

One who knows the pitfalls in the rugged road I tread.

Mother is a playmate who will always treat me kindly—

Playmate who will yield me what true happiness demands.

She will never let my feet stray into brambles blindly—

Mother's just a bigger little girl who understands.

Mother's an older little playmate who'll befriend me—

Yesteryear she traveled on the path that's mine today!

Never need I fear a foe from which she might defend me—

Faithful little pal who ran ahead and learned the way.

Two Little Shoes.

"Is she asleep?" whispered Left Shoe from under the edge of the bed.

"Sound asleep," answered Right Shoe, who was where she could see little golden-haired Betty, now sleeping soundly in her little white bed.

"My, but we've had a busy day!" laughed Left Shoe. "I could hardly wait for night to come to talk it over with you, dear. I wanted to ask you if you saw all the things I did. But, of course, you did."

"I don't believe I missed a thing," whispered Right Shoe. "No, not a thing in all that wonderful park. It kept me busy though, I can tell you, keeping up with so many interesting things. I did enjoy the merry-go-round, didn't you? And the swings and the seesaws were such fun. But the slide! Oh, that quite took my breath away! We were first up so high, and came down so fast. It really was the most fun of all. I was afraid though I was going to get skinned up. Those poor Brown Shoes that belong to Bobby Jones! How sorry I feel for them. They must have a hard life."

"Why, I didn't notice them," answered Left Shoe. "Isn't Bobby Jones just full of play! Don't ever be sorry for any of the Shoe family if they belong to a child who is full of play. I mean a child who loves to romp and skip and run. You know yourself, dear, that shoes enjoy helping the child run fast and skip lightly. Why, we have so much fun when Betty plays as she does."

"Oh, no, it isn't that," said Right Shoe. "They would love it if he were just full of play. You see I got acquainted with them at the shoe-shop yesterday when we were there to be half-soled. They were there for the same purpose, and I had quite a long talk with them while you were with the shoeman. I haven't had a chance to tell you about it. They said that he made them do so many things that were unkind, and they were so unhappy. He made them step on little ant-houses, after the dear little ants had worked so hard to make their home. He kicked a little dog, and stepped on a cat's tail."

"They said they wouldn't mind so much how he treated them, if only he wouldn't make them do unkind things. He has almost scorched them several times, putting them too close to the stove to warm his feet. He always steps right into the muddiest places, so that they just can't keep themselves looking clean. They wouldn't mind so much if he wouldn't make them step on dear little ant-hills, and do things like that. Why, when his mother called him the other day, he ran and hid and wouldn't go in. They tried so hard to take him in the house, but he wouldn't go for a long time."

"Poor dears," sighed Left Shoe. "Aren't we fortunate to belong to such a dear little girl as Betty! Don't you enjoy helping her skip along when she goes so cheerfully on an errand for her mother! When she runs to meet her daddy she is always so happy and bright. She is loving and kind to everybody. She has never made us do one unkind thing."

"I was so excited the other day, but I might have known better than to worry a minute. A beetle was lying on his back and couldn't get up. As we passed by it I felt myself being lifted right over him. Oh, I thought for a minute that Betty was going to make me step right on him. Of course I should have known she wouldn't do a thing like that. She only turned him over gently with her foot, and he was so thankful that dear Betty—"

"Sh-sh!" said Right Shoe, "isn't she waking up?"

"No, only turning over in her sleep," whispered Left Shoe, peeping up into the little white bed; "but we'd better go to sleep ourselves, dear; we must be ready for our dear little Betty in the morning. I heard her mother say she was going to take her to see her grandmother tomorrow. That means a happy and a busy day for us, you know. Good night, dear."

"Good night and pleasant dreams," answered Right Shoe, half asleep already.—Our Little Ones.

If you want to be cheerful and happy, do something for somebody else.—Pleasant Hours.

A Boy's Prayer.

By President William DeWitt Hyde.

GIVE me clean hands, clean words and clean thoughts;

HELP me to stand for the hard right against the easy wrong;

SAVE me from habits that harm;

TEACH me to work as hard and play as fair in Thy sight alone as if all the world saw;

FORGIVE me when I am unkind, and help me to forgive those who are unkind to me;

KEEP me ready to help others at some cost to myself;

SEND me chances to do a little good every day, and so grow more like Christ.

I ask this for Jesus' sake. Amen.

An Evening Prayer.

If I have wounded any soul today,
If I have caused one foot to go astray,
If I have walked in my own wilful way—

Good Lord forgive!

If I have uttered idle words or vain,
If I have turned aside from want or pain

Lest I myself should suffer through the strain—

Good Lord forgive!

If I have craved for joys that are not mine,

If I have let my wayward heart repine,
Dwelling on things on earth, not things divine—

Good Lord forgive!

If I have been perverse, or hard, or cold,

If I have longed for shelter in the fold
When Thou hast giv me some part to hold—

Good Lord forgive!

Forgive the sins I have confessed to Thee,

Forgive the secret sins I do not see;
That which I know not, Father, teach Thou me—

Help me to live.

MISS MARTHA TRACY TIFFEY.

Entered into eternal life, at her residence, 1464 Rhode Island Avenue, July 28, 1924, MARTHA TRACY TIFFEY, of Washington, D. C.

She was a consistent Christian, a devoted and active member of the Episcopal Church. Her faith was firm and fearless; a loving sister, a kind friend and wise adviser; always ready to respond to the sorrows of others; a hand "open as day to melting charity."

The strife o'er, the battle done,
The victory of life is won,
The song of triumph has begun,

IN MEMORIAM.

At Land's End, Gloucester County, Va., August 24, 1923, PHILIP EDWIN JONES, beloved son of the late Richard P. and Marie G. Jones, with for him no sadness of farewell, answered the one clear call that came, suddenly and without warning, whilst in the faithful discharge of duty.

"Who going through this valley of tears, made wells of rejoicing." M. F.

MRS. JEAN CHARLOTTE WASHINGTON WILLIS.

On Thursday, August 7th, at her home in Charles Town, W. Va., surrounded by loved ones, MRS. JEAN CHARLOTTE WILLIS passed peacefully into the beyond, where other loved ones awaited her.

There was no sadness of farewell for those who watched her knew that faith and love and hope went with her along the way, and that the rod and staff of the Good Shepherd stayed her, in what to us may seem the Valley of the Shadow of Death, but what to her was light and sunshine, because His presence was with her.

All through her life Mrs. Willis had touched the lives of others for good, and brought cheer and help and happiness to the home and to the wide circle of friends. Her life was a ministry of love, as daughter, sister, wife, mother and friend. When the seeming activities of life were ended her sick room became a place of rest, a school of patience and a sacred shrine of faith to all who entered it. With a smile upon her face, her Bible and her Prayer Book by her side, and the peace of God in her heart, she exercised a ministry that increased the faith and strengthened the courage of all who knew her. In sickness, as in health, she radiated love and sunshine, and when she fell asleep in Jesus she left a legacy full of memories which will enrich the lives of children and children's children for generations to come.

Jeann Charlotte Washington was the daughter of Colonel John Augustine Washington, of the Confederate States Army, and of Eleanor Love Selden, his wife. She was born at Mount Vernon, in the room in which General Washington died, on the 26th of May, 1846. Her early childhood was passed in the old historic home; afterwards she lived at Waveland, in Fauquier, and at Blakley, the home of her uncle, Mr. Richard B. Washington, in Jefferson. Most of her married life was spent at Rock Hill, in Jefferson County, one of the old Washington homes.

The death of her mother, and a little later of her father, who fell in battle as a gallant member of the staff of General Lee, left her and her brothers and sisters orphans in the care of a devoted uncle and aunt. They lived where the tide of battle ebbed and flowed, and the strange experiences taught them lessons of willing sacrifice, of faith, of patience and of loyalty to conviction and duty that influenced their after lives.

In 1869 she married Nathaniel Hite Willis, a brave soldier who had served in the Clarke Cavalry. He was a man of simplicity of nature, strong in character and true to ideals. The life at Rock Hall was that of a typical Virginian home. Children and laughter and sunshine, a welcome for kith and kin and friends, makes it still a place of glad memories and of helpful inspirations to all who knew it.

Mrs. Willis saw the beginnings of the little church in Summit Point, in which she did loyal service. Her later years were spent in the home at Charles Town, and she was laid to rest in the quiet of God's acre in which stands old Zion Church.

The children who survive her are Thomas Hite Willis, Richard Blackburn Willis, John Augustine Willis, Elizabeth Ryland Washington, widow of S. Walter Washington, Eliza Washington Willis and Patty Willis.

Her children's children knew and loved her, and her name will be to them a treasure through all the years to come.

Those who loved her will miss her here on earth, but they will give God thanks for the abiding memory of her life and the rich example of her faith. They will miss her presence here, but God will comfort them with the comfort that comes from above, as they know that she is with Christ and with the loved ones who have gone before. They lift up their hearts and say:

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, even so saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labours, but their works do follow them."

PERSONAL NOTES.

The Rev. E. N. McKinley, rector of the Church of the Mediator, Washington, Ga., will, on September 1, become rector of St. Mary's Church, Northfield, Vt., with work among the students of Norwich University.

ORDINATIONS.

In St. Paul's Church, Virginia City, Montana, on July 2, the Rt. Rev. William F. Faber, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, ordained to the diaconate Franklin Lawrence Gibson. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Charles F. Chapman, and the sermon was preached by the Bishop.

The Rev. Mr. Gibson was formerly a member of the choir of St. John's Church, Detroit, Mich., and a Junior Brotherhood Director during Bishop Faber's rectorship of that parish; later he became a field director of the Brotherhood and a lay missionary. He came to Montana about a year ago, and has had charge of the large rural missionary field embracing most of Madison County, Montana.

DEATHS.

The Rev. J. Orson Miller died at his home in Covington, La., on July 31. He had been suffering for more than two years from an affection of the heart, which forced him to give up all active work several months ago. He was buried on August 2 from Christ Church Cathedral, New Orleans, by the Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop of Louisiana, assisted by several of the clergy of the Diocese.

The Rev. George W. Dunlap, a non-parochial priest of the Diocese of Los Angeles, died after a lingering illness on July 31 at his home at Escondido, Calif. The funeral service was held in Trinity Church, Escondido, on August 4, the Rt. Rev. Joseph H. Johnson, D. D., officiating, assisted by the Rt. Rev. W. Bertrand Stevens, D. D., and the Rev. William S. Blackshear, deacon in charge of Trinity mission.

The Rev. Amasa Wright Saltus, recently retired as rector of St. Mary's Church, Penacook, N. H., died August 2, after a long illness. He was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., October 3, 1859, was educated at St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., studied law at Columbia University, and was admitted to the bar in New York. Soon afterwards he returned to St. Paul's School and studied for orders under Dr. Henry A. Coit, rector of the school. He was ordered deacon by Bishop Niles in 1890, and priest by Bishop Starkey in 1893.

The Boy Jesus.

Jesus was a boy of the hill country. Nazareth lay in a deep place up among the southern hills of Galilee on the fertile slopes, where vines and olive trees grew. There was a saying that "it was easier to rear a forest of olive trees in this region, than one child in Judea." Shepherds herded flocks on the uplands, villages and hamlets were scattered here and there like the islands on a western lake.

From the hill tops above Nazareth, on a clear day, the high road between Damascus and Egypt could be seen where the world of traffic went by. The land was criss-crossed by famous highways.

There would be inns and markets nearby where traders met, and Jesus would listen, boy-like, to all the buying and chaffering that went on with the trading.

He would see Roman soldiers, officers, couriers, merchants and travelers on the roads, catch their conversation and the gossip of the Roman Empire. He would hear tales of the road, exploits of bandits, hair-breadth escapes, robberies and beatings of the defenceless.

Boys are subtly influenced by past history and their present surroundings. Everything they hear and see is locked away in their memories, to be called for twenty years hence. It was R. L. Stevenson who said there was great satisfaction in making a boy happy. It was a two-fold act—the day you did a kindness to him, and twenty years after, when he remembered it again.

Jesus had but to climb a hill nearby and He could see the history of His people—Mount Carmel, where Elijah pitted his faith in God against the prophets of Baal; the Samaritan hills, where Josiah forgot's Gods message, and was defeated and killed by the Egyptian soldiers; Mount Tabor, associated with Deborah, the prophetess.

Between Mount Tabor and Mount Moreh, He could dimly see Endor, where King Saul staked life, honor, kingdom, religion, faith, and lost his all. The valley of Megiddo, and Jezreel, a spot of history, some parts glorious and others criminal. The scenes from the hills were like open books whereon Jesus, the impressionable lad, could read the history of His people.

Jesus had a good home, Joseph was a kindly man and His mother, Mary, an exceptional woman. Martin Luther shuddered over his childhood days, for his father was a just man who laid on the rod, and all through his life, when repeating the Pater Noster, it stirred bitter memories. John Stuart Mill had a martinet of a father, who taught his boy the Greek alphabet when three years old. At eight years of age, he began Latin, Euclid, and Algebra, and was headmaster to the other children of the home. At ten he could read Plato and Demosthenes with ease. Mill said his childhood was not unhappy. Perhaps not, but nobody is ever happy who has to read his works.

Jesus gathered His early idea of fatherhood from Joseph. He saw in Joseph the ideals of fatherhood. He taught that God was a Father. The first word He would learn would be "Abba." The first man He could call Abba, would be Joseph. There was the day on the cross when He said with His last breath, "Abba, Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." The word to Him was sacred.

Mary, the mother of Jesus, was early left a widow. She had five sons and daughters. Jesus was her first-born, and the reason for His delay in beginning public work until He was thirty years of age, Glover conjectures with simple common sense, was the need to help His mother with her brood of young children.

The home of Jesus would be simple. Joseph's bench and tools would be in it.

"Is it fanciful to suggest that what the churches have always been saying about 'Coming to Jesus,' began to be said in a natural and spontaneous way in that shop? Those little brothers and sisters did not always agree, and tempers would now and then grow very warm among them. And then the big brother came and fetched them away from the little house to the shop, and set one of them to pick up nails, and the other to sweep up shavings—to help the carpenter. They helped Him. Like small boys, when they help, they got in His road at every turn. But somehow they slipped back to a jolly frame of mind.

The big brother told them stories, and they came back different people. I can picture a day when there was a woman in the little house, weary and heavy-laden, and the door opened, and a cheery, pleasant face looked in, and said, 'Won't you come and talk to me?' And she came and talked with Him and life became a different thing for her. Are these pictures fanciful—mere imagination? Are we to think that all the tenderness of Jesus came to Him by a miracle when He was thirty years of age? Must we not think it was all growing up in that house and in that shop? Or did He never tell a story—He who tells them so charmingly—till He wanted parables."

When between six and seven years of age He would go to the elementary schools. Jesus never attended the College of the Rabbis. "He never sat powdering Himself in the dust at the feet of the wise," as the saying went in His day.

His education was after the manner of the Hebrews, which means that it was narrow, confined to a few books. The Old Testament gave Him insight into the meaning of history, and the righteousness that exalteth a nation, the feel of great poetry, and penetration into religious truths, in brief, "to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before God."

The Jews lacked artistic education. The Greeks excelled them in that. But in the higher education of morality and righteousness, stood head and shoulders above them.

From the Greeks, Americans have borrowed the idea that it is the duty of the State to educate its citizens. From the Grecian downfall it would be well to learn also that an education that has no higher aim than loyalty to a State, is shallow, thin and unreal, and lacks any lifting ideal.

The Roman imperial system of education was poor, mere drilling in memory. It kept the masses from aspiring. They were happy watching gladiators fight, or beasts maul each other in a ring. It is not surprising that Hebrews looked down with scorn at the Gentile world. They moved on a loftier plane. They knew God and truth and the knowledge lifted them up. "The Hebrew nation was at that time the most highly educated people in the world—in the true meaning of the word education" and the boy Jesus had the best of His time.

It is unfortunate for religion that the artists have always pictured Jesus with a halo around His head, filling the minds of Christians with the idea that He was different, never like the other children of Nazareth. Jesus was human. He was Divine! There is nothing gained by taking away from His humanity, and adding to His Deity.

Nor is there any progress made when we subtract from His deity to add to His humanity. He was "God and man in two distinct natures, and one person forever." In thinking about His boyhood, there is no need of throwing "an air of undue mystery about what is perfectly natural, and so hinder ourselves from entering into fellowship with Christ's early years."

Some natures are responsive to the panorama of hills, the creeping solitudes of the desert, the play of the sun on the water, the crack of thunder, the shadows cast by trees, the rustling of leaves, the call of the birds, the struggling clouds sailing across the skies, sunset and sunrise. These things speak to them in a language they understand. Jesus gathered His knowledge of nature by seeing, hearing and watching her moods.

"Eyes and ears," said the Greek, "are bad witnesses for such as have barbarian souls." But with the soul of Jesus, these were witnesses of His Father's presence. He assimilated all that He saw and heard of the life around Him. It colored His speech, and parables, furnished Him with illustrations.

So Jesus in a perfectly natural way grew up silently and quietly in Nazareth, with the boys and girls of His own age, reading His Bible, the Old Testament, and going to His Church, the Synagogue.

He was a boy, in all points, like any other boy, subject to their temptations, and as the manhood of Jesus has caught the imagination of millions, we feel the boyhood of Jesus has a religious value beyond price.

A father once visited his boy at College. On the walls of the room were some suggestive pictures. Next term he handed his son a copy of Hoffman's "Boy, Jesus." "Put that up in your room, Sonny."

He did as his father requested, and all the wrong pictures, cheap mottoes, and unworthy things soon vanished from the room.

For who can withstand even the gaze of the Son of God in the days of His boyhood on earth!—Geo. McP. Hunter, in Presbyterian Banner.

Wherever the Christian Church, or a single Christian, has put upon Jesus Christ a higher emphasis—above all where everything has been centered in Jesus Christ—there has been an increase of power for church, or community, or man.—Dr. T. R. Glover.

SAY not, the struggle nought availeth,
The labour and the wounds are vain:
The enemy faints not, nor faileth,
And as things have been, they remain.

If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars;
It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
Your comrades chase e'en now the fliers,
And, but for you, possess the field.

For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main.

And not by eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light;
In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But westward, look, the land is bright.

Education and Religion

"Education and religion are absolutely essential to true democracy," states a Bishop of the Church; and he adds: "It has been the province of Hobart College to blend the two to a remarkable degree."

That fact is the basis of Hobart's strong appeal to students who come from homes in which a definite religious atmosphere has been maintained. Hobart, ever since its founding, has recognized the value of religion to its students and has always given them ample facilities for the exercise of their religious instincts.

It is not surprising that many students, after entering Hobart, seek affiliation with the Church; nor is it surprising that nearly four hundred Hobart graduates have been ordained to the Protestant Episcopal Ministry.

Applications for admission to the 103rd class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.

HOBART COLLEGE

GENEVA, NEW YORK.

Thou Art My God.

Some persons asked, one day, a man greatly advanced in grace: "Should we not do well to separate ourselves from men, to live alone, to haunt only a desert or a church? Is not this the means to attain peace?" The man replied: "No. And this is why. If you are righteous, you will be so everywhere, and towards every man. If unrighteous, you will be so equally under all circumstances. The righteous man is he who truly possesses God; this man wherever and among whomsoever he may live, walks in the depths of spiritual solitude."—Rusybrack.

It is a matter of good morals to make vows. Everywhere in life the men who do things, the men who lead, the men on whom we depend—are the men who dare to promise. The lawyer makes his oath when he enters the bar; every physician knows the ancient oath of Hippocrates; the minister takes upon himself solemn vows; young men and young women "plight their troth." It is wholesome and essential habit in life. How much have you promised God for his "benefits" to you? What duty does the recollection of your vows bring to your soul? How will you "pay" that which you have vowed? Home, citizenship, business, church membership, the Christian life; these are all shot through with reasonable and vital vows. To omit or ignore them is fatal.—E. B. Allen.

Every one of us needs some influence and some impulse outside of ourselves to compel us to strive for our ideals. The best impulse that can uplift the life is the friendship of Jesus. He says: "Ye are My friends if ye do whatsoever I command you."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Refinement is more a spirit than an accomplishment

"Send us men," said a heathen convert, "with hot hearts."

My life hangs by a single thread, but that thread is in a Father's hand.—Evans.

No matter what business the Christian may be engaged in, he should make it the Lord's business.

Religion is the joyous business of carrying the life of God into the lives of others.—Jones.

"A whole Christ for my salvation;
A whole Bible for my Staff;
A whole Church for my Fellowship;
A whole World for my Parish."
—Chrysostom.

Character is caught, not taught. It is not propositions, not definitions, not demonstrations, that give inspiration, but the touch of life.—Henry Churchill King.

Let us not waste time trying to establish the fact of the Father's House. Jesus is the proof of its existence. If it were not so He would have told us. If there were no place there would be no way thither.—Selected.

The Christian character begins in moral teachableness and is developed by moral faith. It assumes first, humility, and secondly, self-respect.—Francis Greenwood Peabody.

All other teachers' words become feeble by age, as their persons become ghostly, wrapped in thickening folds of oblivion; but the progress of the Church consists in absorbing more and more of Christ in understanding Him better, and becoming more and more moulded by His influence.—A. Maclaren.

It grows upon me more and more, year by year of experience, how common is the refusal to know the truth about one's self. How few people appear to be ready, frankly, to want to know the truth about themselves. Is there anything so horrible as the thought of multitudes of people waiting to know the truth about themselves till the horrible disclosure after death, when they might know it now but will not?—Charles Gore.

WHEN THE TORTOISE WALKS

Once when Phillips Brooks was speaking at a banquet given by the Board of Trade of Boston, he shattered the complacency of his hearers by saying: "Commerce is God's." Backed by his personality, these words scorched the imagination of the men of affairs gathered there, just as much as if the great prophet of God had suddenly haunted the red flag of anarchy before their astonished eyes. Not once or twice only has God's Commerce worked the miracle of change in thoughts and institutions that seemed as fixed as the foundations of the earth itself. Men are bound together by their needs, and commerce is forever teaching men that they are members one of another, and that if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it.

The sea that once was the symbol of the everlasting barrier between peoples, is now recognized as God's imperishable highway leading to all the homes of men. We once heard a great teacher say that all the great wars of modern history were "tariff wars." Certain it is that the Navigation Act, which was the old name for a "tariff bill," was the occasion, if not the cause, of the birth of the American Republic.

Commerce in the Middle Ages discovered and armed the long lost citizen, and commerce is still recruiting for citizenship. Critics of English history are fond of saying that the Puritan created England's commerce, and did the same for America. The only way to keep commerce purely selfish was to keep theology stationary. The God of England was the God of the land, the Lord of "the snug little island." Fundamentalism in religion went along with the commercial exploitation of the undeveloped races. It was the same in America. Today men are slowly coming to the realization that commerce is as truly a vehicle of vital energy as worship itself, and commerce itself a department of theology. This vital energy is generated and stored in modern life in a system known as industrialism. Industrialism is the organizing of all the productive forces of a people's life. With a stationary theology and an industrial organization, the divine right of wealth seemed as fixed a truth as the ancient claim of King or Pope.

The huge structure of the modern industrial system whose foundations seemed to be fixed in the very nature of things, is beginning to show signs of impending dissolution. The basis of wealth is the labor of the producer. The ancients represented the world as being supported on the back of a tortoise. This fancy may have arisen, not only because of the broad back of the tortoise, but because the tortoise is perhaps the longest lived of animate creatures. The basis of the world is life. The tortoise-back of the laborer has supported the world from the beginning. Men forget it for centuries; then the tortoise begins to move, and all that has been built upon its back, crumbles into ruins. This has been the history of the past. Is the oft-repeated story to be told again? Certainly the tortoise has thrust its head from the shell and begins to show an inclination to move on.

Coincident with the progress of industrialism has been the decay of religious belief among the working classes. This was inevitable; for the form in which religion had come to them was that prepared by the upper classes. It was the religion of patronage. It worked downward; and in return for the gift bestowed, the donors took a mortgage on the souls of those who received the gift. The first emphasis was loyalty to the existing order. It pointed out the fixed strata of society, and made these strata to appear as part of a divinely ordered cosmogony. Building its theology upon the symbolism of the New Testament, which was the natural, because the only intelligible, medium of conveying hope to a people whose condition under an inexorable tyranny was fixed from birth, unless the favor of the overlord opened some way of escape upwards, the religion of patronage talked much of "grace," and made it synonymous with patronage. Having thus forged the divine name to the law of an unchanging order in human society, they made patronage the divinely ordered path of aspiration. All this was well enough when the privilege of education was a prerogative of the upper class; and the misgivings of the crowd as to whether the crystallization of society was divinely appointed, were inarticulate.

The substitution of managing agent for proprietor destroyed the connecting link between owner and worker, and took from the toiler any sense of loyalty to a patron. With this loyalty gone, the toilers began to talk of industrial tyranny. When the toilers revolted against this tyranny, they flung aside the religion whose phraseology had become either unmeaning, or was mockery of their new-born hope of freedom. Not least among the signs of promise in the world today is the utter discrediting by a large part of humanity of the false interpretations of Christianity with which classes and groups in Church and State and Society, have propped their morally untenable position.

DOOM OR DISCIPLINE

Industrialism must be held responsible for another catastrophe so appalling that it threatens the immediate dissolution of our civilization. It is not a pleasant theme, but when students of social phenomena, accustomed to speak in language stripped of extravagant terms, and backed by authenticated data, say with an air of finality, that "in the great industrial centers traditional morality, so far as it affects those elements which make a home a possibility, has collapsed," the menace of fact is certainly urgent enough to force even the most complacent conservative to anxious attention. The economic freedom of woman has carried her far outside the barriers of parental control. It is useless to invoke the exercise of the traditional authority of the head of the house, for the very fact that it is ancient and traditional makes it unacceptable to the youngest child of freedom.

The founder of Anglo-Saxon civilization was some nameless half-clad savage who stood on the threshold of his mud-daubed hut, and defended with his life the honor of his wife and daughter. The sanctity of woman's honor has ever been the one thing that gave dignity and worth to family-life, and gave to the place of its habitation the name of home. Woman no less than man accepted this valuation. It came to be as axiomatic as the laws of heat and gravitation. Man preached it, and was willing to defend his doctrine with his life-blood. Woman accepted it as final. There is small need to say that man did not accept the same standard for himself. Chastity to the masculine mind was apt to denote a distinctly feminine attribute. The falsehood inherent in such a theory has always been apparent to the honest student of life's issues. This falsehood has always carried with it the threat of destruction and signs are not wanting that the unspeakable disaster is at hand. The old order passes, and man, the old master of the home, must now choose a moral law binding equally upon man and woman, or be content with a civilization in which the word "home" will have lost all that it now connotes.

Industrialism in its reaction has discarded a perverted presentation of religion. That same industrialism in another reaction has cast off as utterly false a conception of the home that makes uncleanness a trivial misdemeanor in the man and an unpardonable crime in the woman.

Before the world stretch days of agony and heart-breaking, but the goal is now clear—a home where man's honor and woman's virtue, tested in the open world of struggle and work, will furnish ideals that will enrich the race.

FIVE REASONS WHY CHURCH BOARDING SCHOOLS ARE NEEDED IN ADDITION TO THE MODERN HOME AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

In the Home

1. Perplexity of many parents dependent on unstable business and social conditions; frequent changes in residence; abnormal absorption in business; nervousness and low vitality; mad rush for pleasure; and all at a time when childhood and youth need a regular life and a winning personal guidance.
2. Incompleteness of modern homes; father or mother dead; sickness preventing normal life; tendency toward small apartments and hotel life.
3. Ignorance of child nature and child nurture; neglect to study standards and maintain discipline; failure to appreciate the subtle influence of daily companions and environment.

In the School

4. Individual attention to physical, mental and spiritual needs of boys and girls the first aim in the Church Boarding School.
5. Provision of beautiful surroundings and a program of daily life in which spiritual power will develop as naturally and normally as physical and mental vigor.

The Church has always maintained schools to meet the needs of parents who prize Christian education. Many of the great leaders in England and America have been educated in schools maintained by the Christian Communions.

LITTLE CHILDREN CONTROL THE LONG FUTURE.

Dr. David Stark Jordan, President Emeritus of Stanford University, believes that to teach war as it is, is to stop war; to teach peace as it should be is, to insure it. He has stated:

"Public opinion must become as high and as fine as is most private opinion as to the necessity for perpetual peace. In the schools of today, is the hope of the future. Education is the only certain way out of the present dilemma. The present generation controls the immediate future, but little children control the long future. Both must be educated, and the best line of education for peace is in the study of history. War should be taught as it is and not glorified."

MADONNA OF THE CURB.

On the curb of a city pavement
By the ash and garbage cans,
In the stench and rolling thunder
Of motor trucks and vans,
There sits my little lady,
With brave but troubled eyes,
And in her arms a baby
That cries and cries and cries.

She can not be more than seven,
But years go fast in the slums,
And hard on the pains of winter
The pitiless summer comes.
The wail of sickly children,
She knows; she understands
The pangs of puny bodies,
The clutch of small, hot hands.

In the deadly blaze of August
That turns men faint and mad,
She quiets the peevish urchins,
By telling a dream she had—
A heaven with marble counters.
And ice, and singing fairs,
And dressed in white, a God whose face
Was like the drug-store man's.

Honor her ragged garment
More than the robe of a queen!
Poor little lass, she never has known
The blessing of being clean.
And when you are giving millions
To Belgian, Pole and Serb,
Remember my pitiful lady—
Madonna of the Curb.

WITH CHINA'S CHRISTIAN ARMY

By George T. B. Davis

FIRST in America, and later in Australia and New Zealand, I had heard reports of General Feng and his Christian Army. Recently I traveled nearly half way round the world to work in the army, and to give the men the Word of God. And now, after four months in Peking; after studying the army at first hand, from the private soldier to the commanding officer; I can say—like one who long ago traveled far to see a famous man and his work in another Eastern land—"The half was not told me."

The more I study the army the more I am amazed by the sheer marvel of it. Think of it! A dozen years ago a man was converted in Peking. He was an army officer, a major in command of five hundred men. He was not allowed to openly preach Christ to his men in the military quarters. He had to send them out of the barracks to the churches of Peking to hear the gospel proclaimed. Today that convert of a dozen years ago is the Defender of Peking; and his army—of whom probably two-thirds have openly avowed their faith in Christ—is not only the most inspiring native force for righteousness in China; but it is the strongest military influence for stability in distraught China. It is the most remarkable army morally and spiritually—with the possible exception of Cromwell's Ironsides—in modern times. "This is the Lord's doing: it is marvelous in our eyes."

After an American military man had spent two weeks studying the Christian Army, he said: "They are the best soldiers in China." But the army is not merely a military organization. It is a big Christian school for the common people, where the young men—for it is an army of young men—are given physical, industrial, mental, spiritual, and military training. The soldier-students, as they may be termed, enlist for at least three years, which is the equivalent in time of a four years' College course, for they have no vacation periods.

There is a strict schedule of work and study from the rising bugle in the morning, to "lights out" at night. In the summer the men rise at 4 A. M. The first order of the day after dressing, is a bit of spiritual drill. They assemble by companies in the open air in the quiet of the early dawn. The captain leads in the singing of a gospel hymn. Then all heads are reverently bowed while an officer or corporal or private soldier prays earnestly for God's blessing upon the army and the duties of the day.

Physical drill follows spiritual. The men go out for a twenty-minutes' run, and clamber up and down curious little mounds with steps, to make them fit for mountain climbing, and for the days' program of study and work. Then comes military drill, followed by various forms of physical training, industrial work, study of Chinese, moral lectures, a noon prayer meeting, and so on. From morning until night there is a varied program of study and work and worship.

The army is up-to-the-minute in physical fitness, as might be expected, where there is an absence of immorality, wine drinking, and cigarette smoking. The men are alert, athletic, clear-eyed, strong-muscled. Sir James Startin, a retired Admiral of the British Navy, who recently visited Peking, was much impressed with the fine physique of the men. He was also delighted with the feats they performed on the horizontal bars. The other day I saw a soldier do the full swing nearly a dozen times in succession just in their ordinary practice.

A striking feature of the army-school is its industrial branch. This was started by General Feng in order that many of the men might learn a trade while in the army, and have a means of support on their return home. As you pass through one room after another you see the young men busily engaged in making shoes and clothes, knitting stockings, weaving rugs, boiling soap, and making chairs and other articles of furniture. When one set of men have learned a trade, another lot takes their place.

But the most interesting and striking phase of the army life is its spiritual side. In my early visits to the camp the thing that most impressed me was the sight of a hundred or more men standing outside a mess-room before a meal singing a gospel hymn. Then all heads were bowed while some one led in prayer; not a few formal phrases, but an earnest petition, often of some length. And imagine my surprise when calmly informed that this was the custom throughout the entire army before each of the two meals of the day!

Later I witnessed a still more striking scene that occurs at noon each day. At twelve o'clock a gun is fired. At ten minutes past twelve the men gather by companies outside their various quarters for half an hour of Bible reading and prayer. Sometimes the meeting is conducted by the captain; sometimes the companies are divided into smaller groups in charge of a corporal. First a hymn is sung; then a chapter in the New Testament is read verse about, often with brief explanations, followed by a number of earnest petitions from the men as well as the officers. It is really Family Worship for the day. Just as a father gathers his family about him for Bible reading and prayer; so the captains and corporals of the army conduct the service for those committed to their care.

And it is a singing, as well as a Bible-reading and praying, army. How the men love to sing the old hymns that are favorites at home! They sing the first thing in the morning; they sing at noon; they sing the last thing at night. They sing at meeting, they sing before meals, they sing as they march. The favorite hymn of the army is "Onward Christian Soldiers." Some others that the troops especially enjoy are: "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus! Ye Soldiers of the Cross," "Room for Thee," "All People That on Earth Do Dwell," and "O Happy Day."

It was a joy and privilege to be called to labor among such a unique and interesting body of men, and to give them the Word of God. Our party—consisting of my mother, now eighty-eight years of age, and her companion, Miss Beebe, and the writer—set out from Auckland, New Zealand, on the long journey of nearly 10,000 miles to Peking. Before leaving Australia more than 20,000 letters were sent out to Christian people, in those lands and throughout the world, asking them to pray earnestly for revival in China, for General Feng and his army, and for ourselves; and to send for prayer cards to give to others, to enlist them to do the same.

The response to the appeal for prayer was most encouraging. As we journeyed to China, and as we have been working in the army we have been borne up by a great and ever-increasing volume of prayer. It is little wonder that the Lord has given blessed and glorious victory! He is still the prayer-answering God. "Blessed be Thy glorious Name, which is exalted above all blessing and praise." We have been in Peking a little more than four months. Practically all of an edition of 30,000 neat cloth-bound Testaments in Chinese have been distributed to those agreeing to read and carry them; and we have had to send an urgent order to the Bible Society in Shanghai for a further supply.

When we arrived in Peking Dr. Jonathan Goforth, who invited us to China, was not in the city. Dr. George L. Davis, of the American Methodist Mission, kindly introduced me to General Feng. This was only the beginning of the kind cooperation of the members of the Methodist Mission, and of others, missionaries and Chinese alike, in our campaign for the distribution of the Word of God.

General Feng, who is studying English, greeted me in my native tongue, saying: "I am very glad to see you." Presently he pulled out a neat pocket Testament of the same size and shape as we were planning to present to the army. General Feng kindly suggested another interview for the following day, and later invited my mother and Miss Beebe and myself to have lunch with himself and Dr. Goforth at the military headquarters at Nanyuan, a few miles outside of Peking.

As we commenced work in the army it was a great joy to find that the Chief Chaplain, Pastor Hsu, had joined the Pocket Testament League fourteen years ago when we visited Peking. We also learned that it was Pastor Hsu who played no small part twelve years ago in leading General Feng to a knowledge of Christ. Pastor Hsu rendered splendid assistance from the very beginning of the work in the army. He not only arranged the meetings, but kindly interpreted for me at most of the services for the soldiers.

The work in the army began with the officers, then extended to the men. I found that majors and colonels seemed just as ready and willing to enlist in the Pocket Testament League as private soldiers. My first big meeting with the troops was with eight hundred men of a cavalry regiment. It was conducted by the colonel who led it with as much fervor as a Methodist local preacher or a Salvation Army officer. At the conclusion of his prayer a sound arose that I had never before heard from a company of soldiers. A chorus of "Amen's" came from all over the audience in a perfectly natural manner, without a touch of a parading spirit. When we asked all who would like to enlist in the League and receive a Testament to raise their hands, all their right hands, as far as I could see were uplifted; while many professed faith in Christ as they agreed to read and carry the Word of God.

Thus we went through the army preaching the gospel; urging the men to saturate their souls with the Word of God, both now and when they returned to their homes; and seeing large numbers declare their acceptance of Christ.

Never will I forget one memorable service when we addressed nearly 4,000 men in the open air. It was a beautiful day. We stood on a mud platform five or six feet high with the men standing on three sides of us. The interpreter that day was Rev. Martin Ekvall, who had kindly come to Peking to help in the work, and who providentially was the one that first told me of the army three years ago in New York City. From the opening hymn by the soldier-choir until the last Testament had been distributed, everything went forward harmoniously. How eagerly the men listened, how patiently they stood, and how easy it was to speak to them! God's Spirit was moving upon the hearts of the men in answer to the prayers of many.

When the invitation to accept Christ was given so many hands were upraised that I thought surely there had been a mistake. I asked that the invitation be repeated and made clear. This was done, and again to my joy and delight literally hundreds of hands were upraised from all parts of the great audience. It was a wonderful scene, and was followed by a soul-stirring sound as they repeated in concert after Chaplain Chang their declaration of faith in Christ. Later General Chang, the commander of the brigade, who is a fiery evangelist as well as a brave soldier, gave the men an earnest exhortation, and prayed fervently for those who had just made the great decision.

At the close of the service came the distribution of the Testaments. It was carried out in a peculiarly beautiful and impressive manner. The three regiments that had participated in the meeting were marched a little distance away from the platform to the parade ground. The Testaments for the troops were piled high on tables near the platform, with a major standing at each table ready to present them to the men. Then company by company the men marched from the parade grounds singing gospel hymns as they came. They marched four abreast, and four majors stood at the tables giving them the little books as they passed by.

It was a never-to-be forgotten scene, but was followed by one if anything even more impressive. After all had received their copies of God's Word, they were once more assembled round the platform. General Chang gave a stirring talk confirming all that had been said and done during the service, and prayed fervently for the men that were just beginning the Christian life. Finally the men were asked to hold the Testaments they had just received high above their heads, with the Book open at that passage for every Bible student: "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of Truth." Second Timothy 2:15.

The scene that followed was worth going far to witness: that sea of open Testaments; every right hand of every soldier of that great audience of nearly 4,000 Chinese young men "holding fast the faithful Word." It was a little harbinger of the glad day when the Word of God shall be in the hands and hearts of millions of men and women, and boys and girls in China; and of that glorious era when "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

After the memorable service we went to General Chang's headquarters. That afternoon he told us the story of his conversion; and of how in a miraculous manner, paralleling the Old Testament miracles, the Lord had given glorious victory to their troops in the recent civil war in China—but that is another story.

Will not all who read these lines pray fervently day by day for General Feng and his Army; for gracious revival in China; and for our party as we continue to preach Christ and distribute the Word in Peking, and wherever the Lord may lead? Neat prayer cards have been issued and will be sent post free by The Sunday School Times Company, 1031 Walnut Street, Philadelphia. They are for the use of yourself and others in your church or community, who may wish to become prayer-helpers of revival in China; of Gen. Feng and his Army; and of our party and work.

By your prayers you will have a vital share in the victories achieved. Did not David make it a law that those who staid by the stuff should share equally in the spoil with those who engaged in the battle?

THE HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SOCIAL SERVICE WORK OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES

The Reverend Jos. M. Waterman, A. B., B. D., Baltimore, Md.

THE CHURCH MISSION OF HELP.

AN organization within the Church which applies the method and technique of social case work to the problems of wayward youth, of delinquency, and of illegitimacy. The organization extends its services to young women and girls of every class, regardless of race, color or creed. The work is carried on by a staff of trained social workers, and parochial volunteers under the direction of the trained workers.

This work is the outcome of an inquiry into the Church's responsibility toward the young girls found in institutions and reformatories in and around New York City. It was first organized in New York in 1911.

Work of this character has been done in many places and in various ways. In the section on City Mission Work it was noted that Mrs. Richmond, wife of Dr. Richmond, personally took a great interest in this problem and it was through her efforts that in 1854 the House of Mercy was established. It would be impossible within the limits of this paper to trace the entire background of individual and diocesan effort in this field of work. The organization within our Church to cope with this particular problem began in 1911.

The work in New York is financed by private contributions and diocesan appropriation. It functions as an independent, incorporated society. In its earlier years it developed wholly in the boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn, establishing itself in the courts, hospitals and city parishes. Today it works in twenty-two parishes.

In Pennsylvania the work was begun in 1916. It was founded there by an interested group of women in a Philadelphia Bible Class. In 1917 it affiliated with the City Mission Society and it was incorporated in 1922.

The work in Newark was organized in 1918 under the Board of Social Service. It was the outcome of an inquiry by the War Commission of the Episcopal Church into moral conditions prevailing among young women of the diocese.

Similarly in New Jersey it was organized under the Board of Social Service. It was the result of work carried on under the Woman's Diocesan War Council of New Jersey, 1916-1917.

The work begun in Maine in 1920 was the outcome of the interest aroused at the General Convention, Detroit, 1919.

In Tennessee it was started in 1922, the outgrowth of a committee of Daughters of the King, appointed to investigate conditions among delinquent women.

At the present time it functions in fourteen dioceses, which are listed in order with the dates of the beginning of the work:

New York, 1911; Pennsylvania, 1916; Long Island, 1918; Newark, 1918; New Jersey, 1921; Maine, 1920; Southern Ohio, 1921; Western New York, 1922; Tennessee, 1922; Chicago, 1923; Albany, 1923; Connecticut, 1923; Rhode Island, 1923; Central New York, 1923, and Missionary District of Porto Rico, 1923.

Some of the Work of This Organization.

The Church Mission of Help ministers directly and individually to unprotected, wayward and delinquent girls, regardless of race, color or creed. Any girl in special need is offered thoughtful Christian Fellowship. The girl is brought in contact with the social and spiritual forces of the community best suited to build up character and to restore her to self-respect, and to self-support when possible. Home adjustments are made; proper housing and employment secured and healthful recreation supplied.

Medical treatment is secured for the diseased; protection for the feeble-minded; legal aid when the intervention of the law is necessary. Shelter and maternity care are provided for the unmarried mother and child. The organization maintains touch with the girl in the institution and she is met with practical friendliness upon her release to the world.

The City Mission of Help never gives up one of its girls as long as she needs and will use its help.

—(Section from Statements of Western New York.)

Bishop Oldham, of Albany, addressed the annual meeting of this organization in February, 1924. His address was printed in full in the issue of the Churchman of March 1. Some of his words are given here:

"We are not endeavoring to condone sin, but to realize sympathetically the causes of sin and to make allowances.

It is not enough to preach the Gospel and to tell of the Heavenly Father's love, God sometimes is an abstraction and seems very far off, and sometimes we want the human touch and God Almighty condescends to use human agents as His messengers. Some poor soul may be praying for release from sin, and God often moves another soul and directs some individual to get in touch, and through that person God is able to bring that person back to self-respect. We are doing a work that in my judgment warrants the whole-hearted cooperation—so far as it can give it—of the community and all citizens thereof, as well as the Church, because we are endeavoring to do essentially the work for which the Church was founded and in the simple, modest, unassuming way bring to bear upon these unfortunate people the human touch, human help and sympathy and to bring them back to a normal development. . . . We are not just saving people from hell or from certain conditions, but saving them into something. We are never satisfied until these individuals we have been able to save are saved into a fuller and better and richer life."

THE ACTORS' CHURCH ALLIANCE OF AMERICA.

This organization was founded by the Rev. Walter E. Bentley, under the direction of the late Bishop Potter in June, 1899. The object of this organization was to provide for the spiritual and physical needs of actors; the abolition of Sunday performances and the recognition of the stage as a social and educational institution. The headquarters of this Society is the Church of the Transfiguration, New York City, popularly known as "The Little Church Around the Corner."

Dr. Houghton, rector of this church, through his personal interest and labors, endeared this church to the entire profession. His successor, the Rev. Randolph Ray, took up this work with the stage, with great interest.

December 16, 1923, a new organization was formed called the Episcopal Actors' Guild. This was the outcome of the older alliance. The purpose of this organization is stated as follows: "The banding together of Episcopalians of the stage with the Church for their general welfare. To this end it may develop such activities as the council may determine."

Membership is not confined to Church members. Article X of the Constitution indicates one of the ways by which the Guild functions. Chaplains are appointed in theatrical towns and centers to visit members of the Guild while on tour and to render them such service as is contemplated in the purposes of this Guild.

Many leading men and women of theatrical life are listed on the advisory board of the Guild. These include Julia Marlowe, John Drew, Cyril Maude, Otis Skinner, William Hodge, Daniel Frohman.

The insignia of the Guild is a representation of two books—the Bible and Shakespeare. Last April the Alliance held a Shakespeare Service at St. John the Divine in New York.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN SOCIAL SERVICE.

(From Story of Program Leaflets, Etc.)

This department of the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church began its work in 1920. The first necessity was to endeavor to interpret to the Church, not only what social service means, but also to suggest some things that social service does not mean.

What It Is.

"The department of Christian Social Service has for its duty to present for the consideration of all people in the Church the principles which Jesus Christ lays down in the Gospel to be applied to modern life. What it asks is that every member of the Church consider these principles and make the application as the individual conscience directs in one's own life, and in one's own community. It is the business of the Department to get the Church's conscience to work and to try to make that conscience intelligent.

The Department has also a responsibility for Church Institutions, for city missions, and for rural and industrial work for the General Church."

What It Is Not.

"The department is neither socialistic, radical, conservative, nor reactionary. The Department is not dealing with programs; it is dealing with principles which lie back of programs; it is the business of individuals and groups of people to work out programs for themselves. Nor does the Department plan to institutionalize Christianity."

It aims to unify the social service work of all dioceses of the Episcopal Church and to stimulate interest on the part of the clergy and laity in problems of social work.

What Does It Do?

It collects and publishes literature. It calls attention of social service workers to legislation, both state and federal, which is of interest to them. The Executive Secretary conducts regional conferences of social service workers, addresses diocesan conventions, and offers assistance to diocesan commissions.

What Does It Plan To Do?

The following summary is the plan which the Department proposes to follow this year, 1924:

One of the Church's contributions to society is the development of a conscience, which will be sensitive to whole problems as well as to specific illustrations. There are two ways of developing the social conscience. One is by teaching the principles, in a sermon, in a discussion group, in a conference or from a book. The other method is by project; that is specific activity which involves principles. During the coming year this Department hopes to use both methods. The Department recommends the consideration of local jails, as one specific project.

Certain other specialized efforts of the Department all are toward promoting the social conscience. These embrace: Church institutions, young people, summer conferences, rural work, cooperation with the Federal Council of Churches, a national social conference at Toronto in June.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

OUR FIRST APPEARANCE.

Mr. Editor:

Today I was in the State Library, looking over an old file of newspapers, and found the following note of your paper's birth, which may slightly interest you:

"We have received the first number of the 'Southern Churchman,' a new religious paper just established at Richmond, Va., by the Rev. William F. Lee."—From Raleigh Register, January 20, 1835.

FACTS AND TRUTHS.

Mr. Editor:

Absence from home and some unusual calls upon my time will explain the delay in replying to Mr. Barnwell's letter to the Southern Churchman, published August 2. In the very condensed article on "Conservatism and Progress," an attempt was made to show that the Creed might be interpreted in different ways and yet each interpreter might reach the heart of the truth. Believing as I do that both conservative and progressive are necessary to the welfare of the Church, I sought to show how "brethren might dwell together in unity"; since all of them hold the essential truths of the Creed, though interpreting some of the articles differently. Like the Psalmist: "I labor for peace; but when I speak to them thereof, they make ready for battle."

The distinction between fact and truth is a most important one, since the Dallas pastoral declares that both must be accepted, if the clergy are to retain their intellectual honesty. "He descended into hell"; what is the fact here? "He ascended into Heaven and sitteth on the right hand of God." What is the fact here? Must we understand these articles in the same sense in which they were understood by the compilers of the Creed? If so then we must take the Ptolemaic conception of the universe, for on a revolving planet there can be no literal ups and downs. Must we think of Heaven as a place a few miles, or a few hundreds or thousands of miles, up in the air; and that God is there seated upon a throne and that Jesus is at His right hand? The astronomers tell us that the distance to the fixed stars is so great that if Jesus had begun ascending on the morning of the ascension 1900 years ago, and had traveled continuously ever since at the speed of light, which travels 185,000 miles per second, He would not yet be one-half the distance to the constellation of Orion. They also tell us that in the astronomic heavens there are perhaps a thousand million of worlds, and that our globe is among the smallest of them. In such a universe it is absurd to assign spatial limitations to God, for as the old prophet declared: "the heavens of heavens cannot contain Him."

All of this seems too commonplace to write, but if intellectual honesty requires us to believe all the "facts and truths" of the Creed, and if as another famous inter-convention pastoral declared, "fixity of interpretation is of the essence of the Faith," then it is certainly reasonable to ask what is the fact of which the aforementioned articles are the expression. Unless Mr. Barnwell believes the fact to be physical or material, then his objections are merely captious, as there would be no difference in our opinions concerning the truth of the articles.

But if the physical fact can no longer be believed what have we left? We have the spiritual meaning which is the all important thing. The descent into hell is the full and complete assurance that Jesus not only died, and that His body was laid in Joseph's rock-hewn tomb, but that He Himself passed into that state or condition into which all men pass when the spirit leaves the body. The ascent into Heaven is our assurance that Jesus has not only risen from the dead, but that He has passed into the higher realm of spirit, and again assumed that glory which He had with the Father before the world began. This is the answer to my critic and here I might end this letter for the rest of Mr. Barnwell's paper is about something else than my article.

I said nothing about the Virgin Birth of Jesus, nor do I now intend entering into any discussion of the subject. If my opinion is of any interest to any reader of the Southern Churchman, I would say that I have never seen sufficient reason for abandoning belief in it, and that I say the words of the Creed without any mental reservation or evasion whatever. I have no doubt, however, that I reach this conclusion in a different way from Mr. Barnwell, nor do I regard it as a matter of vital importance. Bishop Gore is today the most prominent theologian among English-speaking people, whose orthodoxy and Churchmanship no one will question, and speaking on this question he says: "Certainly nothing concerning the birth of Jesus was part of that assurance on the basis of which faith in Jesus was claimed. The question of birth is secondary and not primary, viz., that the question of faith in Jesus must rest still, where it was made to rest from the beginning, on the life teaching and death of Jesus. On these, quite apart from any question concerning His birth, the faith stood and still could stand." (Belief in God, Pp. 274, 279-280.)

I have no idea what Mr. Barnwell means when he speaks of the present "haze in the regions of fatherhood and brotherhood." The progressive thinkers are ever striving to make these truths living ideas and not simply words to be repeated in a Creed. In my article attention was called to the change, perhaps I should say, the revolution, which has taken place in the conception of the Fatherhood of God within the last century, indeed I may say during my own life time. An infinite Being who would create men for the express purpose of torturing them forever is no longer recognized as "the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ." But the moral character of God is a matter of less consequence in Mr. Barnwell's opinion than "haze," by which, perhaps, he means doubt or denial of some religious or ecclesiastical dogmas. In his own picturesque language this haze "will soon make every craft afloat prefer the banks and reefs of Calvinism, just so they can steer a definite course."

Here are the words of the Calvinistic confession of Faith: Art. III, Chap. 3—"By the decree of God, for the manifestation of His glory some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others ordained to everlasting death."

IV. These angels and men thus predestinated and fore-ordained are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished."

A Being who would create men and angels for the express purpose of torturing them eternally is worse than the traditional devil, for the devil is not endowed with creative power. Dr. Momerie once said, "Some men do not mind worshipping the devil if you will only call him God."

Mr. Barnwell makes one most remarkable statement. He says, "The doctrine of the Virgin Birth is all that saves for us the Doctrine of the Divine Personality." That is absolutely new to me. How the Personality of God can be made to depend on a method of Incarnation is not apparent; and if it can be shown to be true, it should be proclaimed from the housetop, for it will assuredly work a revolution in both philosophy and theology.

E. H. WARD.

Hot Springs, Va.

Guest from a holier world,
Oh, tell me where the peaceful valleys lie!
Down in the ark of life, when Thou shalt fly,
Where will Thy wings be furled?

Where is Thy native nest?
Where the green pastures that the blessed roam?
Impatient dweller in thy clay-built home,
Where is Thy Heavenly rest?

On some immortal shore,
Some realm away from earth and time, I know;
A land of bloom, where living waters flow,
And grief comes nevermore.

Faith turns my eyes above;
Day fills with floods of light the boundless skies,
Night watches calmly with her starry eyes,
All tremulous with love.

And, as entranced I gaze,
Sweet music floats to me from distant lyres:
I see a temple round whose golden spires
Unearthly glory plays!

Beyond those azure deeps.
I fix Thy home—a mansion kept for Thee
Within the Father's House, whose noiseless key Kind death, the warder keeps.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Editor.

A MODERN DEBORAH.

"And Deborah the wife of Lapidoth, she judged Israel."

We come upon this startling verse at a very early stage in the history of the Chosen People, after their entrance into the Promised Land.

Deborah judged Israel, and she did it very well, too. She freed her people from the power of the oppressor and established peace, justice and godliness among them.

It was a very revolutionary thing for a woman to do—to seize the reins of government at that day, on her own initiative, and enlist an army, sending it forth to victory.

Nevertheless this unprecedented action on the part of this mother in Israel did not turn the heads of the other mothers. They did not abandon their babies and their households, and tell their men folk that there were to be no more household duties for them. On the contrary, after Deborah's regime had passed, things jogged along in Israel, much as usual, except that things were rather better, for having had the example of a vigorous woman with good executive ability among them.

All this has a direct application to the news of the day (there is nothing out of date about the Bible), for we read that Mrs. Miriam Ferguson has just won the Democratic nomination for governor (or shall we say governess) in Texas, which means, of course, that she will certainly be elected, thereby becoming the first woman governor of a state of this Union.

We have connected this lady, who bears another ancient and honorable Jewish name with Deborah, because there are those among our readers who may be shocked at the idea of a woman assuming such a manly attitude and position, and may fear that it will mean a regime of dishwashing, and rolling of baby-carriages for the men of Texas.

Let not such be alarmed, but remember that there is the best possible Biblical precedent for the Texas situation, and that it had no baleful results.

Incidentally, it is very gratifying to note that Mrs. Ferguson is the third candidate to beat the Ku Klux Klan organization in a Southern State. Oklahoma, Arkansas, and now Texas, have freed themselves from the domination of that secret society that operates under a sheet, thereby offering the opportunity for every form of violence, whether perpetrated by its own members or not.

BUILDING FOR HARMONY.

About two weeks ago a prominent Negro lawyer, Giles Jackson by name, died in Richmond, Virginia. His death and his able and consistent efforts in behalf of the uplift of his race were the subject of laudatory editorials in all the daily papers of that city. He deserved all that was said of him. Starting as a day laborer, he had made up his mind to better his condition, had studied law, and became the first colored member of the Bar of Virginia. Having risen above the level of the masses himself, it was his constant effort to exert his influence for the good of his own race. He did not attempt to do this by preaching discontent and unrest, but by encouraging honesty and industry among his own people, and pleading for sympathy, and justice from the people among whom they live.

As a consequence Giles Jackson, attorney-at-law, was respected and honored by the best citizens of all classes and both races in the former capital of the Confederacy, and his death was mourned by white and colored alike.

Now comes from South Carolina the record of another remarkable man of the Negro race. It is seldom that a man who was born a slave should have the business of the capital of his state suspended in his honor, yet that is what is reported in the following dispatch:

"Columbia, S. C., August 20.—By official proclamation of Mayor W. A. Coleman the capital city of South Carolina will tomorrow suspend for thirty minutes all business activities while her citizens mourn the passing of a Negro good Samaritan. The funeral services for 'Uncle Jaggars', as he was known, or the Rev. Charles Jaggars, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, as he was titled, will be held at 3:30 and from that hour until four o'clock tomorrow afternoon, Columbia will show her respect for the Negro who for seventy-five years used but one text in his preaching. His text was taken from Phillippians 2:5, and was 'Let This Mind Be In You Which Was Also In Christ Jesus.'

'Uncle Jaggars' died Monday night. He was ninety-three years old. He was born a slave on the plantation of Lemuel Estes in Chester County, South Carolina, on March 15, 1831, and at the age of fourteen began to preach the Gospel 'from the fence corners,' as he termed it. He was ordained when eighteen and preached steadily up to a few weeks ago, when shortly after the death of his wife, his health failed and he was taken to a hospital.

The old Negro had established a mission for his folk and it was his routine to visit the chain gangs and preach in the open-air to the prisoners. A charity to which he devoted the later years of his life was an 'old folks home' for Negroes. From donations by his white friends, 'Uncle Jaggars' had bought and equipped a home, which houses over a score of old Negroes, and at his death it was free from debt. His services, he said, were donated 'to God' and at the end of each year he took for himself as salary one cent.

'Uncle Jaggars' has been the recipient of gifts and letters from some of the most prominent men of this country. He was recently interviewed and written up in a magazine of national circulation.

Shops and business houses will close and delegations from the official world to the bootblacks' profession, will attend the funeral tomorrow. A local newspaper has started a fund to erect a memorial to the former Negro slave."

We have never heard of a tribute like this being paid to a colored person in a Northern city.

Colored leaders like these two who stay in their own communities, earning and receiving the regard and respect of their white neighbors and setting an example of successful industry and integrity to their colored compatriots, do their race more good than a hundred highly educated agitators, who devote their talents to stirring up discontent, thereby breeding race antagonism.

It is the privilege of the writer to know several persons of the colored race who are doing a splendid work for their country and their communities by building up citizenship through their own examples of intelligent industry, and we prize their friendship very highly.

With patience, justice and sympathy harmonious race relations can always be maintained.

Hast thou not bid us love Thee, God and King?
All, all thine own, soul, heart and strength, and mind;
I see Thy cross—there teach my heart to cling:
O, let me seek Thee, and O, let me find!

Teach me to feel that Thou art always nigh;
Teach me the struggles of the soul to bear,
To check the rising doubt, the rebel sigh;
Teach me the patience of unanswered prayer.

THE RURAL CHURCH

FOR an efficient rural church an adequate financial ability is necessary. It may seem strange that we place the financial question first, when the Church of Christ is spiritual and when the great objective of the Church is the salvation of souls, and not how much money we can raise; but we are reminded that the soul dwells in a physical body and the great spiritual Church is using a visible, material and temporal organization; and we remember that man's part is to evangelize, while justification and sanctification are the work of the Holy Spirit. If man, therefore, as God's servant, is to evangelize the world and open the way for the great work of the Spirit, material things are necessary. The rural church, as it stands today, is not sufficiently equipped in material things to render efficient service. Whether or not there is money enough in the country and whether or not the people can afford to give more cannot be considered in this connection; the fact remains, the Church does not have it. Therefore, to the extent that funds are lacking, the rural church is inefficient in the great work of evangelization.

Enough People for a Working Church.

The second condition is enough people for a working church. A local church is not simply a group of Christians, but an organization of Christians with an objective. To be efficient it must be able to propagate itself and wield an influence that will play some part in the evangelization of the world. This cannot be done without a sufficient company of workers who are able to cause the local church to function in such a way that it will meet the spiritual needs of the community and attract the local people to the services. In thousands of our rural centers there are not enough workers of this class to render the churches effective. It is not that there are not enough people in these places, although this may be true in some cases, but there are not enough church-going people, not enough workers to fill even the few places necessary to render an organization effective even in a limited degree. A typical rural congregation will consist of a few faithful old-time members, a few children and young people who are present through force of circumstances and a few who are there because some others are there. In many cases there is no choir and sometimes no organist unless the pastor performs that task. Frequently no liturgical service can be used, and sometimes even the hymns must be omitted because there is no one to lead the singing. And it often happens, also, that no one can be found to teach a class in Sunday School. Is it any surprise, then, that such a church cannot propagate itself and is not an efficient organization?

A Rural Social Life.

The third thing necessary for an efficient rural church is a rural social life. An individual's habits, associations and life purpose may not be determined by the place where he lives and they may not be centered there. In this age that is true of the rural people as well as of the urban people. The fact is, the rural social life which existed a few years ago has been broken down. The automobile and good roads, with the changing tide of social ideals, have brought the country and city closer together, and, to a large degree, have obliterated the marks which distinguished the rural people from the urban people. The Church is no longer the social center and community gatherings are very largely conditions of the past. This means that rural institutions are neglected or given only second consideration. We distinguish five classes of rural people: the retired farmer, the landlord, the tenant, the man with a city business, and the man who lives on his own farm and works it. While every one of these may, in different ways, render some contribution to the rural institutions, it is only in the last one that we have hope of an undivided interest, and yet even some of this class have yielded to the call of the changing conditions and are no longer one hundred per cent rural. Surely, the rural church cannot be efficient under such conditions. A high type of rural social life is a fundamental necessity.

Rural Prosperity Essential.

Money, people and a rural social life are necessary. Can we have these or is the rural church doomed to failure if not complete annihilation? They are possible and we have no doubt an aroused people will, perhaps, tardily, but surely, restore the necessary conditions and bring back the efficiency of the rural church. But to bring this about, rural prosperity is essential; for rural institutions are supported on the "margin of profit," called the "labor profit," and not on the valuation of property or on borrowed money.

Again, rural prosperity depends on good citizenship and good farming. The general prosperity of a nation depends on that nation's attitude toward Christianity. "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." But local prosperity depends on the State: that is, on the principle of equality and fairness exercised by the State government, the appeal for good citizenship is, therefore, an appeal for a square deal for the rural people. On the other hand, the rural people must also do their part by being good farmers. In the history of American rural life several different types of farmers may be found. But whatever the distinguishing characteristics of these different classes, one fact is very noticeable: the average American farmer has taken the first values, leaving the country impoverished. The farmer needs to recognize the continuity and perpetuity of the race. He received from a previous generation; he must plan for a generation to follow. For rural prosperity we must have good citizenship and good farming.

Efficient Leadership.

Finally, we need an efficient leadership, a leadership that will gather up the resources and reconstruct a high type of rural social life. The idea that the city needs the best and that anything is good enough for the country is as far from the truth as the East is from the West, and one hundred per cent false. We need good leadership in the city and we also need good leadership in the country. We have some good leaders, but we need more. We need people thoroughly prepared for the places they are to fill, people trained in their special line, acquainted with rural psychology, guided by rural philosophy and then moved by the ideal of service. But above all, we need leaders with faith in the pure Gospel who build their plans around the Christ of the Bible. We need all this because this is the only kind of leadership that will produce real success. We need this for the sake of the rural people and also for the sake of the urban people; for the city to a larger degree than many may imagine is depending on the ever-flowing stream of country-produced human blood to replenish, enrich, purify and elevate the city life. Save the life of the country and we will be able to save the city. Allow the country to fail and the whole case will be hopeless. Give us rural prosperity through good citizenship and good farming and then supply us with capable leaders and we will give back an efficient church which will save the country and prepare the forces that will also save the city.—The Lutheran.

THE HEMLOCK.

Socrates was condemned to drink the hemlock because he made a nuisance of himself. He developed the disconcerting habit of buttonholing the young men of Athens on the streets and by adroit questioning made them examine their stock of ideas.

What do you believe? Why do you believe it? Can your beliefs about yourself, the gods, the commonwealth, your money, stand the test of a rigid cross-examination? These were the questions he asked and to which he demanded an answer. Summon your opinions before the bar of your reason and submit them to the analysis of logic, of experience, of common sense!

Of course an old busybody like that could not be allowed to live. He was a heretic because he put an interrogation point upon the popular religion. He was an anarchist because he refused obeisance to the ancient traditions. He was a disturber of the peace because he made men think.

"Men fear thought, as they fear nothing else on earth—more than ruin, more even than death," says Bertrand Russell.

Yet, whatever provokes thought is good. Whatever lulls one into a self-satisfied somnolence is bad.—Ex.

The Great Commission

"MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

"It is a world of separated races and nations and churches! and yet it is at the same time a world of disappearing boundaries and increasing contacts."

The world in which this curious and dramatic situation exists will be recognized as our own, at once the most fascinating and the most appalling of any world conceivable. If all men and women of good will could disentangle themselves from the haste and press of their daily environment and stand together, "with wide eyes calm upon the whole of things," they might come nearer to solving many of its problems. As it is, the best that can be done—but it is an excellent best—is to create little islands, cases, of honest thoughtfulness, groups of men and women eagerly lending their minds and wills to the guidance of some one who can point the way out, who can at least show the direction, as the kindergarten children blithely sing, from terrestrial darkness to celestial day.

The Rev. J. M. B. Gill, formerly of China, now rector of St. Paul's, Petersburg, Va., stands as guide for our parish study groups this fall, and for general readers, through a little book called "My Father's Business," which, if it were expensively bound, and published and advertised by some secular publishing house, would probably become as fashionable among our social thinkers as the last words from Galsworthy or Shaw.

Given the world as it is, no Churchman of any thoughtfulness will deny the book's claim that the world's needs can be supplied by Our Lord, and by Him only. An introductory chapter on the history of the American Church, from its preliminary state as a neglected mission to its present condition adequately organized for a world-wide task, reveals convincingly the Spirit-directed development of the Church and its fitness for its work, though hindered by the failings of its members.

The next step is to discover what constant failures or obstacles on our part, corporate or individual, are causing us to be so slow in fulfilling the divine intention. War, race prejudice, race pride and selfish indifference, superficial partisanship in economic matters, industrial outrage at home and more especially overseas, are fundamental wrongs. Toward their solution the Church brings three principles, the supreme value of the individual, the principle of brotherhood and the principle of service.

Granting the value of these, as every Churchman must, the natural reaction should be and must be, what is the duty of my parish and of myself? The answer is not to be described by our ordinary drab ideas of duty, as Mr. Gill tells how to understand the principle of stewardship and apply it to our whole life.

This is a brief and abstract outline. The whole book is rich in concrete detail.

One hears, in current conversational efforts, several extremely tiresome remarks which must be listened to politely on too many occasions. They are such profound observations as "—don't know what the world is coming to—" "—believe in missions anyhow—" "—all these foreigners, what can you expect?" "—rest of the world take care of itself—" "—perfectly good religion of their own—" "—plenty to do at home—" (If only they would be doing it!) "—the trouble with the Church—"

Do let us all this coming year on every occasion when we hear these and similar remarks, whether it be from the gentlest old lady or the wildest-eyed young radical that ever "swung the wriggling world by its futuristic tail," refer the speaker kindly but firmly to Mr. Gill's book, "My Father's Business," not for mere reading, but for absorbing to the point of saturation. And unless all our friends are kindred spirits of the Patagonian chief who said, "Great ideas make me sleepy," we shall have cause for new thanksgivings at the end of the year.

TRYING TO RESTORE THE CHURCH PUBLISHING SOCIETY.

Two of our senior missionaries in Japan now find themselves cheerfully guarding and tending a shrine of Hachiman, the god of war. They are the Rev. Dr. Irvine H. Correll and his wife, of the Church Publishing Society.

Word comes from them that they are unable to keep up with and reply to all the inquiries received from their friends regarding the losses of the Church Publishing Society and the present state of their work. Naturally, Dr. Correll is more than occupied in efforts to make a beginning at re-establishing the work built up through the fifty years he has been in Japan. Mrs. Correll is only now recovering from a long illness.

They are making the most of their present living quarters and office, combined, in an old and very tiny, partly remodeled house formerly the dwelling of some priests, whose property is not yet entirely removed. Hence the shrine.

The earthquake and fire losses of the Church Publishing Society have, of course, crippled its work beyond immediate recovery, unless it should receive unforeseen and generous financial aid. The Society consists of the Bishops of the Japanese Church, with Dr. Correll as secretary. The Japanese Prayer Books and Hymnals and Psalters, which we in our parishes at home take so much as a matter of course that we are scarcely conscious of them, are provided for the Japanese Church through the agency of this Society. Many of these Japanese books were burned when the Tokyo churches burned, and the reserve supply for other cities and towns was burned in the stockroom of the Publishing Society. Furthermore, the plates for reprinting them were likewise destroyed.

Personal losses, shared with all the missionaries, must have been exceptionally hard for the Corrells', for they had just completed fifty years in Japan. There was a library of several thousand volumes, for instance, and there were diaries and manuscripts, and valuable gifts.

The Society acts as agent in Japan for the S. P. C. K. The stock of simple religious books in English, which it distributes was wholly destroyed. A Church publishing house in this country contributed several packages of such books as a nucleus for a new collection, and further helped by quietly cancelling its outstanding account of $40 owed by the Society. Word has not been received as to any help the S. P. C. K. may have been able to give. It would, of course, do all that was possible.

One has only to reflect a moment on one's own dependence upon printed words, and on the value of the Prayer Book and other Church books, to realize the importance of such work as the Church Publishing Society does in lands where Christianity is new.

THE CHRISTIAN HOME.

Without real home life a Christian society perishes.

The home is the proving-ground of corporate life. Within the home the individual may be prepared to realize the varied claims of social allegiance through the exercise of right relationship between the young and the old, the weak and the strong, the slow and the quick-witted, the practical and the temperamental, the stabilizers and the experimenters.

Within the home right attitudes taken towards essentials of family solidarity will ease the strain of changing methods of living.

Again, within the home the mastery of self may most readily be acquired and self-restraint be exercised. In the intimacy of family life lies a unique opportunity for the practice of tolerance. These are necessary antecedents of freedom.

The ideal of young people in building homes of their own should include the assumption that within the home circle the individual finds a starting point for community service. The key to the whole is the emphasis placed on what each acquires but on what each sacrificially gives.

A true Christian home is possible anywhere, whether in an apartment house or on a suburban estate.

Its realization depends on every member of the family taking his part in:

Work

Through definite responsibilities assigned to each one, which will give opportunity for creating something, for self-sacrifice, for the recognition of service, and for sharing in the family budget and in the responsibility for wise earning, saving, and spending.

Play

Through good times together, such as reading aloud, singing, picnicking, motoring, camping, worthwhile table-talk, birthday and holiday celebrations, and the cultivation by each member of the family of some talent that will give pleasure to the whole family.

Study

In which parents and children join and through which the family as a whole is continually broadening its horizon in varied fields.

Fellowship

Through cultivating and directing in the family relationships the affections, as one would any other talent, God-given for the service of the world.

Worship

Through grace at meals, which others than the father should say in turn, through some study, discussion, prayer or praise, provided for regularly, if possible every day, and through Church attendance by all the family together.

Church Intelligence

Sewanee.

The Theological School of the University of the South at Sewanee, Tenn., is looking forward with great interest to the coming year. Already there is a large number of prospective students on its lists, most of them with the College Degrees of B. A. or M. A. The University will open on Thursday, September 18. Dean Wells has given up his proposed trip to China and Japan, and will remain at Sewanee.

Professor Osborne, who has had such success as Chaplain of the University, has found himself obliged to resign the Professorship of Dogmatic Theology, which he has held with marked ability for the last five years, in order to devote all his time to his Chaplaincy.

The School is peculiarly fortunate in being able, after many efforts, to secure the services of the Rev. Dr. C. B. Wilmer, rector of St. Luke's Church, Atlanta, Ga., for twenty-four years. In the early history of the School, 1876 to 1887, Dr. George T. Wilmer held the same position of Professor of Theology at Sewanee, which his son will now hold. Dr. Wilmer has held many high offices of Diocesan and National, as well as of municipal importance. He is a man of deep and broad and strong convictions, characterized by courage, sincerity and originality. A recent editorial, in the Atlanta Journal, thus speaks of him: "He is a Liberal, for his mind stands ever hospitable to truth; and a Conservative, for he holds fast that which is good. If his were the prevalent temper in this day of clashing theologic clans, there would be neither Modernists nor Fundamentalists, but only Christians, traveling by devious ways, but led by one Spirit. He goes to a great work and a noble institution. Sewanee is among America's justly distinguished and distinctive Universities. Never obsessed by a foolish ambition for bigness, it has grown in character, in scholarship, in serviceableness, till it stands honored everywhere by the informed and valued by the discerning."

An enlarged list of courses will be presented in the coming year and Sewanee is prepared to meet the problems of the day, with sound learning, and earnest spiritual enthusiasm in fitting her students to take an influential place in the Church and in the nation; as they have done in the past.

Diocesan Cooperation.

A fine piece of Church cooperation is being put into practice at the Virginia Boys' Industrial School.

Upon the initiation of the Rev. R. V. Lancaster, Interdenominational Chaplain for Virginia State Institutions, a fund has been raised from various sources, and numerous different Church bodies to pay the salary of a young man at this institution, who acts in the double capacity of Religious Director and Athletic Instructor.

He has a wonderful field for mission work among one hundred and eighty boys, who through circumstances over which they have no control, have been sent to this industrial school from all parts of the State of Virginia.

By gaining the confidence of the boys on the athletic field he is sometimes able to reach their hearts with a spiritual message more effectively than the preacher possibly could who goes there professionally.

This young man sends out the following appeal:

"A call comes from the Virginia Industrial School, the State Boys' Reformatory, for all kinds of reading material. The funds appropriated by the state are sufficient to bring in only a few magazines; there is no library whatever; the boys love to read, they have the time to read, but there is very little for them to read.

All the types of literature which would interest the boy; books and magazines of adventure, humor, biography, travel, poetry, elementary science and nature study, religious life and growth; in fact, any good, wholesome, clean literature can be used to good advantage.

In nearly every home there are good books and magazines lying idle. You can put this literature to work and help us make the boys happier and better by sending what you have to M. O. Williams, Jr., Religious Director, Virginia Industrial School, Maidens, Va."

Church Work at Pennsylvania State College.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Williamsport Archdeaconry of the Harrisburg Diocese are planning "A Traveling Object Lesson," which will be staged at Pennsylvania State College, on Wednesday, October 1. The women will be taken in motor cars to see the different buildings of this huge college, and the scope of the work the Church does there will be made plain. So that they may have a basis of comparison, the women will then be taken to see the plants of the various religious bodies at work there, and their plans will be explained.

A visit to the State College will impress the women with the existing equipment of this, one of the largest colleges in America, and its opportunities for further growth. They will also realize what the various religious bodies think of the importance of the work there by the splendid plants they have provided. They will also appreciate the handicaps under which the Episcopal Church works with her students.

St. Andrew's has an exceptionally able and acceptable chaplain, the Rev. Edward M. Frear. Our Church there has a good site, a good rectory, and one room (the basement of the church building as originally planned). The remarkable growth of the College has made the original plan impracticable, and economy now calls for a plan that shall provide for future growth.

At present there are about three hundred students in the regular and summer sessions, who are members of the Episcopal Church. The new building Committee, of which Bishop Talbot is the chairman, will study the probable growth of the College, and the percentage of Church students, and determine the necessary program.

The responsibility and privilege of providing for the work at Pennsylvania State College belongs rightly to the Church at large, and particularly to the five dioceses of the State of Pennsylvania.

On Tuesday evening, July 22, St. Andrew's, State College gave its annual Parish Party for the Summer School students. The guests filled the rectory to capacity. St. Margaret's Guild of the parish, provided bountifully for the occasion, as usual.

On Sunday, August 3, a farewell service was held in St. Andrew's, State College for David Henry Porterfield, who is leaving for St. John's University, Shanghai, China, where he has been appointed by the Department of Missions of the National Council. Mr. Porterfield acted as server to the Chaplain, the Rev. Edward M. Frear, at the celebration of the Holy Communion, and gave a brief address on his prospective work. The Rev. Edward M. Frear, in his address, reminded the congregation of the honor it has in having a member go into the mission field, and congratulated Mr. Porterfield on his opportunity for a life of extensive usefulness, wishing him God-speed in the name of the parish.

Large Type Bibles for Hospitals.

In response to many requests the New York Bible Society has just published a large type edition of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, bound separately, for use of patients in hospitals. The report has often come to the Society that the portions of the Bible circulated in hospitals has been of such small type that those confined in sick beds read them with difficulty, but the expense of issuing large type Scriptures has been so great that the Society has not previously attempted to publish the same. By careful management an edition of 150,000 of these volumes has been issued and they are now available at the remarkably low price of three cents per copy. This edition for the hospitals follows several other large Bible editions published by the Society, totaling a million books. These have been in English, Bohemian, French, German, Greek, Italian, Norwegian, Russian, Swedish, and Yiddish. The Society is located in its own Bible House, No. 5 East Forty-eighth Street, where contributions for circulating the Scriptures in many languages may be sent.

Alaskan Mail Lost.

Ten tons of winter mail for points along the Koyukuk River, Alaska, were on a barge, which turned completely over, dumping mail and freight into the river. Our missionaries at St. John's in the Wilderness, Allakaket, learned that they were listed for fifty-two sacks. They received forty-five, and twenty-three of those were soaked.

They are most anxious their friends should know this reason for any lack of acknowledgment of gifts that may have been sent to them.

Deaconess Thayer of St. John's in the Wilderness writes under date of June 20: "The mail received four days ago was the first since the middle of April and was the accumulation of books, magazines, parcels and papers, from last fall. The Auxiliary boxes were also among the mail received. The friends of this mission as well as Miss Hill's personal friends and my own may wonder at the delay in our answering and acknowledging their kind gifts.

"The barge loaded with ten tons of mail for this river left Nulato in good shape, pushed by a gasoline skow. We had had little snow all winter and no rain during spring, and the river was low, but early in June this upper part of the river had several heavy rains and rose several feet. The rise taught the barge suddenly as it left the dead water and turned it completely over, dumping mail and freight into the river. The passengers were on the skow, so were not thrown into the water. Crew and passengers worked hard for three hours righting the barge and saving as much of the mail and freight as they could. . . . What the missing sacks contained we have no way of knowing, and some of the parcels, boxes and books received are so damaged by the water that the senders' names are not legible.

"Miss Hill and I have been drying all the articles and trying hard to make out the names of the senders. For the benefit of those who are waiting I think some word is necessary, and thought a notice in our Church papers would meet their eyes and thus allay their wonderings.

"We are so far away, and accidents may happen here, word of which may never reach outside unless through some organization, for there are no newspapers up in this vast wilderness."

Revenue Cutter Bear Retired From Alaska Service.

Bishop Rowe left Seattle early in July for Point Hope, via Nome, and on arriving at Nome found that the old revenue cutter, the Bear, had been caught in the ice and badly damaged. She managed to limp back to Nome, and has been retired. The Bear for a full generation has been the only messenger and burden bearer from the United States government to the scattered Eskimo and few missionaries along the Bering Sea and Arctic Coast. It was the Bear that went down along the Siberian peninsula rescuing American fur traders marooned by Soviet activities.

This accident has meant that no passengers could be carried into the Arctic this summer. Bishop Rowe has reluctantly given up his triennial visitation to Point Hope and has turned back to the Yukon. He is making his way up the River, stopping at Anvik, Tanana, possibly Stephen's Village, and Fort Yukon, Circle and Eagle, then returning to Tanana. He will visit the missions on the Tanana River and probably come out by rail through Nenana, Fairbanks, Anchorage and Seward.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan.

Proposed Removal of the Church of the Heavenly Rest.

Real estate circles in New York state that the Church of the Heavenly Rest, the Rev. Henry Van B. Darlington, rector, has taken an option on a site at Fifth Avenue and Nineteenth Street, forty-five blocks north of its present location, and has sold its present property, or is about to do so. It is known that for a year or more a move was contemplated, the vestry having voted to sell and select some other location. At the moment vestrymen are absent from the city. The present site, only thirty-one feet on Fifth Avenue, but spreading out to a large plot in the middle of the site, is in the heart of the great Grand Central or Forty-second Street uptown development. For at 10:30, 12:05, 1:00 and 5:00 o'clock service every day in the year, except Sunday, it is the best field in America, unless it be Wall Street and Broadway, and in its present location, if rebuilt to suit a business district need, can reach with the Gospel message fifty times as many people as can be reached if located in a residence district.

The proposed site is well toward the northern end of Central Park, on the East Side, its field cut in half since no people live in the park and few ever cross it, there being above Eighty-sixth Street no means of doing so. The site is vacant because owned by Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, to prevent the erection upon it of an apartment. The Carnegie home is on the other corner. No action has yet been taken by the Bishop and Standing Committee, of course. If the new site be occupied the parish's new neighbors will be Beloved Disciple in Eighty-ninth Street; Holy Trinity of St. James' Parish, far to the East in Eighty-eighth Street, and St. Edward the Martyr, in One Hundred and Ninth Street.

Getting Church People To Vote.

Responding to appeals of the Federal Council of Churches, and cooperating with daily newspapers and religious weeklies to the number of forty or more, the American Board of Applied Christianity has entered upon plans to help men and women of the one thousand churches of New York, and the five hundred more in the nearby Jersey section, to get every member of every church, who is a voter, to register and to vote. Leaders from the Board are at hand personally to visit churches, to confer with ministers, and to do what they can to assist the lay people to enter upon a systematic effort. The Council appeals to ministers, but the Board realizes that something more than sermons are needed. Here, argues the Board, is a definite task in work that begins where sermons end.

Of course the Board does not enter partisan politics, much less ask churches to do so. Nor does it mean to terminate its efforts with the approaching presidential election. It hopes to help men and women to organize for all elections, and believes that as fitted for and performing this civic task, this applied patriotism, the lay people will thereby be more ready to enter upon all other tasks of religious education, of mission enterprises, and of more efficient methods in all work of churches. The Board has available three directors, and forty volunteers, who offer definite plans for this civic task. Persons who support the Board with scholarships include Messrs. James H. Post, Judge Elbert H. Gary, Charles Hayden, Cleveland H. Dodge, General James H. Snowden, James W. Gerard, Thomas W. Lamont, Clarence H. Kelsey, Hon. Ogden L. Mills, Samuel W. Reyburn, Mrs. Percy R. Pyne, Mrs. Clarence M. Hyde, Mrs. William Church Orborn, Mrs. Richard Aldrich, Mrs. William P. Clyde, Mrs. Lewis L. Clarke.

National Education Week.

Religious and educational leaders in New York joined in asking the "New York Sun" to issue two special numbers in connection with National Education Week November 17 to 23, and the education exposition to be held in New York is a feature of that week, the whole being in charge of the Department of the Interior, the National Education Association and the American Legion, in celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of schools in America. "The Sun" has responded to the appeal, and named October 4 and November 15 as the dates. In these numbers journalists trained in the handling of Church and educational news have been asked to take part, and it is believed that an advance in publicity will be made over anything ever yet attempted. In any case, the "New York Sun" is the first daily newspaper in America to respond to such plan and feature.

In both news and advertising original ways of presenting information will be employed, most of the ways new at least in Church, educational and charity and all public welfare publicity. The aim is announced to be to create an issue that will give the uninformed a broad and fairly complete view of Churches, schools and allied welfare plans at the moment. Extra copies of the issue are to be taken by Churches and schools, and distributed, to the end that their members and patrons may be informed. In the October issue a joint appeal by Churches of New York will be made to voters to vote, and to ministers and Church officers to sound loud and frequent calls to apply their Christianity and their education in this form of patriotic service. The slogan of both issues is to be service, and advertisements and reading matter will give methods by which all people may render service.

Bishop Fiske's Condition.

The following official statement with regard to the condition of Bishop Fiske was given out at the Diocesan office, Utica, on August 20:

The latest reports from Bishop Fiske, who has been in the Union Memorial Hospital, Baltimore, since early in May, give little hope of his early return to the diocese.

The Bishop's progress has been delayed by a series of complications. In the first place the operation for which he entered the hospital proved more serious than was expected. Then, a week after the operation, he contracted a blood infection.

For days the Bishop's life hung by a mere thread. Then his naturally strong constitution conquered the infection, only to have it followed by a virulent case of toximia. He was then so ill that the physicians called into consultation some of the best known men in the profession, and kept in constant touch with the Rockefeller Institute. For two nights the doctors gave up all hope, but eventually the Bishop pulled through.

Meanwhile, he was suffering from secondary pneumonia and pleurisy, with an attack of phlebitis. Eventually the turning point came, but once more there was set back after set back—severe abscesses due to hypodermic injections, etc.

Now the Bishop is suffering from a renewal of the phlebitis. The doctors hold out little hope of his being out of the hospital before the middle of October.

FLORIDA.

Rev. F. A. Juhan, Bishop-elect.

The Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville.

Extensive additions are being made to the Parish House of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, the Rev. C. A. Ashby, rector, to provide room for the department which has heretofore been forced to use the swimming pool gallery and the kitchens. Space over the large gymnasium will be taken in and over the lockers to the pool, providing for a scout troop, the Men's Bible Class, and a department of the Sunday School. The Woman's Bible Class will move to the room now used by the Men's Class. Miss Annie Morton Stout, of Memphis, Tenn., comes to the Parish on September 15, as Educational Secretary. Mrs. K. Travers, the Parish Secretary, will confine her work to the parish and its organizations. Miss Ethel Needham, of the staff, has been asked to be a diocesan field manager in the Department of Religious Education. Miss Needham has not decided whether she will remain with Good Shepherd or go with the diocese.

An article in the August issue of St. Andrew's Cross, from a report of Mr. Edward Shields, one of the Brotherhood Secretaries, told of his visit to this Sunday School.

The article reads:

"Ned Shields appears once more to be in the middle of things. He picks out the big places. This from one of his recent letters, referring to his visit to Jacksonville, Florida:

"I began my day's duties with a visit to the Church of the Good Shepherd Sunday School, which proved a revelation to me, it being the largest, best equipped and governed that I have ever seen. It has over one thousand scholars and ninety teachers. The Christian nurture series is used in every branch, and all are working with a regularity, deportment and splendid arrangement that evidenced the thoroughness of system and perfect management pertaining to this large school. It was a beautiful and wonderful sight. First, the infant class, then the junior branches, main school and Bible classes, each in a separate department. * * * Each teacher is seated in the center of a specially made desk, within touch of each pupil, the number in the class being limited to five or six. It was a sight worth seeing and a credit to all concerned."

Woman's Auxiliary Meeting.

The meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Northern Archdeaconry of the Diocese of Harrisburg was held in Christ Church, Coudersport, on July 24. The principal speaker was the Rev. George B. Van Waters, rector of St. Paul's Parish, Wellsboro, who also celebrated the Holy Communion. Mrs. A. H. Drinkwater, of Williamsport, told of the various phases of the work of the Auxiliary.

Huntingdon: When the new rector of St. John's Parish, Huntingdon, the Rev. Francis B. Creamer, entered the Parish, he was accorded a most cordial reception. The good people of the parish had brought gifts to help him furnish his rectory. About forty of the parishioners had gathered at the rectory, and such a display of kitchen articles, food, curtains, and linen, were never seen before outside of a department store.

William F. Hillier, the lay reader of the parish, who had faithfully and with unswerving devotion read the services during the absence of the rector, was also surprised by the gift of a beautifully upholstered easy chair and reading lamp.

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

The Church of the Ascension, Hickory.

This church has recently received a very handsome new hand-carved oak Lectern as a gift from Mrs. O. M. Royster as a memorial to her husband, who for many years preceding his death was a leader and vestryman in the Parish of the Ascension, as well as one of the most prominent citizens of Hickory.

In addition to the new Lectern the parish will, on September 1, begin to use the new addition to the Parish House, which has been built this summer. A large basement room forty-five feet long and thirty feet wide has been built under the old Parish House and extending under part of the church. The work was done under the personal supervision of the rector, the Rev. S. B. Stroup, who planned the addition. The side walls above ground are of glass so that abundant light and ventilation are to be had at all times. The space is divided by folding doors so that the room may be used as a large assembly hall, or as class rooms for the Church School. This is a long needed addition, as there has not been heretofore proper class rooms for the fast-growing school. When the painting of the new addition as well as the church itself is finished this parish will have a very complete as well as conveniently arranged plant for its work.

The vision of God in Christ is the greatest gift in the world. It binds those who receive it to the highest and most consecrated life. To behold that vision is to be one of God's elect. But the result of the election depends upon the giving of ourselves to serve the world for Jesus' sake. Noblesse oblige. —Henry Van Dyke.

The Presence of Christ.

Jane Dalziel Wood.

Now tell me where you go, my soul
When Jesus talks with me,
Where there is neither earth nor sky,
Nor cloud, nor mist, nor sea;

But soaring high and higher still
You sense, but do not see
Horizons blending as you rise
Into eternity;

Where nameless fragrance drifts and floats
Like hazel blooms in fall,
And from a thousand unseen spires,
A thousand sweet bells call.

And far and far above the sky
Most gracious voices sing,
And spaces vast as shoreless seas,
With lingering echoes ring.

Tumultuous once as wind and wave
Till Christ brought you in tune,
My soul, you harken now to Him
As tides hark to the moon.

He speaks, His voice is music's self
And while He talks with me,
My soul slips all its moorings here,
And sails a boundless sea;

He speaks, my soul is swept above,
Transcendent heights afar,
And hearing, does naught else but hear,
(Naught else but shines, a star.)

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

The Institution of the Lord's Supper.

II.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

Indissolubly connected with the blood is the idea of a covenant; a New Covenant; a New Covenant for the remission of sins. "My blood of the New Covenant," or "The New Covenant in My blood" are alternate phrases. The Authorized Version has "Testament." A testament being the record of a covenant the meaning is the same in either case; but "Testament" gives chance for confusion and he who runs should be able to read. Our Lord was abrogating an Old Covenant and substituting a better one. Blood of the New Covenant, given for the remission of sins refers back inevitably to a blood of the Old Covenant given for the same purpose; a New Covenant in blood suggests an Old Covenant in blood. The Eucharist was instituted at and takes the place of the Paschal supper: but it does more.

There was a blood of the Old Covenant given for the remission of sins. It was the blood of the Lamb of God, of the sin-offering. Lean, leather-girdled John Baptist had stirred all Judea by calling Jesus the Lamb of God. What the blood of the Lamb of God did for the men of the Old Covenant, and more, this wine in the cup was to do for the men of the New and better Covenant. If any be troubled that the blood of the Lamb of God pointed forward to Christ's death in the future while the Eucharist points backward to his death in the past, let him recall that the first Eucharist pointed forward.

God made covenant with mankind. Put crudely, roughly, but not untruly the covenant was that God would hold the man safe in this world and the next, and that the man would keep the commandments in letter and spirit. But sometimes a man broke covenant. Could it be renewed?

It could. The man who had broken covenant brought to God's house a lamb without blemish. There he confessed his sin to God if it involved God only. If it involved human beings, he confessed to one of the priests as well, and they consulted together. Having decided what restitution would repair the wrong done, as far as possible, the man gave his word to make it—a covenant oath—and then, laying his hand on the head of the lamb, prayed, with the priest, that God would accept its innocent life in place of his guilty life forfeited. Then they killed the lamb, poured the blood on the altar and cooked the flesh on the fire. Then the priest gave the man a bit of the cooked flesh to eat, marked some of the blood on him and let him go. His sin was forgiven, his covenant renewed. In case of a lamb offered for many the priest, as representative of the many, ate the bit of cooked flesh.

Various prophets had explained various details. Blood must be used because the life is in the blood. The sacrifice renewed covenant—there could be no remission of sins without blood—but not by any virtue inherent in the blood of animals. God, because of some event then future, had connected forgiveness with blood. The reason for that connection lay, not in the nature of animal blood, but in the nature of that future event.

These things made a "Sacramentum," a covenant oath. Those interested in the meanings behind words will do well to examine the difference between Sacramentum and Conjuratio, which also means an oath. A Sacramentum required an authorized representative of the person to whom the oath was sworn. The early Christians joyfully seized on this word "Sacramentum," the military oath of enlistment, to express the feast of the Eucharist and several other rites of the Church. In the reason for this lies all primitive theology.

Summing up: There is a real presence, in an unknown manner. The bread and wine are Christ's body and blood. Whether they become completely His body and blood at the end of the sentence of consecration, as mediaeval and modern Western Christendom seem to hold, or only when received by the faithful believer, as all Christendom held once and as Eastern Christendom holds now, is not settled by the record. The Eucharist, or, more particularly, the wine, the "Blood of the New Testament," is given as the renewal of a new and better Covenant, and as the better substitute for the sin-offering for the remission of sins; while the Bread-of-Life speech is basis for belief that the bread—the flesh or body is given more particularly for the conveying of eternal life. Lastly, He says, "Do this as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." At its face value this is an order to celebrate the Eucharist whenever we drink wine and, conversely, to drink no wine at all except at the Eucharist. St. Paul was an inspired man, and St. Paul did not so take it, as his directions to Timothy show.

And now, why so much about the blood and so little about the flesh? Read the Bread-of-Life speech delivered the year before at Capernaum. There He ordered His disciples to eat of His flesh and drink of His blood under penalty of having no (eternal) life in them. Many held Him insane, saying scornfully, "How can this Man give us His flesh to eat?" The twelve felt that He was sane and would explain later. The Eucharist is the explanation. That speech must, therefore, have been in Our Lord's mind as well as in the minds of the eleven, at this time. It is almost all about the flesh as this, the speech of Institution, is almost all about the blood. It is impossible that the institution of the Eucharist should fail vividly to recall the details of the Bread-of-Life speech at Capernaum. Therefore, what that speech had said the Institution need not repeat.

The Gift of Rest.

"Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

"All ye that labor." What a banner to lift up! "And are heavy laden." How wide is the range of the call! Let us raise another banner, and let us mark how a vast call shrinks into an invitation which is very select and exclusive. "Come unto me all ye that are holy!" What sort of a company would gather around that white rebuking flag? A very small fellowship would rank itself around that austere banner. We should feel that we had no fitness for such exalted society.

But the Saviour's banner is this, "All ye that labor and are heavy laden." That call is big enough to include even me and thee. If I may come laden with my necessities, and with my old familiar burden the crushing guerdon of sin, and can wake up all the numb desire of my weary heart. What kind of people crawl out of the shadow and join his circle? There are some who are struggling under the crushing burden of sin, and can find none to relieve them of their load. There are some who are carrying their religion instead of their religion carrying them. It is a dead weight of devotion, and they are like unto one bearing a leaden idol upon his back. These, and ten thousand more, would surely be found around this banner with a strange device—"All ye that labor and are heavy laden."

And this Saviour who thus raises the banner offers an unshaken confidence that He will deal with every burden, and that no weight of any kind will be able to defy His touch! "I will give you rest." Every soul is to be restored to its best sovereignty. The causes of exhaustion are to be removed. The heart is to recover the secret of its lost strength. The tyranny of sin is to be broken. And with sin will go its confederate strain, and all the harried muscles of the soul will relax in an invigorating rest. The soul opens her wondering eyes in all the grace-to-be vigor of a sweet and lovely dawn. This is not the rest of going to sleep; it is the rest of being quickened into all the youthful energies of a new day. It is a re-creation.

And the secret of it all? How are these heavy laden folk to find rest? "Come unto me." This great cure begins and continues in a personal communion with the Lord Jesus Christ. It is a meeting with a personality expressed in the vital term "Me." This is the tremendous factor in this sacred ministry of spiritual re-creation. It is not a new-thought cure. It is not a gabbling, morning and night of some magic formula. No, it is a meeting of two personalities. "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." It is the confluence of two personalities, the incorporation of two personalities, and the weaker one drinks the holy blood and strength of the stronger one. With all reverence do I write the sentence—the relationship is as real and vital, as intimate and immediate as when the babe draws the mother's life from the mother's breast. "I will give you rest." And the secret of the rest is found in the transmission of the Saviour's life. Yes, it is the secret inflowing of new life that the burdens of men vanish altogether, or they are carried with such athletic vigor as to become almost a light and negligible thing. And it is all a gift! It is without money, and without price. "Come unto me, and I will give you rest."—J. H. Jowett.

Shepherding the Flock.

It is a great thing for a minister of the Gospel to have the shepherd heart. It is a great thing to love people and to live to help them. When Dr. John Timothy Stone was called from the Brown Memorial Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, to the great church in Chicago, of which he is still pastor, the newsboys of the city sent him a letter begging him not to leave the Monumental City. He was the personal friend of scores of these boys, and through their friends every newsboy in the city knew him. More recently this same Dr. Stone received in Chicago a letter from a student in Yale saying that he had disgraced his people forever and was going out to the devil. Dr. Stone dropped everything, took a night train to the East, found the boy, took him back to Chicago to his people, and stuck by him until he made a man of the youth. That is what we mean by having a shepherd heart.

There is a tendency in these days to minimize the importance of the pastoral side of the minister's calling. More and more he is becoming the preacher, the publicist, the executive, the organizer and promoter, the engineer of ecclesiastical machinery, and less and less the shepherd. The pastor Sometimes this is of his own election. It is harder to shepherd than to preach. Nothing takes so much out of a man as spiritual shepherding. Sometimes this tendency is chargeable to a growing indifference on the part of the people to anything like pastoral oversight and supervision. They do not care to have anybody looking after them—they can take care of themselves. They frankly give their minister to understand—that it is his business to prepare for his pulpit. But perhaps oftenest this function of the ministry is simply crowded out by the multiplicity of other things. So much is expected of the minister in these times, so many and so varied are the demands on his thought and time and strength, that it is difficult for him to find place in the overcrowded schedule of the days for that patient, intimate, loving communion with his people that is covered by the old-time conception of pastoral service.

But whatever the reason, the passing of the pastor is greatly to be deplored. The loss of a shepherd is not to be compensated for by any one or anything that can be put in his place. A church is not chiefly an organization to be staffed and officered; it is a flock, a family, to be cared for, yearned over and served in any and every possible way. The minister ought to be pastor for his people's sake, but needs to be a pastor also for his own sake. The personal touch of intimate pastoral relations gives a minister a hold upon and an influence with his people that nothing else can. Heart power is mightier than brain power. Few ministers are able to hold their people by the strength of their intellect; most ministers can hold them by the grip of their heart. The average life will respond more easily to a heart-throb than to a brain-wave. When our minister has really been our pastor—has held the hand of our dying, has prayed by the bedside of our sick, has come to us in our hours of heart-break, has followed our prodigals into the far country and brought them back, has broken bread at our table, has romped with our children, has laughed with us in our fun, and has done it all not perfunctorily and as a matter of duty, but sincerely and sympathetically and lovingly—when he has done this we are not going to be over-critical if his sermons are not particularly eloquent, or if now and then there is a lapse in his grammar. Love overlooks much—and goes on loving. After all the minister's secret of success is love. We say sometimes of a minister—and always we say it half-pityingly and as a sort of excuse—"He isn't much of a preacher, but he is an excellent pastor." In reality, is there anything better to be said of a man whom the Lord has called into the ministry than that he is faithfully shepherding, pastoring the flock of God committed to his care. —Watchman Examiner (Baptist).

When We Give God a Chance.

The minister drew up a chair quietly by the bedside of the sick man and grasped the pallid hand that stretched out to him. "How are things going today, John?" he asked.

The sick man shook his head. "Slow, slow," he replied in a discouraged tone. "This plaster cast feels as if it weighed a ton. And just think! I've got five more weeks of it anyway. Who'd have thought a broken hip would cause all this trouble? Worst of all," he added impatiently, "I'm wasting a lot of valuable time on this sick bed. I can't afford it."

"Yes, I know," said the minister kindly, "but time spent on the sick bed isn't always lost by any means. Coming to the hospital this morning I passed a shoemaker's shop, and there was a sign across the window that read, 'Repairs made while you wait.' Now that wouldn't be a bad sign to put up over this bed of yours, would it, John? You see, we're such busy people in this world that a lot of us don't like to take care of ourselves property, and so wise nature steps in and makes us do it. While we're stretched out helpless upon our bed nature takes the worn and frayed edges of our lives and patches them together again. Repairs go on while we wait, and the first thing we know we're as good as ever we were.

"The fact is, John," he added, "I sometimes think that's a sign I'd like to tack up over the doors of our churches and our homes. Too many folks seem to think that time spent in prayer and in the study of God's Word is time wasted. But it isn't! Repairs go on while we wait. Sin is a stealthy disease. Pay no attention to it and the first thing you know it will undermine the very foundations of life and character. God is a great healer, but we must give Him a chance. He alone can take the worn and frayed edges of our spiritual natures and knit them together."

Again the pallid hand stretched out as the minister started for the door. "I think I understand," the sick man said thoughtfully. "I am one of those men who always feel they can't take time, but from now on I will. I will give God His chance!"—Youth's Companion.

The Trees.

There's something in a noble tree—

What shall I say? a soul?

For 'tis not form, or aught we see

In leaf or branch or bole.

Some presence, though not understood,

Dwells there always, and seems

To be acquainted with our mood,

And mingles in our dreams.

I would not say that trees at all

Were of our blood and race,

Yet, lingering where their shadows fall,

I sometimes think I trace

A kinship, whose far-reaching root

Grew when the world began,

And made them best of all things mute

To be the friends of man.

Held down by whatsoever might

Unto an earthly sod,

They stretch forth arms for air and light

As we do after God.

And when in all their boughs the breeze

Moans loud, or softly sings,

As our own hearts in us, the trees

Are almost human things.

What wonder in the days that burned

With old poetic dream,

Dead Phaeton's fair sisters turned

To poplars by the stream?

In many a light cotillion stepped

The trees when flutters blew;

And many a tear, 'tis said, they wept

For human sorrow too.

Mute, said I? They are seldom thus;

They whisper each to each,

And each and all of them to us,

In varied forms of speech.

"Be serious," the solemn pine

Is saying overhead;

"Be beautiful," the elm tree fine

Has always finely said.

"Be quick to feel," the aspen still

Repeats the whole day long;

While from the green slope of the hill,

The oak tree adds, "Be strong."

When with my burden, as I hear

Their distant voices call,

I rise and listen, and draw near,

"Be patient," say they all.

For the Young Folks

God Make My Life to Glorify Him.

God, make my life a little light
Within the world to glow;
A little flame that burneth bright,
Wherever I may go.

God, make my life a little flower,
That giveth joy to all,
Content to bloom in native bower,
Although the place be small.

God, make my life a little song
That comforteth the sad;
That helpeth others to be strong,
And makes the singer glad.

God, make my life a little staff,
Whereon the weak may rest,
That so what health and strength I have
May serve my neighbors best.

God, make my life a little hymn
Of tenderness and praise;
Of faith—that never waxeth dim,
In all His wondrous ways.

A Message From the Hill.

"Are you going to the contest, Ivor?"
Ivor shook his head. "I cannot leave the sheep," he replied.

"They would be safe enough," begged Ian. "I'm going to leave mine. And you know you are one of the best archers in the kingdom. You would surely win the prize."

"I cannot go, Ian. My father is away, and he trusts the care of the sheep to me. Our neighbor told only yesterday of a strange beast that enters the sheepfold under the shepherd's eyes and carries off the sheep."

"There are ever such tales," replied Ian. "The sheep are quite safe. They will not wander when the grass in their own pasture is so fine. You are foolish not to go."

But again Ivor shook his head. He could not leave the sheep alone. He had promised his father to watch them, and he must keep his promise. But how he longed to enter the archery contest. It had been announced that all boys of his age in the kingdom could compete for the prince's medal, which was a high honor. Ivor was a fine marksman and had made himself a bow that carried far and nearly always hit the mark. But when his father left that morning, he gave up all hope of entering the contest.

As the days passed, and he heard much from Ian about the contest, his heart grew heavy. But he had one comfort. The contest field lay in a grassy meadow just beyond the hill on which his sheep browsed. From a certain point he could look down and see all that took place.

The day of the contest brought great excitement. Crowds of people filled the valley at an early hour. Targets were set up, and canopies, flying gay pen-nants, were erected over the stands on which the prince and his followers were to sit. Ivor was excited, too. He had brought a crayon and paper, on which he hoped to keep the score. He had also brought along his finest bow and several of his best arrows, though he had no hope of using them.

There were many contestants, and shout after shout rang out as an arrow came near the mark. Ivor fairly trembled with excitement. He watched constantly for Ian, but as the afternoon wore away, he had not yet been called.

Just then Ivor's attention was attracted to something else.

He heard the distant barking of dogs,
the frenzied bleating of many sheep, the thud, thud of running hoofs. He ran across the hilltop, where he could get a better view of his own sheep.
They were safe, but disturbed by something that was happening farther away.
He ran farther, and at once saw what was the matter. A strange beast was among Ian's sheep. He was chasing the frightened animals, and in spite of Ian's trusty dog was likely to do grave damage unless he was stopped at once.

Ivor thought quickly. He knew that he alone could do little, for if he left his own sheep unguarded, the beast might enter his pasture and injure them.
However, he called his dog and ran across to Ian's pasture, blowing loudly upon his horn as he ran. Here, with the aid of the two dogs and the noise from his horn, he was able to drive off the animal. But he knew that any minute it might return. He must have help. Suddenly a plan formed in his mind.

Taking the paper on which he was keeping score, he printed as well as he could:

"Ian, come. Danger. Ivor."

Through this he threaded his swift-est arrow. Then, running to the spot on the hill on which he had been standing, he saw that Ian was about to take his turn at the target. Taking careful aim, he let the arrow fly.

Watching its quick course through the air, he saw with joy that it fell at Ian's feet just as Ian's arrow flew from its bow and entered the bull's eye. At once Ian stopped and picked it up. Then dropping his bow, he started running in the direction from which it had come, followed by many who had read the message and were anxious to help. When they reached the hillside, Ivor was bathing the wounded sheep and binding its wound with his kerchief.

The strange animal proved to be a great wolfhound which was even fiercer than the fiercest wolf the shepherds had ever seen. Great was their joy when, later in the day, he was captured.

But best of all, the next day, as Ivor was sitting upon the hillside, a messenger from the prince arrived. As Ivor arose to his feet, he said:

"The prince has heard the story from the lips of Ian, who hit the bull's-eye.
Ian says he has not won the prize fairly,
for he won it when neglecting his duty.
So it will go to the next nearest marksman. But the prince thinks you have won far more than a prize. By remaining at your post you have done a finer thing. Hence, he sends you a special medal and a piece of gold that you may buy shoes and a cloak and so attend school, which he hears you desire above all things.

"The prince also sends you this message:

"It is a fine thing to learn from books, but learning to do our duty comes first always. When we have learned that, we have a good start toward other things."

Ivor could scarcely speak for joy.
His first thought was to run home and tell his father his good fortune. Then he glanced at the sheep. He must remain with them until sundown. Even now he must keep his promise to remain by them.—Selected.

Go Forth My Heart.

Go forth, my heart, and seek delight
In all the gifts of God's great might,
Those pleasant summer hours;
Look how the plains for thee and me
Have decked themselves most fair to see,
All bright and sweet with flowers.

The trees stand thick and dark with leaves,
And earth o'er all her dust now weaves
A robe of living green;
Nor silks of Solomon compare
With glories that the tulips wear,
Or lilies' spotless sheen.

Thy mighty working, mighty God,
Wakes all my powers; I look abroad
And can no longer rest:
I too must sing when all things sing,
And from my heart the praises ring
The Highest loveth best.

Anne's Punishment.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Anne had on quite the prettiest dress, pink with rosebuds, ruffles and tucking.
Anne looked like a fairy as she gazed at a streaky black spot on her skirt.
But she was a very sad-looking fairy.
"Tar! What will Aunt Nan say?"
exclaimed Anne's cousins and two brothers.

Anne's small face lengthened while her heart beat faster. Aunt Nan was so very good to her. Anne and her brothers had come to spend a whole month on her farm. It was a wonderful place of meadows, orchards and woods, and the most exciting barn to play in. But Aunt Nan had told Anne please not go to the barn, for her pretty clothes would surely get soiled. Suddenly Anne turned away from the boys and started towards the house; but she walked more slowly up the steps. Aunt Nan was singing upstairs.

"Ah, here's my nice small niece!
Why, Anne, you did go to the barn?"
Aunt Nan's voice was full of reproach.
But she added gently, "Better take off the rosebuds and I'll see if Dinah and I can get the tar out."

"I'm so sorry, Aunt Nan. Will it be hard to do?"

"I'm afraid so."

Anne watched as her aunt took the pretty dress, instructed Dinah how to rub in grease, and then told her to wash the spot. Slowly the ugly spot began to disappear. Yet Dinah kept working over it. Of course the whole fussy frock had to be laundered. "Perhaps you had better undress and slip into bed until supper time," Aunt Nan suggested mildly. "It might be good for you."

Anne turned slowly away, and, going to her room, did just as she was told.
She wished she had not gone to the barn. But it was such a glorious place!
The boys jumped from the highest beams into the hay, and Anne did almost anything they did.

Anne heard Aunt Nan go down stairs, then saw Dinah hang the rosebud dress in the shade to dry. With a pang she thought of busy Aunt Nan taking time to launder all those ruffles. The very thought tired Anne; and, lying down in bed, she dozed off.

"Most supper-time. And here are the rosebuds ready for you again!" called Aunt Nan.

Anne looked at the pink ruffles all fluffy again. "Aunt Nan, did you send me to bed for a rest, or to punish me?"

"A little of both!" her aunt smiled. "Well, if it was for a rest, I don't care. But I don't like it as a punishment."

The next day Aunt Nan started to the city. "I'll bring back something for a niece of mine," she promised.

The boys disappeared and Anne wandered about. Every one in the neighborhood seemed to be away. Shouts of laughter, coming from the forbidden barn, hinted great fun going on down there. Anne looked at her dress. It was a plain white one, not nearly as pretty as the pink rosebud dress. She hesitated, with a remembrance of Aunt Nan's request. The fun grew louder. And Anne could not resist a peep in, at least.

"Hands up!" came the order, as she looked in the doorway.

Her brothers and cousins were playing highwaymen, and two of them sat in the old carriage, while the others, with handkerchiefs over their mouths, pointed sticks at them for guns. When they saw Anne, one boy called out: "Rescue the beautiful lady!"

Quickly the boys jumped from the carriage and hauled Anne over to it. This was exciting, and delighted the small girl. For fifteen minutes she completely forgot Aunt Nan. Indeed, she might have for the whole afternoon if one of the rescuers had not pointed to the white dress and said, "See the blood of the highwayman, black as his wicked heart."

Anne looked down in dismay. Again her dress was smudged with tar! All the fun went out of the play for Anne. "Let me go!" she pleaded.

Punishment had followed her disobedience quickly. Back she went toward the farm house. Anne felt sorry and glad Aunt Nan was not there. No one seemed around; even Dinah was nowhere in sight. In sudden impulse the child began work on the ugly spot, just as she has seen Dinah do. For a half hour she struggled with the tar, rubbing grease on it, washing and rinsing. Finally it looked entirely clean. And she hung it out to dry. But Anne had not finished. She wrote a little note and put it where Aunt Nan could not fail to see:

"Please, darling Aunt Nan, forgive me. I went to the barn again, but my dress is all washed."

Then Anne undressed and climbed into bed, and cried herself to sleep. In her dreams she felt her dear Aunt Nan hovering near. Catching her arms about her neck, Anne woke up saying, "I won't go to the barn again! Dear Aunt Nan I'm so sorry!"

Her dreams had come true. And Aunt Nan held her close, kissing her forehead.

"Indeed you will, dear; for I'd be sorry to miss the fun of it."

Anne thought she must still be dreaming.

"See, what I brought you from Richmond!" added Aunt Nan. She gave a bundle to the small girl. With eager fingers Anne untied the string. Out rolled three khaki middy dresses.

"Now you may play in the barn all you like!" said Aunt Nan. "But it is supper time. So put on a clean white dress and come down."

Low Tide Surprises.

What a charm there is on the beach at low tide! Then a new world is spread at our feet, sweet and fresh from its recent bath. The stones are so clean; the sand is so smooth; the sea-weed is so crisp.

How the children love it! They love to follow the snail tracks; they love to hunt for star-fish; and they do love to chase the nimble crabs.

What fun they have jumping from rock to rock, as on and on they go until the farthest point is reached, and they are stopped only by old ocean itself. But even then their eyes keep on going, as they watch the waves rolling in and the sea-gulls circling around, and the ships go sailing by bound for distant lands.

One day when I was down on the beach with my four boys, they were happily scampering about when I heard one of them shout: "Mother, oh mother, come quick, we've found a baby seal!"

Sure enough they had, and great was their excitement, all talking at once about its sleek glossy coat, its lovely brown eyes, and its queer long whiskers.

Before long they were making friends with the baby seal and planning to keep it for a pet, as he seemed to enjoy their caresses and accepted food from their hands.

Suddenly the oldest boy exclaimed: "What is that far out in the water?"

"Why, it looks like a post bobbing up and down," said one of the others.

"I know what it is," said the oldest boy again. "It is the mother seal looking for her baby."

"Poor mother seal," said little Donald, "let's throw the baby in the water."

This the boys did, but back it came again to the shore, and although they pushed it away from the rocks over and over, it came back to its new friends.

Still the mother's head bobbed up and down, longing for her baby. The boys were puzzled to know what to do. Then one of the boys had an idea.

"I know what to do," said small Donald, "once when I was lost some one brought me home. Couldn't we get a boat and take it home to its poor mother?"

"Yes," said Edward, "come on."

Away up the beach four pairs of feet flew, and soon down the beach four pairs of hands dragged along a small boat. It was hard work, but the boat finally reached the water. Then they carefully lifted the seal on board and rowed far out seaward.

As the mother seal had gone out of sight the boys guessed at the place they had last seen her, and dropping the little fellow overboard they quickly rowed back.

We waited and watched, and suddenly up popped the head of the mother seal then near her appeared a smaller head!

"Oh, shouted Donald in high glee, 'the mother and baby are together again. I'm so glad!'"—Our Dumb Animals.

Weed or Posy.

The rain was pouring down outside, and indoors the weather was just about as gloomy. Aunt Helen knew that grandma was not feeling very well, and the noise disturbed her, so she proposed all the quiet games she knew; but the children would not be persuaded.

"I knew a new game," she said at last. "It is called 'Garden.' I will be the gardener and you may be the plants."

"I want to be a rose," said Mabel. "Roses are so lovely."

"I won't play a silly game like that,"

said Ned. "It's no fun."

"You can be a thistle," said May, quickly. "Every garden has a few weeds."

"I'll be a nettle," said Agnes. "I don't feel a bit like being good this horrid afternoon."

So the gardener went all around, naming the plants, and in a few minutes everything was as cozy and comfortable as could be. Oh! the thistle and the nettle grumbled a little, but the other plants behaved so nicely that no one paid much attention to them. The flowers in the garden are always prettier than the weeds, so the two lonely weeds had rather a hard time of it in the play.

"We are playing a new game, mamma," cried Mabel, when her mother came in to see why everything was so quiet. "Aunt Helen taught it to us, and it's lots of fun. We are all plants in a garden. Can you guess our names?"

"I should say this little girl is a touch-me-not," said mamma, laying her hand on Agnes' head. "She doesn't look like a violet or a rose."

Even Agnes had to laugh. "I'm tired of being a nettle," she said; "I'd like to be something that is nice, too."

Mamma did not guess very many of the names, but she thought it a very nice game, and said it was time to water the garden. Instead of the big watering-pot filled with warm rain-water, she brought in a tall glass pitcher filled with pink lemonade, and the children did not drink as plants, but enjoyed the shower very much.

"The thistle has turned into a sunflower," said Aunt Helen with a smile. "I wish all the weeds in my garden would turn to flowers after a shower, for I don't like to have them in my nice beds."

"I'm never going to be a weed again," said Agnes. "It isn't half as nice as being a posy."—Hilda Richmond.

The Dolly I Love Best.

Last night when daddy came from town,
He brought a doll for me,
One with a pink and shining gown,
As pretty as can be.
Her golden hair is curly, too,
Her cheeks are rosy red,
An' dolly's eyes so big an' blue,
Close when she's put to bed.

I've only got one dolly more,
An' she gets worse each day.
For sawdust falls around the floor
When with her I would play.
The puppy's torn most of her clothes,
An' jerked her all about;
She has some putty for a nose,
While both her eyes are out.

But Mary Jane—that's she, you know—
Is just as sweet and true
As she was three long years ago,
When Santa brought her, new.
I love the doll I got last night,
But though in silk she's dressed,
I still hug Mary Jane real tight.
Because I love her best.

When Peter Had All the Candy He Wanted.

Peter's father gave him a dime one Saturday morning. "I thought maybe you'd like to buy the children some candy," he said.

Peter was ten years old, but Dave was only eight, while Dot was five and a baby, so Peter always called them "the children."

Peter decided to buy the candy before he told the others about it, so as soon as he could put on his coat he ran around the corner to the grocery store.

My, what a lot of candy there was in the case! Peter bought a yellow gumdrop and a pink one too; a black all-day sucker, round and hard like a marble; a lemon and a peppermint stick; two pieces of licorice; a big piece of peanut brittle; a chocolate cream; five lemon drops; and three strawberry drops—all in a big nobby sack. They looked good! Peter had never eaten all the candy he wanted, and on his way home he decided he would eat it all himself and not tell the children anything about it.

When Peter got home he went in the back door and climbed the steps very softly. He went away up to the attic, where he knew they wouldn't think of looking for him. It was cold up there, but he found a blanket and wrapped up in it and ate candy as fast as he could.

First he ate a piece of licorice, which stuck his teeth together and made him chew hard. Then he ate a yellow lemon drop, but he was in such a hurry that he bit it up before he thought and it didn't last long. Just as he started on the pink gumdrops he heard Dave calling from downstairs.

"Peter, where are you? Come here!" he yelled.

Peter sat very quiet. "They know I've got the candy, and they want some," he said to himself, "but they're not going to get any."

At last the children quit shouting and the house was still. Peter put the all-day sucker in his mouth and sucked all the black off until it looked like a white marble, but that took too long to eat, so he put it back in the bag and ate the chocolate cream.

As he ate, somehow the candy didn't taste as good as he thought it would. He ate slower and slower, and after a long, long time, two hours maybe, he got most awfully tired and went downstairs.

Just as he got downstairs the front door opened and Dave and Dot came running in all wrapped up, their cheeks red, and very excited.

"O, where were you, Peter?" cried Dave. "We hunted and hunted and called and called. Uncle Ed came and took us for a long drive in his new car."

"And we had candy and cakes," added Dot.

"Yes," agreed Dave, "he took us to a fine shop, and we had hot chocolate and cakes and sandwiches, and he bought us each a big sack of candy. See, I saved you some. Here it is."

"Here's some of mine for you, too," said Dot.

And both the children wondered why Peter looked so funny and wouldn't eat any of the candy.—Christian Observer.

The idea that God is a loving, righteous Father, Who has created me to be His child, capable of knowing Him and learning to sympathize with Him in love and goodness, and so to be partaker of His blessedness, and Who is educating me for this outwardly and inwardly at every moment is an idea which commends itself to me as light; and I find also that practically its fruitful and good. There is no proof of this, except in our own human consciousness; but, also, there is no real proof against, and I am compelled to regard it as eternal truth.—Thomas Erskine.

Wishing and Bearing.

L. C. Cummings.

We often wish ardently for what we could not rationally desire. The child ardently wants the moon, but as reason develops and controls, it is temporarily satisfied with what the earth supplies.

Nature seems to have set no limit to our desires, but reason has. Things forbidden and denied us are often those we foolishly strive for and covet, until we obtain the mastery of wishing.

Wishing will never bring men either to Heaven nor to possession of the good things of earth. The greatest satisfactions seem to come to us often unwished and unsought; while our fondest wishes, if realized, would probably fall short of our ideals.

The weakness of humanity when supplied with everything needed, is to create artificial and impossible needs; and from the cradle to the grave we are wishing for moons out of our reach! We are made for enjoyment and the world is full of good and reasonable things within reach, for us to participate in and share. Providence has, however, fixed the limits of human enjoyment, beyond which we should not trespass.

Our lives are determined for us and when we abandon wishing for what is not and succeed in bearing bravely what is laid upon us and doing well what is given us to do, we are on the road to freedom and peace of mind.

The Doorway.

I wonder if the Door to Paradise—
That Paradise of quiet, homely folk
Who love time-mellowed wood and gleaming brass
And great simplicities—shall be like this Old doorway of an ancient house that sets
Its sunny face to still, tree-bordered streets,
And, with its sturdy feet in garden paths,
Looks dreaming, toward the hilltops and the sea;
A friendly door, the lintel sweetly worn
Uneven by the feet of eager years;
A door that reaches out like blessed arms
In lovely welcome. . . .
Birds are not too shy
To venture on this sill with mincing steps,
And apple blossoms in the wistful Spring
Lie, as a carpet, there. . . .
A door that stands
Wide to the sun and happy air, and has
The color of glad dreams, of memories,
Of love and laughter, children's drowsy smiles
And fine tradition. . . .
Look beyond and see
The easeful rooms that wait on weariness,
With flowers gentle, or on frosty nights,
Gallant with flame upon the blackened hearth. . . .
Oh, surely Heaven has just such a door.
As open as God's heart . . . familiar as
A well-beloved face, and steeped in peace,
That simple folk who enter in may say,
Forgetting the bewilderment of death,
"How good it is, how comforting and dear,
This waiting door, this guarding door of Home."

—Faith Baldwin.

Ripening Harvests at "Golden Castle."

Torao Kitagawa was here today. The last time he came to call on us I was disgusted and a little impatient, I am afraid, with his silly philosophy and affected doubts. It seemed to me he was making a special effort to get his faith shaken. It was the fad for students to be skeptical, and he was following the van.

Today, asking permission, he chose a record and put it on the victrola. When the last verse of "Nearer, My God, to Thee" was finished, he turned to me: "You know Job?" he asked in his abrupt way.

"Yes," I answered, smiling a little. "I know him."

"Well," he said, "I tell you, people have to go through trouble, just as Job did before they can really come close to God, don't they?"

As a nation and as individuals we had been through trouble, and when we came together as a student body this fall I believe that many of our three hundred students felt, as never before, that they did want to come close to God.

Our quiet week's meetings were led by an English woman of great faith and rich experience. For weeks before we had held special prayer for the meetings, and even the most frivolous girls were in a serious mood. During the week we had personal conferences with as many girls as we could arrange for. Then, very quietly, at the close, she asked for those who wished to become Christians to give us their names. Teachers and pupils, a hundred and sixty names, were handed in. Of course that was a day of great rejoicing and thanksgiving for us.

Inquirers' classes were soon organized with twelve girls in each group. As the missionaries and teachers could not manage so many, a number of the Japanese ministers were asked to help.

It has been my first experience with a formal "Kyudoshu Kai," as it is called, but I would willingly go through fifty years of digging away at the old language if that were necessary to have such a privilege.

I had a group of little first year students this afternoon. I wish you could see the cunning little things, equipped with big, heavy Bibles and note-books, each carrying her own little stool, as they came trotting over the stepping stones from the school to our narrow little sun porch.

They are the least shy of all and ask all sorts of difficult and amusing questions sometimes. For instance: "Sensei, what do you mean by spirit? You say God is a Spirit."

"Sensei when I am praying and my father or mother calls, will it be rude to God if I stop suddenly or shall I keep my father and mother waiting?"

"Well, if Jesus knew He was going to raise Lazarus from the dead why did He weep?"

"When I have done wrong and hear a little voice inside just scolding, scolding me, do you think that is the work of the Holy Spirit?"

"When the other children yell 'Yaso, Yaso,' at me, and I don't care if they do, do you think that is the work of the Holy Comforter?"

One afternoon I asked: "Just what did you mean when you became an inquirer? Did you just want to write your name on a piece of paper for the foreign seisi to see?" Very solemn denials. Little Oka San added, "Because I wanted truly, truly, from my heart to be a Christian!" Little Kanematsu San's face flushed, and she began to talk very fast: "Well, you see, I've just got to see my grandmother! All the other children have seen her and I've never seen her even once, because she died before I was born; so I've just got to go to Heaven to see her!"—From a Missionary's Letter in Christian Observer.

Taking Time With A Child.

A dear woman of my acquaintance spent her childhood amid pioneer conditions in the Canadian bush. As the family sons were all daughters it soon became her task to bring home the cows pastured fully a mile away.

One afternoon, as she was running down the brush bordered lane which was the last of her route, the child saw what appeared to be a very strange animal with downbent head and terrifying horns. She stopped and watched from a safe distance, but it remained in the same menacing attitude at the side of the lane.

If there had been some other way to reach the cows and drive them home, Laura would have gone on, but she felt that no little girl ought to get any nearer to that peculiar creature. She ran in panic to the place where her father was at work.

He assured her that there were no dangerous animals about and said she must have taken fright at one of the steady old cows. Laura couldn't believe this, she was certain it was some monster very different from anything with which she had had to do, but of course it might have gone away, so she dutifully started back.

The creature had not left the lane, and the early dusk made it appear even more formidable than before. Back she ran in tears. This time the father left his work, took the child by the hand and, talking calmly, led over the whole way again, so that she could see with her own eyes how harmless was whatever had frightened her.

It proved to be just a dead tree that the child had daily passed in unconcern till something in the atmosphere of this afternoon, or the angle from which she first caught sight of the gaunt old ruin, stimulated the young imagination to transform it into a frightful beast.

In her womanhood, Laura cherished this experience as one of the most precious memories of her father. He was a somewhat stern man, preoccupied with his many tasks, exacting, if judged by modern standards, and she knew what it meant for a farmer to leave his work and patiently walk a mile beside a frightened child.

Yet for him to have gone after those cows by himself would not have meant nearly as much. A man who did that would be likely to say: "You were scared of just an old dead tree!" Such a statement, no matter how kindly given, back in the home kitchen, would have bruised the child's spirit. There is doubt if it could have fully convinced her.

Taking time with a child in need is a far more valuable service than investments of time, patience and effort merely given for him. What skill is required to impress the ordinary child with the importance of anything that is merely done for him! Whereas the kindly service undertaken with him to meet a felt need of his wins both immediate and lasting appreciation. Wise, therefore, is the parent who is not so cumbered with much serving of a material sort as to fail the boy or girl in acts of comradely helpfulness.—Mary S. Stover.

If we receive the Saviour's gift of peace, our life will have two distinctions. First, we shall see things tranquilly, see things as they are; they will not be out of proportion; nor shall we be deceived by any borrowed plumes. "The eyes of them that see shall not be dim." And, for a second thing, if we have the peace of Jesus, we shall do things tranquilly. This central peace will effect our activities on the circumference. There will be no fuss, no feverishness, no panic. No energy will lead away in fretfulness and wasteful care. For God's peace, that surpasses all our dreams, shall keep guard over our hearts and minds in Christ Jesus.—J. H. Jowett.

WHAT boots one feeble infant tone
 To the full choir denied or given
 Where millions round the Throne,
 Are chanting, morn and even?

Nay the kind Watchers hearkening there
 Distinguish in the deep of song
 Each little wave, each air
 Upon the faltering tongue.

Each half-note in the great Amen
 Even by the utterer's self unheard,
 They store: O fail not then
 To bring the lowly word.

Education and Religion

"Education and religion are absolutely essential to true democracy," states a Bishop of the Church; and he adds: "It has been the province of Hobart College to blend the two to a remarkable degree."

That fact is the basis of Hobart's strong appeal to students who come from homes in which a definite religious atmosphere has been maintained. Hobart, ever since its founding, has recognized the value of religion to its students and has always given them ample facilities for the exercise of their religious instincts.

It is not surprising that many students, after entering Hobart, seek affiliation with the Church; nor is it surprising that nearly four hundred Hobart graduates have been ordained to the Protestant Episcopal Ministry.

Applications for admission to the 103rd class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.

A Victory.

"Some years ago," said a minister, "my board of officers decided to send for a certain evangelist. Although I did not show it, the proposal threw me into an inward fury. Was not my preaching good enough? But the evangelist came. On every hand I heard his praises. How it hurt, too! What a tyrant jealousy is!"

"One whole night I was on my knees battling that spirit of evil. Next day I brought the evangelist to my house for dinner. Still it rankled. In my study I confessed to him and told him how I was striving by God's help to overcome that spirit of envy. We two went to our knees together. Then came the Holy Spirit. That occasion can never be forgotten. It was a joy and peace inexpressible. After that there was happy cooperation on my part. What a revival we had! It was truly Pentecostal!"

"But," concluded the minister, "the best is what followed. Within a short time I was called to a larger work. For the first time in my preaching experience I could spare money for books. My happy change came as a direct result of that revival."—Christian Herald.

We can be truest and best blessings to others only when we live victoriously ourselves. We owe it, therefore, to the needy, sorrowing, tempted world about us, to keep our inner life calm, quiet, strong, restful and full of sweet love in whatsoever outer turbulence, trial or opposition we must live. The one secret is to abide in Christ.—Selected.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"How poor is the heart that knows no pity!"

"History is a race between education and disaster."—H. G. Wells.

It is difficult for Truth to travel on the wings of suspicion.

No matter how wicked you find men to be, do not forget that God is good.

We are never so weak as when impatient; never so impotent, never so unsuccessful.

Until we are willing for God to guide us, we are not willing for God to help us.

"I will go in the strength of the Lord God. I do not know the way, but I know Him!"

Beyond is not the journey's end!

The fool goes wayfaring apart.

And even as he goes his Friend

Is knocking at his heart.

—Selected.

Lots of young people who don't seem to be able to sit still in church would work themselves into the kingdom if the pastor would give them a job.—Thompson.

The relation of the teacher to the pupil is the relation of Andrew to Peter. He is at present above his boys; but in the natural course of things his boys will be above him. He is a lighter of lamps for the future.—George Matheson.

People smile at "the enthusiasm of youth," that enthusiasm which they themselves secretly look back at with a sigh, perhaps unconscious that it is partly their own fault that they ever lost it.—Kingsley.

There is no better test of spiritual growth than increasing sensitiveness to the repulsiveness of all kinds of sin, and deepening consciousness of the constant peril from it in which every human soul lives. In the greatest saint there are all the possibilities which, being worked out, make the greatest sinner; and the truer the saintliness the deepen the consciousness of this fact.

In all true prayer, in which one cannot rest until he knows that God listens to his prayer, the soul feels small, the person is conscious of weakness, and in his own estimation he is as nothing, and less than nothing, before the Triune God; and self is effaced in order that God may draw us up to Himself that the heart may be lifted up, and that we may find freedom of utterance.—A. Kuyper.

Begin with small things. You cannot enter the presence of another human being without finding there more to do than you or I, or any soul, will ever learn to do perfectly before we die. Let us be content to do but little, if God sets us at little tasks. It is but pride and self-will which says, "Give me something huge to fight, and I should enjoy that; but why make me sweep the dust?"—Charles Kingsley.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS AND GEORGE HERBERT

It is hardly irreverent to quote the irreverence of Mark Twain; for that which constitutes Mark Twain's chief charm is that he always confronted a situation with a child's attitude of mind. Whether this attitude was real or affected, the result is an illusion of utter lack of sophistication. His statement that after listening to the endless recital of the skill and work of Michael Angelo, he was at last reduced to a condition of receptivity where he would have been perfectly willing to accept the truth of the statement that God made the world from plans drawn by Michael Angelo, is itself an immortal picture of the bridal of credulity and garrulity.

The present generation of Americans is going through an experience not unlike that of Mark Twain in Italy. There is no more striking example of the truth that it pays to advertise than that of the present place of the Pilgrim Fathers in History. They were perhaps as temperamentally impossible a group of people as ever foregathered in one place. A little company of Separatists whose attacks upon the Established Church were so violent that they, punished for inciting treason, fled to Holland. Here they were in such wretched plight that in 1617 they sent agents to London begging permission to settle in Virginia. In 1619 they obtained a patent from the company of which Sir Edwin Sandys, John and Nicholas Ferrar were the chief officers. This patent was carried to Leyden for the consideration of the exiles; and they were requested to prepare for their voyage. The Pilgrim Fathers started for Virginia under a patent granted by the Virginia Company. The Virginia Company was absolutely devoted to the Church of England, and Nicholas Ferrar, whose life of devotion began so early in life that he was called St. Nicholas even as a boy, was with Sandys the directing genius of the enterprise. On the journey to Virginia they took the northerly route, and sighted land at Cape Cod. Finding that they were beyond the limits of the Virginia Company, they at first resolved to sail southward, but the fear of danger in coasting along an unknown shore drove them back and they landed in the harbor of Cape Cod. This part of America was owned under patent by the Plymouth Company. They were trespassers from fear, and squatters by necessity, and their first act was to draw up a constitution for themselves which omitted the terms of obedience to the laws of their own country and the authority of the King, but with an eye to the wind they call themselves "loyal subjects of our dread sovereign lord, King James."

Thus began the Puritan settlement of New England. Here in Massachusetts in 1629 two brothers, John and Samuel Browne, themselves members of the Colonial Council of Massachusetts, were expelled upon no other ground than that they had "gathered a company in which 'the Common Prayer worship' was upheld." "The adherents of Episcopacy were in turn rebuked as Separatists, their plea was reproved as sedition and their worship forbidden as a mutiny." All this is repeated here not in abuse nor bitter criticism, but in the feeble hope that some day all the arrant nonsense that has been written about the Pilgrims and Puritans as prophets and martyrs to the cause of religious freedom may be discarded as the utter perversion of fact. They were only jealous religionists in an age of religious intolerance, and their intolerance was even a little more vindictive and bitter from the fact that at home they had been in a minority.

The real explanation of the fame of the Pilgrim Fathers is that they had a good selling-name. The psychology of their successful exploitation of history is the psychology of the selling power of Kodak and Uneeda Biscuit. If they had been noted in the news of the day as a ship-load of "Brownists from Leyden," they would never have been known outside the local legends of Cape Cod. The other day in London, when the members of the American Bar visited Inns of Court and listened to an address by the Master of the Temple, they were informed by the Master that when George Herbert wrote:

"Religion stands on tip-toe in our land, Ready to pass to the American strand," the sweetest singer of the Church's life was paying a beautiful tribute to the Pilgrim Fathers.

George Herbert was near neighbor and intimate friend of Nicholas Ferrar. The story of Herbert's passionate devotion to the Church and her ways; of his whole life ordered in conformity to her book of worship; of how he held the services twice a day, and how those of his parishioners who could not attend "let their plough rest when Mr. Herbert's saints-bell rung to prayers, that they might also offer devotions to God with him," is told by Walton in perhaps the most exquisite of all literary biographies.

When Herbert was on his death-bed he gave Nicholas Ferrar the manuscripts of his poems. When Ferrar sent this book to Cambridge to be licensed for the press, the Vice-Chancellor would not allow the two lines about America to be printed. Ferrar would not allow the book to be printed without them. The Vice-Chancellor finally consented with the hope that the world would not take Mr.

Herbert for an inspired prophet, and that it would not be true that the best spiritual life of the Church was to migrate to America. As Nicholas Ferrar's oft-repeated longing to go to Virginia and spend his ministry there was well known, there was something in Herbert's lines which he recognized as a picture of himself. To the mind of George Herbert and Nicholas Ferrar, the deepest spiritual aspiration of the Church was centered on the Virginia Colony. The picture of George Herbert as the poet of the Pilgrim Fathers is going too far. We feel compelled to tear down the selling-name when it is plastered on the walls of the Parsonage of Bemerton.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE AND A TOOTH FOR A TOOTH

Few statements from the Bible have ever been more often misused than this one. It is consistently quoted as furnishing Biblical sanction for the spirit of vengeance. The truth is that it represents the beginning of law and the first step forward towards an ordered civilization. When there were no courts of justice, and the only tie that bound men together was the tie of kinship, and when human life was cheap, and had few safeguards, there arose the trust of blood. If a man were killed, it became the duty of the next of kin to see that the murderer was killed in return. This crude method of procedure was the one check to murder. Working downwards, the law made every man judge in his own case, and punishment for any wrong done was administered by the friends or kinsmen of the one wronged. Soon that which had served as a safeguard became the license of the unbridled spirit of vengeance. It was to stay this spirit that the law was promulgated "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." The extent of the crime furnished the measure of the punishment. So far from representing a condition of savagery among the Jews sanctioned by Jehovah, it represented a standard of civilization infinitely higher than that of the surrounding nations or even of our own great-grandfathers, among whom a man was hanged for stealing a sheep and exiled to a penal colony for life for snaring a rabbit on the preserves of the great landowner.

It is hardly too much to say that even to-day the law of our land, certainly as it affects the propertyless classes, has not reached the level of the ancient Jewish code. When the other day the most noted ball player in America paid the fine of a truck driver who had driven a truck into the player's automobile, rather than see the truck driver go to jail, he made a home run that lifted half America from the bleachers where we all watch the game of life. Even those of us who were rather wearied with the talk of the big blustering bambino were forced to our feet.

The world is full of penitentiaries in which there are no penitents and of reformatories that do not reform. It is a truism that civilization has failed in its treatment of the evil-doer. May it not be that the cause of the failure is that society has always been thinking of itself rather than of the offender? In such case it is just as true of society as of the individual that interested timidity, masquerading as justice, is always cruel and selfish and blind to the larger issues.

The very essence of the gospel message is that forgiveness and not punishment is the creative energy of individual and social life. When we call to mind that the foreign policy of many nations for centuries without end has been about on the level with the moral outlook of gangster and gunman, and diplomacy as much a tissue of falsehoods as the whispered suggestions of the confidence man—it is perhaps reasonable to suppose that society's treatment of the criminal is born of panic at beholding the logical application to individual life of the accepted code of nations. The traditions of government are so bad. The politician in power no less than the Shah of Persia is apt to think that the world must be run in the interest of the governing class, hence government is apt to fear and dread the people. Not till government is clearly seen to be the organ of a people's will can it be possible for society to set itself seriously to the task of saving the evil-doer by striving to make him a good citizen. Deep down in the consciousness of every criminal is the feeling that government is against him. He learns to hate it even before he violates its law. "God for us" is the cry that lifted the sodden world of the first two centuries. "The government is for us" must become a fixed possession of the thought even in the worst citizens before the problem of crime can enter upon the first stages of solution. The essence of forgiveness is the restoration of a lost privilege of opportunity. With it comes hope which is the mainspring of endeavor. The very men who make mock of a religion in which they say hell-fire is a means of conversion are the ones who condemn the criminal to a hellish existence here on earth. We are tempted to think that punishment when it ceases to be discipline is an injury, not only to the offender, but to society itself. We feel assured that any serious offender, having passed through the experience of being defended by a criminal lawyer or represented by some legal fledgeling appointed by the court and of being prosecuted by the representative of government, passes out into life without a vestige of respect for the law, and with a deep-seated hatred of everything that calls itself government.

TEACH US.

"Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child he shall not enter therein."

Father in heaven, Who lovest all
Oh, help Thy children when they call;
That they may build from age to age
An undefiled heritage.

Teach us to bear the yoke in youth
With steadfastness and careful truth;
That, in our time, Thy grace may give
The truth whereby the nations live.

Teach us to rule ourselves alway,
Controlled and cleanly night and day;
That we may bring, if need arise,
No maimed or worthless sacrifice.

Teach us to look in all our ends,
On Thee for judge and not our friends;
That we, with Thee, may walk uncowed
By fear or favor of the crowd.

Teach us the strength that cannot seek,
By deed or thought to hurt the weak;
That, under Thee, we may possess
Man's strength to succor man's distress.

Teach us delight in simple things
And mirth that has no bitter springs
Forgiveness free of evil done
And love to all men 'neath the sun!

THE FAR-OFF, DIVINE EVENT

By the Reverend Charles Wood, D. D.

"Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father."—I Cor. 15:24.

THE old familiar faces of Time and Space have suffered of late many things at the hands of modern scientific men. Space has been expanded and stretched almost beyond recognition. It was always supposed that the English mile, multiplied indefinitely, would be sufficient to measure any and all distances with which we mortals need trouble ourselves. Now the mile is considered too minute to be worthy of a moment's consideration. Only so-called "light years" are adequate for astronomical uses. Light said to travel 185,000 miles a second, though in the schools of the generation preceding the present the rate given was 192,000, showing evidently that not all things have increased their pace—is called in to measure the distance to some of the fixed stars. But light must travel for 10,000 years at the rate of 185,000 miles a second before the vast gulf between the star and the astronomer is bridged.

Only a little while ago every one was content to use the diameter of the earth as the measuring rod for the most prodigious masses of matter in space. Now the diameter of Betlegeuse, the newly-discovered star, is said to be equal to the distance between the earth and the sun. Such magnitudes compel us to re-adjust our minds as well as our standards of measurement.

"Relativity," the newcomer in the scientific world, bids fair, so some fear, to replace actuality. The star we see is not at the point where we see it, its rays, through the interference of relativity or gravity—to which light was formerly supposed to be immune—have been so deflected that the best pair of eyes in the world would be deceived. The star is really inches away on the chart from the point where the observer saw it. Seeing henceforth will be believing only after scientific verification.

When to all these magnitudes and relations a fourth dimension is added to length, breadth and thickness called "duration"—an incongruous combination of space and time—great doubts are excited in some minds, whether reality itself may not in the end be surrendered to relativity.

But practically space and time treat us very much as they treated our ancestors. "The essence of time," it is said, "is that it goes by," and as it passes, it takes us with it.

"When youth the dream departs
It takes something from our hearts
And it never comes again."

In these two infinities of time and space, the past and future, the near and the far, what matters most to us is the question toward what point in space is time sweeping us on? We are indubitably moving, but whither? Is it on the rim of a circle making return to the point where we started inevitable, or is there not only circulatory movement but progress toward a goal—the far-off, Divine event? Is it true that all creation is on the upward march? Bergson, the French philosopher, asserts, "All the living hold together, and all yield to the same tremendous push. The animal takes its stand on the plant, man bestrides animality, and the whole of humanity in space and time is one immense army galloping before and beside and behind each of us in an overwhelming charge, able to beat down every resistance and clear the most formidable obstacles, perhaps even death." We can imagine the stare of surprise, or even indignation, on the faces of Professor Bergson's skeptical friends at his "perhaps even death." Concerning death, the agnostic is unwilling to acknowledge that either he or any one else can make rational assertions. Yet men as unlike Bergson as Agassiz, Le Conte, Wallace, Romanes, Lord Kelvin and Sir Oliver Lodge, see as clearly as Tennyson, the "one far-off Divine event."

For some of them, like our own Professor Fiske of Harvard, this goal for humanity is not a point in space but a condition of conscious personality. "A society of human souls, living in conformity to a perfect moral law is the end toward which, ever since the time when our solar system was a patch of nebulous vapor, the cosmic process has been tending." Christ's Kingdom is such a society. It is to include at last not only all who are living in conformity to a perfect moral law, but to the law of love, in which all other laws are fulfilled. That kingdom, to be won by Christ and those working with Him, is to be delivered over to His Father and ours. Such is Paul's outlook on the future.

To see such a goal for humanity, to be convinced of progress toward it directed by Divine purpose, may work as great a change in our way of looking at things as the acceptance in the Middle Ages of the new theory that not the earth, but the sun, is central—that our world is but a solar planet. For a final goal for humanity is practically of far more importance than a rotary motion of the earth or the stars.

Such a conception as this, of the consummation of an eternal purpose, will relieve us in the first place of all fear of the universe. It will no longer be a ponderous mass of meaningless matter, a "shuddering immensity" doomed to crush out all conscious life at last. However vast it may be, it is an orderly arrangement adapted to the perfecting of man, to the formation of that society of human souls living in conformity to the perfect moral law. The tide making for this consummation has never turned, from all eternity. This was the theme of the song the morning stars sang together. This was the purpose emerging from all modifications of matter, from fire-mist to man. This is the meaning of all mutations and migrations of humanity from Adam to Abraham, from Abraham to Christ. Not one rhythmic throb of the universe, not one pang of any creature, has been altogether purposeless. "The whole creation groaning and traveling together in pain" has been moving, not in a circle, not merely forward, but upward from incompleteness to completeness, from imperfection to perfection, "waiting for the manifestation of the Sons of God." To see this is to sing Mary's Magnificat: "My soul doth magnify the Lord," and Simeon's Nunc Dimitis, "Lord now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation," is to join with Paul in his Te Deum, "Blessed be the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ! That in the dispensation of the fulness of time He might gather together in one all things in Christ." "Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the Kingdom to God, even the Father." If this is what God means by the universe, if this is what He purposed for humanity from the beginning, if this is the far-off, Divine event toward which the whole creation moves, is there anything in that creation of which those who are in harmony and accord with this purpose need be afraid?

In the second place, this conception should relieve us forever from thinking of life as purposeless. We may look long at the stars without seeing any significance in what happens to us under the arch of the sky. We must look elsewhere to discover the meaning of things. "This world's no blot nor blank for me, it means intensely and means good." But it was only because he who so wrote had been taught to see things in the world that do not appear to a superficial glance, that he could make such an assertion and add to it, "All's law, yet all's love." It was because he had learned how to see into the heart of things, and had come to understand that each molecule and atom and unit certainly has its place in this universe as every fragment of stone has its place in a mosaic. "Not a sparrow falleth to the ground," Christ tells us, "without your Father."

We assert unhesitatingly that all matter, whether infinite or infinitesimal in its mass is caught and held in the mysterious force we call gravity. But we hesitate to say of ourselves, that invisible and beneficent forces held us as firmly and safely. To believe that God has ever held in His thought such personalities as ours, and that in His plan we have a part to play, not only like the lilies and the birds but like our brother, the Son of God, must give pause to frivolity and folly. Can I, a child of God, consent to float like a polyp on the surface of this stream of life, knowing and caring as little about direction as any creature of the ocean currents, so long as nothing interferes with my comfort? Can I be a parasite, content to live on the products of another's energy? Can I be a cynic—a mere onlooker, and critic of life, stoical and cynical, from some coign of vantage, muttering to myself, "What fools these mortals be!" as I see the multitudes toiling, striving, struggling for what they call "the betterment of humanity."

Young Henry of England, called afterward the Fifth, as Prince of Wales, danced and drank and laughed and fiddled, trying to find some outlet for his energy. Once seated on the throne, he flung aside his toys and baubles, and showed himself every inch a king, whom even Shakespeare admired. A worth-while career had opened before him, with privileges and responsibilities that thrilled his very soul.

A new diagnosis has lately been made of the malaise, the restlessness, the apparent uselessness, of many of our young folks about whom so many things have been said, not all of them by any means complimentary. Professor Sherman, of the State University of Illinois, has announced the results of his examination in a most startling verdict. It is as if a patient, supposed to be suffering from some organic disease possibly fatty degeneration of the heart, should be told by the diagnostician that the real trouble was intellectual sluggishness. Professor Sherman says that the Freudians are right who trace the source of most of the ills to which modern flesh is heir to "suppressed desire"—desire the Freudians think either for self-assertion or self-indulgence. At this point Professor Sherman differs with them diametrically. "The suppressed desire of our young folk," he says, "is self-conquest—for self-surrender and devotion to something greater than self." It is desire for goodness, for harmony with the Infinite. It is the failure of the young to see this that is driving them on to recklessness and often to ruin. If only their sluggish perceptions could be quickened by an electric discharge strong enough to change the negative to a positive pole, if they could but see life's larger possibilities and more glorious privileges, if they could but understand that they are heirs of a throne more exalted than that of King Henry or of any earthly monarch, they, too, like the young prince, would cease to laugh life away. The lowliest loyal soul in harmony with God's purpose is moving toward a destiny that dims the splendor of all human glory.

Here is the meaning of the universe, here is what God designs for man, here is that end which is daily coming nearer, when Christ shall have delivered up the Kingdom to God, even the Father. In that great day it will not matter much that a man has extraordinary ability, rare genius, power to create beauty or compel consideration and obedience from his fellow men. Napoleon's question which it is said he always asked whenever a newcomer appeared, "What has this man done—done for himself, or of more importance, done for me?" will take on a larger meaning: "What has he done, not for himself, the ego for which Napoleon did so much, or even for his country or his community, but for humanity and for God?" What part did he play in the progress of God's purpose for the perfecting of man? If God has something for me to bear and to do, if He is pledged to help me both to bear and to do, what more need I ask? While that purpose shapes and sways my life, I need not fear what the world can do unto me. "All things work together for good to them who purpose according to His calling."

"Then, welcome each rebuff

That turns earth's smoothness rough,

Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand but go!

Be our joys three-parts pain!

Strive, and hold cheap the strain;

Learn, nor account the pang; dare, never grudge the three!"

"THE ROCK WHENCE YE ARE HEWN"

An Address Delivered May 28, 1924, at Old St. Luke's Church, Smithfield, Virginia.

By the Reverend Joseph B. Dunn, D. D.

HE who would understand the history of the United States must go back to a time even earlier than the days of the beginnings of our nation in Virginia and New England.

The discovery of the New World by Columbus had changed the whole outlook of mankind.

In a sense which the modern world finds it difficult to grasp, religion was a part of the warp and woof of life. An unbaptized person was so far an exception to the rule that no service for the baptism of adults formed part of the Prayer Book till the time of Charles II. It was introduced then to make provision for the need which had arisen, owing to the fact that the Church itself had been in exile during the days of the Commonwealth.

The Church which called itself Christian having been outlawed, ostracized and boycotted during the first three centuries of its life had been incorporated into the Roman Empire, while it was still utterly untrained in the large issues of national life and hence unequipped with any ethics of the State, of the community and of business.

The Canon Laws of the Church so far as they concerned the work-a-day of man were but the ecclesiastical expression of the civil law. These same Canon Laws furnished the basis of what was to be the Christian ethics of Europe. The explanation of the strange moral anomalies of the Church of the Middle Ages is to be sought in the fact that while the New Testament furnished the Church with a Creed, the Roman law furnished the Church with its code of ethics. It was the conservatism of the Law, which is ever the defender of the status quo, that stayed the creative forces of the Creed. The pagan passion for power received the sanction of the Church and since power lives only by aggression, tyranny in every department of life became inevitable.

The Creed with its central emphasis upon the Incarnation, declared that God claimed kinship with man, and that humanity carried in its being the elements of the divine. It was the proclamation of the infinite worth of man, transcending every possible value of earthly things.

The Canon Law filtered through the ancient statutes of Rome defined man's worth in terms of his possessions, and made the rights of property, the basis of ethics. The contradiction between Creed and ethics destroyed the value of the individual; and the first century conception of Christian liberty was lost to the world for centuries.

The discovery of Man antedates the discovery of America by a century. The Renaissance was not merely the rebirth of learning and literature, it was no less the rebirth of man. It was not a spiritual but a natural rebirth. It was the appearance again in history of the individual. The history of the world since the Fourteenth Century is the history of the growth of the individual. On the continent the struggle was largely in terms of philosophy and ecclesiastical orders. In England the struggle was for a larger life in all the relations which man bears to his fellows.

The struggle upwards of man to freedom began at a time in England when on the surface the quest seemed hopeless, for Henry VIII was nearer to being an absolute monarch than England ever knew, before or since. The power of the barons was broken and the House of Commons was not yet articulate. But Henry had with his own hand broken the absolutism of the Papacy, and through the breach a ray of light and liberty shone, and the young plant grew towards that faint light. In England the spirit of the Reformation was again different from that on the continent. In Europe the clergy clung to the old order, and Reformation was only possible by the destruction of institutions. In England, the leaders of the Reformation were the clergy themselves and hence Reformation was possible by simply removing the accretions that had gathered upon the institutions during the dark ages, and by the lopping off of those lateral deformities which the cramped life of the Church had developed during that period.

The pious frenzy of Bloody Mary drove into exile many of the boldest advocates of Reformation. These men found refuge in Frankfurt, Strasburg, Zurich and Geneva, where hatred of Rome showed itself in the meticulous scorn and derision, not only of its doctrines and ecclesiastical order, but of every habit and practice of worship. All sense of perspective was lost. Tippet and cap and surplice, which were called "the conjuring garments of Popery," furnished as frequent a text of warning as the most glaring errors of doctrine. Such matters did not particularly interest those in England, who, concerned only with the weighty matters of the faith, sought to make the Church English in speech and tradition. When the returned exiles sought to strip the worship of the Church of England of every vestment and familiar gesture, and leave it as bare of beauty as the fervent but disheveled devotional exercises of a Swiss Conventicle, the English clergy who had kept their posts even when Mary's threat of death hung over them, resented the demand to conform to what seemed to them a foreign and a foolish prejudice. These clergy were anxious to remove from the practice of worship all that they believed to symbolize a discarded error, but they would not consider the proposition to substitute for the comeliness of ancient worship, the form of worship drawn up by a committee of Swiss elders.

It must be remembered that Puritan was a term that signified one party to a ritualistic controversy. Their claim to purity was that their proposed ritual was held by them to be "The pure and simple form of Christian worship." The gentlemen in question were undoubtedly very much in earnest, but they were temperamentally impossible. Milton who sympathized with their politics after they became a political party, thus describes them: "The extreme Puritan was at once known from other men by his gait, his garb, his lank hair, the sour solemnity of his face, the upturned white of his eyes, the nasal twang with which he spoke, and above all by his peculiar dialect."

The Church of England has many just and serious charges to answer, but it is to her glory, not her shame, that she saved the Church both at home and in Virginia from such a definition of a Christian man. For good or ill as history will decide, it was the Church of England, bringing traditions of loyalty to English institutions both in Church and State, that came to Virginia. The foster-parents of New England must be sought in Switzerland and Holland, but Virginia is sib to England alone. The settlement of Jamestown was not just the successful enterprise of a group of restless explorers and adventurers. Jamestown was the culmination of the long and sustained efforts of England dating back to 1496, when Henry VII granted the first Letters Patent to the Cabots, empowering them to sail under the English banner to all parts of the East, West, and North to seek out whatsoever isles and provinces were before unknown to the Christian world and to occupy the same as the King's vassals. In the reign of Henry VIII the contests abroad with France and Spain, and the Reformation of the Church at home, checked, though they did not entirely destroy, England's exploring activity. In the brief reign of Edward VI the interest of the voyagers shifted from the Western World to the North-west of Europe, and England was brought into contact by sea with Russia. During Mary's reign, little was done by a distracted people; but, under Elizabeth, all England took to the sea. Through Russia the track was broken for English commerce to Persia. Sir Francis Drake, gallant, debonair, and restless as a sea-bird, thrust the beak of his ship into every sheltered harbor of the world, and stirred the blood of young England as it had never been stirred before. Nothing seemed beyond the reach of English daring.

It was not an idle boast of one of those Elizabethan seamen whose frail craft had weathered the Southern hurricane: "There is no sea unnavigable and no land uninhabitable."

The awakening of England in "the spacious times of great Elizabeth" touched every fibre of the nation's life. After the destruction of the Armada, Elizabeth became the idol of the nation, and the adoration offered to her was such that the ambition of every Lord and Lady, rustic and child was to see the monarch with his own eyes. The desire was so widespread that we are told in the familiar nursery jingle that even "Pussy Cat had been to London to see the Queen." England had for the first time come to think and act as a nation. Government and people were one. Through the open door of shattered gallows the life of England poured itself into the world. It was the formal marriage of the snug little isle to the ocean. Every deck was a bit of England. Every returning sailor had strange stories of the dowry the sea-bride had brought to England; and the tidings made the blood leap in the veins of every Englishman, merchant, statesman, soldier, Churchman, yes, even the scientist in his laboratory, all shared the wonder and the glory, and all were eager to share the experience. The thing that had made England a nation with one heart and one purpose was the aggression of Spain. Spain was not only the right arm of the Papacy, but was the militant embodiment of Rome itself. It was England, not a mere group of adventurers, not a few disgruntled exiles, but England eager to claim its dowry from the seas, that struggled from 1584 to 1607 to gain a foothold in America. It was England with its traditions, its glory, its culture, its tenacious hold on the values that go with gentility, that founded Jamestown.

Sir Humphrey Gilbert, half-brother of Sir Walter Raleigh, is the true founder of America, for to him Elizabeth granted Letters Patent "for the inhabiting and planting of our people in America." There is no finer picture in English History than that of Gilbert who had deliberately to go aboard the smallest boat in his little fleet. When his ship and its larger companion were caught in a violent storm the two ships kept as near to one another as they could, and Gilbert is described by one who saw him there as "sitting aloft with a book in his hand and crying out to those in the other ships as often as they approached within hearing: 'We are as near to heaven by sea as by land.'" His ship went down, and, with it, its brave commander; but his purpose lived on in his half-brother, and Elizabeth gave the Letters Patent into the eager hands of Walter Raleigh in 1584. Raleigh, who represents in his person the best of the Elizabethan tradition, gathered about him a notable group for the enterprise; the skillful sailor, Amadas, the intrepid Grenville, the famous scientist Hariot, whose highest title to fame, however, rests not upon his learning, but upon the record of his year of service among the Indians. His charm must have been somewhat like that of sweet St. Francis of Assisi; for he won the hearts of rude chieftains and savage warriors by the story of the Christ.

There is romance and tragedy unspeakable in the repeated efforts made under Raleigh's direction to lay the foundations of English civilization in Virginia. Realizing at last that the task was too heavy for one individual, he made over to a company of London merchants in 1588 all the rights and privileges which he had received from Elizabeth. It is interesting to note that he presented to this company one hundred pounds for the propagation of the Christian religion in Virginia. So far as is recorded this gift of Raleigh for the evangelizing of the Indians in Virginia is the first gift of any Englishman for the missionary work of the Church in heathen lands.

It was not until 1607 when new Letters Patent were granted by James I that vigorous efforts were made once more to get a foothold for England in Virginia. The story of Jamestown has been told many times. The courage, the quarrels, the despair, "the arrow that flieth by day and the pestilence that walketh in darkness," the sad recital of it all has been made again and again. There is no need to tell it anew. What I should like to impress upon you is the neglected truth that into this enterprise poured the strongest and purest stream of Christian enthusiasm that England had ever known as a nation. No one can read the ancient charters, nor the instructions of the company, nor the list of subscribers, nor the deeply religious note of every separate service of farewell as the voyagers left England, nor the unceasing reiteration of the command that they were to hold Virginia in trust for England and for God, nor the ever-recurring statement that they were to remember that they were going to Virginia to bless and not to injure the natives, that they were to build a Christian civilization in Virginia and that the Indians were to be equal sharers with them in its blessings, without realizing that the colonization of Virginia was in truth an adventure for God.

The saintliest men of that age gave of their time and substance and prayers to the enterprise. Love of Virginia was to the white soul of Nicholas Ferrar a passion that burned to the end of his life, and ardently he longed and even planned to share with the untutored savages his own knowledge of God. Robert Hunt, whose brief life in Virginia still shines as the bright star of early memories, was only the leader of as noble a band of adventurers for God as the world ever knew. Bucke and Glover and Poole and Whittaker; and then those two who filled their post right here in Isle of Wight, Bargrave and Bennett, were some among the many who in the name of Christ jeopardized their lives unto the death in the high places of the field.

That these men were no idle dreamers and that those whom they represented were far-seeing Christian statesmen is easily proved by the effort they made to establish an institution of Christian learning at Henrico. This school was to be for the children of the Colonists, but no less for the young Indians. Money poured in from every source. The Church of England had four collections in two years in every parish in England for the missionary work in Virginia. One anonymous donor sends to Sir Edwin Sandys five hundred pounds for the training in the knowledge of the Christian faith Indian children from seven to twelve years of age, after which they were to be brought up in the knowledge and practice of some trade until twenty-one, when they were to be admitted to an equality of liberty and privileges with the native English in Virginia. When we remember that the charter assured that the Colonists and their descendants should be entitled to the same rights which they would have possessed, had they remained in England, we can see here a program and purpose higher than any nation or Church had ever conceived, and one to which even today the world is groping in its intercourse with the undeveloped peoples. That this interest in the evangelizing of the Indians was widespread by the fact that offerings came even from sailors on the high seas. The men who founded Virginia were no disgruntled minority in Church or State. It was their passionate devotion to both that spurred them to widen the domain of the State and along with English liberty to bring the Protestant faith of England to the New World.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Editor.

SCIENCE FOLLOWING THE WISDOM OF JESUS.

There was a tragedy in the State of Kentucky about two months ago.

Four men—all white men—were electrocuted in one day. They were all convicted murderers, but nevertheless it was a tragedy that a state should have to take the lives of four of its citizens in one day.

Three of these men went to their fate in grim silence, uttering no word, either of protest or of petition. The fourth was the youngest. They fitted the cap over his head, through which passes the tremendous electric voltage that snuffs out life. As they did so, and just as the daylight was about to be shut out from his eyes for the last time, he spoke.

This is what he said: "Good night, I am going home."

Once another young man about to be sentenced to death said something not unlike that. He said: "In my Father's House are many mansions." He, too, was going home—going back to that home which He had left to incarnate Himself in flesh and blood, that He might understand our natures through knowing them by experience, that He might know our temptations through feeling them.

Who can say that that young Kentucky murderer did not speak the truth when he said he was going home. No doubt the all wise and tenderly loving Father will have a home ready for such a one, a place where there will be a perfect understanding of all conduct, a place where weaknesses will be strengthened, and temptations removed so that it will be a true home.

Indeed, there are appearing at the present time a series of articles in The World's Work, which set forth the theory, and the writer contends that it is more than a theory, that all crime is caused through a physical defect in the formation of a part of the brain.

This author maintains that the brain is made up of two parts. Namely, the intelligence, or thinking portion and the emotional or feeling portion. He asserts that malformation, or lack of development in this portion of the brain is what leads to crime.

According to this theory there are men and women who may be above the average intelligence, but who are so subnormal emotionally that murder does not shock them at all. There is no revulsion of feeling over the most horrible taking of human life, or at the subsequent dismemberment of the human body. In another this same brain deficiency is shown by an utter lack of feeling over stealing in any form.

According to these statements all crime is committed by two per cent of the population who continue to be criminals because they cannot help it, on account of their defective brains, in spite of punishment or reforming measures of any sort.

It is also contended that lifelong segregation of this two per cent of the population, with the consequent lack of opportunity for procreation, will eliminate crime in two generations.

Tests may be given that will show the criminal tendency with sufficient certainty to enable one to ascertain that one person is certain to commit murder and another to steal, if the slightest temptation to do so is offered, because there is a defect in the brain that causes it to offer no resistance to such a temptation.

These conclusions are based upon the examination of thousands of criminals in Chicago, for several years past.

The writer is not in a position to pass judgment on the truth or falsity of the conclusions reached. He does know from a wide experience with the so-called criminal classes that certain persons, both men and women, seem to have an incurable tendency to continue to commit the same sort of crime. On the contrary it has also been his happy experience to witness what appears to be permanent cures.

An eminent psychologist in referring to these articles at a recent conference where "The Value of Mentality Tests" was the topic, said that such conclusions could not be reached with any certainty in less than ten years of research and study, and that to speak so positively after so short and limited an examination, was "almost a scientific crime."

The "emotional" or "affectivity" tests suggested in the articles are certainly interesting. Using them on our office force the results were found quite startling.

Two ladies of our staff were found to be practically normal, but the writer showed a tendency to murder. While the editorial secretary (according to the tests) showed a decided leaning toward violence, although there has been no evidence of such a characteristic in ten years of faithful service, except, perhaps, in the efficient way in which she has attacked the exchanges with the scissors.

The value of many of the theories about tests is not altogether certain yet, although it is continually being perfected by modification upon new data, as more experiences leads to different conclusions.

A noted nerve specialist in discussing this subject once said that while he was studying the formation of the ears of mental defectives, a meeting was going on in the same city of distinguished surgeons, gathered from all parts of the country. At one of the meetings he sat immediately behind a dozen of these leading men in their profession. As his mind was full of the subject he was then studying, he paid particular attention to the formation of the ears of the men in front of him, and he was somewhat startled to find that nine of these twelve distinguished men had the ears of mental defectives. Yet they were leaders in their profession, recognized as such throughout the country.

However, as we have said, we are not competent to take sides in the discussion of the truth of these articles from the scientific viewpoint. We heartily commend them to our readers. (They will be found in The World's Work for July, August and September.)

They interest us, particularly from the viewpoint of Christianity. Our Saviour almost invariably classed the criminal with the invalid.

It was His lack of condemnation of those whom the respectable Pharisees thought were sinners that was a constant source of shock and amazement to the religious leaders of His day.

Remember the opening words of the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, "Then drew nigh all the publicans and sinners for to hear Him, and the Scribes and Pharisees murmured, saying this man receiveth sinners and eateth with them." It was this "murmuring" that called forth those wonderful parables that teach us that the "sinner" is not the normal man, not the rule, but the exception.

The sheep that was "lost" was the unusual sheep, the one that was different from the ninety and nine. It was not a normal sheep.

In the same way the coin that was out of place was the exception. Incidentally it is worth noting that it was no fault of the coin that it was lost.

When we come to that great parable known as the 'Prodigal Son,' which ought to be called the parable of the Father and His children, we find still more startling evidences of Christ's position on this subject.

In the seventeenth verse of this chapter, when telling of the complete collapse of the Prodigal, and his conclusion to return to his home and his father, Our Lord uses this significant phrase, "And when he had come to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare and I perish with hunger."

In other words, when this wanderer in sin came back to normal he wanted to get out of sin.

Invariably we find that the attitude of Christ toward the criminal is almost exactly the same as His attitude toward the invalid.

This is demonstrated in many places. Take, for instance, the Samaritan woman (John 4:18), who was living in open adultery to whom Jesus said, "If thou knewest the gift of God and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldst have asked of Him, and He would have given thee living water." Here again Christ speaks to this woman as to a defective. He does not condemn her crime, but pities her subnormality.

Again the last verses of the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, where we find the picture of a final judgment, those who are sent away to the "fire prepared for the devil and his angels," are not, as we might have expected, the thieves, murderers, adulterers and embezzlers, but those who had the opportunity to serve and neglected it.

A careful reading of these verses (Matt. 25:31 to 46) will do more to awaken Church people to the vital importance of social service than all the pamphlets and books that can be sent out from any Church headquarters.

Mr. French Strother, who writes the articles we have referred to may have reached his conclusions too quickly. As his fellow scientist puts it, he may be committing a "scientific crime." Nevertheless, we believe that he is on the right track, and that gradually the patient research of men in what we call crime is catching up with the divine omnipotent wisdom of Jesus Christ, Who said, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall set you free."

SNOWDEN'S SUNDAY-SCHOOL LESSONS FOR 1924. By James H. Snowden. The Macmillan Company. New York. Pp. 378.

This book by the distinguished author of numerous other treatises on Biblical subjects contains a Bible lesson for each Sunday during the coming year. The plan of the lessons is simple, following that of the International Sunday School Lessons, giving suggested readings for both devotional and informational purposes, then follows "the lesson text," consisting of from ten to twenty verses from the Bible. After this comes "the lesson plan," giving some six to ten important topics of the lesson; this is followed by a paragraph of exposition of each one of these topics. The year is divided into quarters. The first quarter being an "outline of Old Testament History from Abraham to Solomon." The second quarter finishes the Old Testament. With the first Sunday in July the lessons take up "The Life of Jesus," running from His Birth to His missionary tours through Galilee. The last quarter begins with the first Sunday in October, and covers "The Central Period of Christ's Ministry." These lessons anticipate others to follow, which no doubt will cover the whole subject of Bible Study. The book would make an excellent text book for teachers of Bible classes of either grown men and women, or adolescents.

THE CASE FOR PROHIBITION. By Clarence True Wilson, D. D., and Deets Pickett. Funk and Wagnalls Company, New York. Pp. 274.

With the customary practice of the Funk and Wagnalls Company, who publish the Literary Digest, this book is not controversial, but attempts to clarify the situation on the subject of prohibition. The authors begin with a chapter on the "History of the Prohibition Movement," in which they go back to Colonial days. One quotation taken from a law passed by the Virginia Colonial Assembly in 1629, should be especially interesting, as the necessity for reminding the clergy of that day of the importance of sobriety. This law provided ministers shall "not give themselves to excess in drinking or riotte or spending their time idillye by day or night." In the chapter containing leading opinions on Prohibition, "The results of the canvass made by the Manufacturers Record is largely quoted. The authors hold that three things are necessary to meet the present situation: first, a campaign for law obedience, to be carried on among leading citizens. Second, a campaign for law enforcement, to encourage and invigorate officials. Third, for law respect until all people are convinced that prohibition has been a real advantage to the state and society.

The book contains an enormous amount of facts, and is written in a pleasant style, free from bitter one-sidedness, although making a strong case for prohibition.

WHICH VERSION. By Philip Mauro. Hamilton Brothers, 120 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass. Pp. 119. Price $1.25.

The fact that the Revised Version of the Bible has now been in circulation since 1881, or for nearly forty-five years, without appreciably displacing the Authorized Version of the day of King James I is interestingly discussed in this little volume. The way in which the old translation holds its own is all the more remarkable since there are no less than thirty-six thousand differences between the two versions, and it is almost universally admitted that all these changes represent a closer approach to the true meaning of the original writers of the Holy Scriptures.

A very interesting account is given of the methods used to arrive at these corrections. The author answers the question as to whether or not the Revised Version will eventually supplant the King James with these words: "We say that the question whether or not the Revised Version should supplant the Authorized Version has been settled by the people themselves, who, for whatever reason, or reasons and whether influenced or not by the Spirit of God, have, and with increasing emphasis rejected the New Version. Thus, while the report of the British Bible Society of the year 1911 showed that about four per cent (one out of twenty-five) of the Bibles and Testaments issued by that Society in that year were of the Revised Version. The full report issued in 1920 shows that less than two per cent (one out of fifty) were of the Revised Version. The number of users of the Revised Version is not only small proportionately, but is dwindling, and of the few that are now called for a considerable proportion would be for reference and study only, and not for use."

Of the enormous publication and distribution of the Bible Mr. Mauro quotes these dramatic words of the Boston Herald, of August 1, 1923: "Every day 80,000 copies! Every year 30,000,000 copies! And the presses day and night straining their bolts to supply the demand. A new book? No, a very old one, indeed the first book ever put on the press. It never has been off since. An Oriental book with a vast Occidental circulation. An ancient book, but fitting modern needs, if the demand for it is any criterion. A book so cheap that a copy may be had for a few cents, yet for a single copy $50,000 was paid a few years ago, and many other copies have sold for large sums. A book of universal circulation, translated into seven hundred languages and dialects. Put into raised type for the blind. Placed in all the guest rooms of the hotels, aboard all the ships of the navy, in all the barracks of the army." We commend this as a well worth-while volume.

THE MINISTER'S EVERY-DAY LIFE. By Lloyd C. Douglas. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Pp. 220. Price $1.75.

Out of a ripe experience the author of this volume deals with almost every phase of the life of a clergyman. Beginning with the Ministry as a Profession, he discusses in ten chapters "The Pastoral Relationship," "Receipts and Disbursements," "Machinery," "Visiting the Sick," "Earth to Earth," "For Better, For Worse," "The Minister's Library," "The Minister's Mail," and "Sermon Making."

The practice of the ministerial profession is so bound up with the personality of each clergyman, and of each individual person in his parish that it is impossible to put forth a volume that will be a complete text book on the subject. Mr. Douglas, however, writes after twenty years' experience, and his book contains very helpful and practical suggestions that are the result of actual knowledge, and not mere theories. His style is pleasant and he is by no means devoid of humor. His book will be found to be a useful addition to any clerical library.

Theological Seminaries

The widespread belief that America faces a shortage of Protestant ministers has been dispelled by an exhaustive survey of theological seminaries in this country and Canada made by Robert L. Kelly, LL. D., for the Institute of Social and Religious Research, 370 Seventh Avenue, New York.

But while the number of theological students is not decreasing, many of the students now in the seminaries are mediocre men of comparatively little training and many of the seminaries can hardly qualify as educational institutions, according to the survey report, a volume of 450 pages published under the title "Theological Education in America."

There are approximately 9,000 theological students in the United States, or one for every 2,600 church members, the report says. The Institute analyzed the records of 7,500 of these students and found that fewer than half of them had college degrees. Of the 161 seminaries studied, some do not even list high school graduation as an entrance requirement.

Regarding the failure of seminaries "to set and enforce high or even approximately uniform entrance requirements," the report says: "Relatively few seminaries scrutinize carefully the academic preparation of incoming students in terms of standards usually prevailing elsewhere. . . . Many of the men not only do not have the previous training usually demanded; they do not have the native ability to carry on successfully so important a task as that of the ministry. They are often mediocre men. In many cases they are men who have failed at other kinds of work."

"Some of the seminaries," the report finds, "are virtually untouched by the progress and method of science. They are conducted on the assumption that science and religion occupy mutually exclusive fields, if they are not indeed in actual conflict. In others a scientific view of the world is taken for granted but little effort is made to enlarge the conceptions of theology so as to include the remarkable advance of scientific knowledge and to arrive at a unified world." The conclusion is that many of the seminaries "could scarcely qualify as educational institutions since they neither speak the language nor use the methods of modern education."

Pointing out that "denominations, Occidental in origin, partly through the influence of seminaries, are being perpetuated even in Oriental countries," the report finds that as a group the seminaries "certainly are not contributing to unity, however much individual seminaries may hold to that ideal. . . . The influence of some of the seminaries goes deeper than this and tends toward divisiveness."

On the question of financial accounting, the report charges that the seminaries, as a group, "apparently do not know how their money is spent. If they know they do not tell. The books of a large number of seminaries need overhauling and modern methods of accounting need to be introduced. Many financial reports are well nigh worthless because of flagrant inaccuracies." While few seminaries refuse to publish financial reports, this study finds that "They fail to recognize their obligation to the community as public service corporations. Their attitude is that it is none of the public's business."

The officers of the Institute of Social and Religious Research are: Dr. John R. Mott, Chairman; Dr. Ernest D. Burton, Secretary; Raymond B. Fosdick, Treasurer; Dr. James L. Burton, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce and Dr. Kenyon L. Butterfield. The Executive Secretary is Galen M. Fisher.

The study was made under the supervision of a special advisory Committee of Churchmen and educators which included, among others, the Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Buffalo.

The Great Commission

SCARCITY OF MISSIONARIES HINDERS WORK.

The following petition, written in the Ilocano dialect, was handed to Padre Juan (the Rev. Dr. John H. Staunton, Jr., of Sagada), as he passed through Bagnen recently:

"I, Tegcaoen, Councillor of the barrio of Bagnen, speak truly of our great need, and beseech you, father, to supply our need, for indeed we are thinking that you are in doubt about sending a priest here to take care of us and to explain the teaching and love of Our Lord Jesus to us. Therefore, last Sunday evening I called together all the people whom you have baptized here and all desired to make this petition, reiterating our thought and desire, because of our many sins and great lack of knowledge, to ask you, of your high state, father, that if possible you will send us a priest to live among us, that he may water our hearts and firmly establish us in the Christian faith."

This was signed by thirty-eight men. "What would you want to say," asks the Diocesan Chronicle of the Philippine Islands, "if you received such a petition? And what would be your feelings if you had to make the only answer we have had to make, not once but over and over again, not merely to this town, but to a dozen such, 'Impossible'."

The little staff of four priests, almost constantly reduced to two by necessary furloughs and temporary transfers, is wholly unable to meet the ever-widening developments and crying needs of the out-station work.

THE LOGICAL PARISH.

Every parish in the land assumes that the Church has a clergyman ready for it when a vacancy occurs. Every parish should, as a logical consequence, either have a young man from its numbers studying for the ministry, or should provide a fund for the purpose of assisting some young man to study for the ministry. What a splendid memorial would be a gift of five thousand dollars, the income from which would keep one man studying for orders.—Rev. George P. Atwater, in The Witness.

VOTING IN THE PARISH HALL.

On Election Day a year or two ago the vestry of Trinity Church, Boston, after careful thought gave the use of the Parish Hall to the city for a polling place. It must have been a great boon to women, who usually have to penetrate barber shops or even less attractive places. The rector wrote, "I am glad to have the parish render this service to the city. It is well that votes should be cast in such surroundings, and I believe that the action of the vestry will be especially appreciated by the women voters of this precinct."

BOONE GRADUATES.

Of the twelve men graduated this year from Boone University, Hankow, China, according to a note in The Churchman, four are to study at Boone Divinity School for the ministry, three enter the Standard Oil Company's agency, one becomes a journalist on a new American newspaper in Hankow, and four, trained by the famous little Boone Library School, become librarians in important educational institutions.

One of our first missionaries in the Philippines was a Mrs. Kelly, who taught the native people to greet her with, "Good morning, Mrs. Kelly." And so amenable are those people to missionary work, and so deep an impression did she make, that to this day you may meet away up on some mountain trail a fierce-looking chief, unclad, armed with weapons, who will greet you in the friendliest fashion with, "Good morning, Mrs. Kelly."

Russian refugees, to the number of 3,000, including princes, counts, barons artists, lawyers and doctors, are living in the vicinity of St. Andrew's Church, Harlem, New York City. The parish has been taking advantage of the opportunity to be of practical and kindly service to them in many ways.

"Years begin in October" . . . It is so impossible to form resolutions in October. Yet that is the only moment when they might make a difference. For by Christmas or January, our year has already determined its drift. Shall we try, then? Shall we look ahead over the whole period before us, and detect what it is likely to lack, and bring into play what it most requires? Here is October. We have our chance. It is the Dawn of the Year.—Scott Holland.

THE SEWANEES SUMMER TRAINING SCHOOL.

Sewanee Trains Leaders.

Two hundred and twenty-three teachers and leaders in the Church in the Province of Sewanee received training and inspiration at the Adult Conference which came to a successful close August 21. Sewanee is truly the "Mount of Vision" for Church workers in the South. Under the direction and guidance of the Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., the conference has drawn larger and larger crowds until this year it was necessary to have two divisions, the young people and adults meeting separately.

Two hundred delegates attended the young people's division. The Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, D. D., dean of this division, is claimed by the young people as their own especial Bishop, and his influence in upholding the best and highest Christian ideals is destined to spread through them far beyond the confines of his own Texas Diocese. Associated with him as director of recreation was the Rev. Gordon Reese, another leader who knows the secret of unlocking the hearts of young people. Courses in some of the Standard Teacher Training Series were given by a splendid faculty and a course on Social Service by Miss Mabel Eleanor Stone. Bishop Quin conducted the class on Missions.

Thirty-one courses in Religious Education were offered at the adult division, the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker, D. D., being the dean of this department. The Rev. H. H. Lumpkin served as dean of the Social Service Department and Dr. John W. Wood as dean of the Department of Missions. Various special courses, including a course for vestrymen by the Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Mississippi, and a course for church secretaries, given by Mrs. Florence M. Tarrant, secretary of the Church of the Advent, Birmingham, Ala., provided a splendid opportunity for discussing ways and means of advancing the work of the Church.

Those who attend the Sewanee conferences get something more than information and training in their two weeks on the mountain top. They find inspiration not only in the class room, but in the sense of fellowship that prevails everywhere. It comes as a new experience to many to be associated with two hundred or more enthusiastic Church men and women. The young people especially gain a new insight into the real meaning of religion. In their hours of recreation and informal association with their leaders they come to realize that the Christian life is the normal, happy life and that joy and service go hand in hand.

The Rev. Dr. Mercer P. Logan, organizer and director of the Sewanee Summer Training School for Church Workers since its beginning fifteen years ago, announced to the Board of Managers at the August meeting that his duties as dean of the DuBose School would prevent him from taking his usual part in the summer schools of the future. His resignation as director was therefore accepted and a new organization set up of which he was elected president. Miss Gladys M. Fry was elected executive secretary and Mr. F. H. G. Fry treasurer.

The Rt. Rev. Clinton S. Quin, D. D., was made director and chaplain of the young people's division, which will meet July 23-August 6, 1925.

The Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, D. D., was elected director and chaplain of the adult division, which will meet from August 6 to August 20, 1925. The Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker, D. D., will serve as dean of the Department of Religious Education; the Rev. H. W. Starr, Ph. D., as dean of the Department of Social Service, and the Rev. W. J. Loaring Clark, D. D., as dean of the Department of Missions.

The School of the Prophets for the clergy will meet at the time of the Adult Conference. The Rt. Rev. T. D. Bratton, D. D., was elected director and chaplain of this division. The Committee on Program is composed of the president, directors and deans of the various departments. Vice-Chancellor B. F. Finney, LL. D., of the University of the South, is chairman of the Committee on Arrangements.

In spite of the added expense incurred by holding the Young People's Conference at a different time from the adult division, the school closed with a comparatively small deficit. An increased enrollment is expected next year which will make it possible to retain the full schedule of courses offered this year. The Department of Religious Education at Sewanee is said to offer more courses than are to be found in any other Summer Training School, and additional courses are being planned for the Departments of Missions and Social Service.

Notice.

The Secretariat of the World Conference on Faith and Order offers to send without charge an interesting lot of pamphlets to any one who writes for them to P. O. Box 226, Boston, Mass., U. S. A. The purpose of this undertaking is not to reach compromises among the churches or to lead them to foregone conclusions as to divisive issues, but to find out how men whose convictions differ can make progress toward Christian common-mindedness. It is high time for such an effort.

Memorial Dedicated.

A beautiful and impressive ceremony was held in St. Matthew's Church, Fairbanks, Alaska, on July 25, when a bronze tablet in memory of Archdeacon Stuck and Hunter B. Temple, of Dallas, Tex., was dedicated. Mr. Temple was a member of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas, when Archdeacon Stuck was dean of the Cathedral. He lost his life in an aeroplane crash on April 14 of this year. The tablet is the gift of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Temple. The Rev. H. D. Knickerbocker, of Dallas, delivered the address. Following the address, Archdeacon Stuck's favorite hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," was sung. The tablet was unveiled by Miss Jean Bunnell, daughter of President Charles E. Bunnell, of the Alaska Agricultural College and School of Mines.

Bible Study Through the Public Schools Proving Successful.

State examinations for high school credit in Bible courses have been taken by 2,350 Virginia students since these courses were first authorized by the State Board of Education eight years ago, Harris Hart, Virginia State Superintendent of Public Instruction, announced.

This record is particularly significant in view of the fact that only twenty-seven students took the State examinations the first year they were available, whereas last year nine hundred and thirty-three students took the examinations. Mr. Hart said that five hundred and forty-three students took the State examination during the first half of the period during which they have been offered. The big increase in the number of students taking the examinations was made in the last two years.

The records of the State Department of Education show that since 1916-'17, one hundred and twenty-eight classes of high school students have studied the State courses in Bible study. Up to 1920-'21, however, only thirty-four courses have doubled and enrollment in these courses has increased 50 per cent.

"It appears from these records that it has taken a few years to inform the public, including teachers and students, with reference to Bible study courses, but now that information is more widespread these courses are increasing in popularity at a striking rate," Mr. Hart said.

"Most of the students register for either the course in Old Testament history or the course in New Testament history and literature courses, and successfully passing the examination entitles the student to one unit of high school credit or one-sixteenth of the usual high school course."

Mr. Hart also indicated that recently, under the authority of the State Board of Education, the Commission on Bible Study Courses which prepared the courses now in use was reorganized in order to make a careful study of the present materials of instruction to ascertain whether they are the best now available. This commission, of which Dr. W. M. Forrest, of the University of Virginia, is chairman, has reported no changes in the present courses except a few minor details in the instructions covering the manner of conducting the courses; it appears that these materials of instruction are about as satisfactory as they can be made.

The outlines for Bible study are furnished by the State Department of Education. The classes may be taught under almost any plan which the local community may adopt. At the end of the course examinations are furnished by the State and the examination papers are graded under the direction of Dr. Forrest, of the University of Virginia; the grades are then certified by him to those concerned.

"The courses, it should be stated," said Mr. Hart, "are filling an important place in our educational system, and the plan of their administration is simple and direct. In this respect Virginia is leading a number of States."

Bishop Shaylor Inaugurates Movement to Reach the Isolated People of His Diocese.

Under the leadership of Bishop Shaylor, a diocesan branch of the Church League of the Isolated has been recently organized in Nebraska. Bishop Shaylor has appointed Mrs. Charles M. Janecek, 611 North Fortieth Street, Omaha, as secretary for this work. The movement is also having the support of the President of the Diocesan Woman's Auxiliary and other officers in the Diocese. The work will be formally inaugurated on the Eleventh Sunday after Trinity, when Bishop Shaylor will broadcast a message to all isolated Church people in the Diocese of Nebraska, telling them that the Church is seeking them, and urging them to send their names and addresses either to him or to the Diocesan Secretary of the Church League of the Isolated. This service will be broadcasted by Station W. O. A. W., of Omaha. Bishop Shaylor has received letters from people who "tuned in" on his last sermon, telling him how they longed for the church services. In future every isolated person in the Diocese will be listed, and they will be ministered unto as efficiently as possible, in a large measure by correspondence. It is also planned to organize correspondence Church schools for children and adults. Daily intercessions will also be made on behalf of our isolated people. The new enterprise is attracting much interest.

National Lord's Day Alliance.

Canon William Sheafe Chase, rector of Christ Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., President of the Civic Club of New York City and Director of the National Lord's Day Alliance, delivered three addresses in the interest of the Lord's Day Alliance on Sunday, August 31. At 11 o'clock he occupied the pulpit of the Church of the Nativity; at 6 o'clock he addressed the Young People's Society at Epiphany Church, and at 8 o'clock preached at the Columbia Heights Christian Church.

A District of Columbia Branch of the Alliance has recently been formed, and Dr. George Fiske Dudley, rector of St. Stephen's Church, was made president. This national organization led the movement which closed the first and second class post offices on Sundays, by an act of Congress, August 24, 1912, and has since defeated four attempts to have them opened.

This legislation has secured Sunday rest to 100,000 letter carriers and post office clerks.

The general object of the organization is to work in cooperation with the churches and other community forces for better Sunday conditions.

Conference-Mission.

The annual Conference-Mission of the Society of the Nazarene will be held at Trinity Diocesan Church from September 14 to 19, with the general topic for consideration, "The Place of Healing in the Life of the Church." Some of the sub-topics will be: "The Divine Channels of Healing," "The Agencies of Healing," "Cooperation in Healing," "Parochial Missions of Healing" and "The Society of the Nazarene." The speakers will be clergymen, physicians, psychologists and nurses, and the list of names promises a helpful and instructive mission. The daily sessions will be as follows: Holy Communion, 7:30 A. M.; morning conference, 9:30 A. M.; mission service, 8 P. M.

The Rev. Raymond L. Wolven officiated at Epiphany Church on Sunday, August 31, for the last time as minister in charge, assuming the duties of his new position, vicar of Trinity Diocesan Church on September 1. In the year which has elapsed, since the rector of Epiphany became the Bishop of Washington, Epiphany Church has been without a rector, and Mr. Wolven as minister in charge has carried on the work well and is greatly appreciated by the people.

According to announcement recently made by Bishop and Mrs. Freeman, their daughter, Miss Elsie Freeman, and the Rev. Mr. Wolven will be married at some time in the early part of October.

The preacher at the open-air service, Washington Cathedral, on Sunday, August 31, was the Rev. Selden P. Delany, D. D., of New York City.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Event—Nelson Parish.

The official visitations of Bishop Jett to Nelson County have been for years past the occasions for a general get-together of the congregations of the three churches—Trinity, near Arrington; Grace, at Massie's Mill, and Christ Church, at Norwood—all of which are under the care of the Rev. Frank Mezick. The reunion for 1924 occurred when the Bishop visited the parish the middle of August. On Sunday morning, the 17th, he visited Trinity, where he gave a talk to the Sunday school, preached at the church service and confirmed three persons. To Mr. W. D. Mount, of Lynchburg, President of the Laymen's League of the Diocese, is due a large part to the credit for the thriving Sunday school at Trinity Church. For a long time it has been felt that it would be difficult to carry on a Sunday school at this point, the church being located in the country, between the towns of Arrington and Lovingsston. An effort was made, however, to establish a school a year or two ago in which Mr. Mount lent valuable assistance. A great deal of enthusiasm was aroused and the Sunday school has gone forward under the leadership of Dr. F. M. Horsley, the superintendent.

On Sunday afternoon the Bishop visited Christ Church, where he preached and confirmed three persons. On the evening of Monday, the 18th, he visited Grace Church and confirmed one. A mission had been held in Grace Church from July 21 to 27, the Rev. J. R. Ellis, of Pedlar Mills, Amherst County, being the preacher. Unfortunately, there was a good deal of sickness in the neighborhood at the time, so that the congregations were necessarily smaller than might be expected. The community was greatly benefited, however, by the services.

Tuesday, August 19, was the day for the annual parish picnic, in which the congregations of all three churches joined. The picnic was held under the trees in Trinity Church yard, and the festivities were participated in by numbers of friends of the Church people and summer visitors in the neighborhood, the Bishop and the rector being the guests of honor. Each of these annual picnics has been a successful feature of the parish life, and it is perhaps partly due to them that the members of these three churches have to a greater extent the feeling of composing one large family than is perhaps the case in any other similar parish in the country. Another important feature contributing to this feeling of unity in the parish is the personality of its rector. Mr. Mezick has been in charge of Nelson Parish for twenty-two years, is one of the most beloved men in the county, and is generally known as one of the best pastors in the Diocese, having always in his mind the needs, both material and spiritual, of his people, and of any others as well to whom his services may be helpful. The obvious effect is the splendid spirit of loyalty and faithfulness exhibited year by year by the members of Nelson Parish.

Laymen's League to Meet September 18.

At its first meeting, in Grace Church, Lynchburg, on the evening of May 19, 1924, preceding the opening of the Council of the Diocese the next day, the Laymen's League of Southwestern Virginia adopted a constitution, one of the provisions of which was for two meetings a year—one in Roanoke, on the third Thursday in September, and the other just before each annual Council. Accordingly a call has been issued for a meeting of the Laymen's League on Thursday, September 18, in the Parish House of Christ Church, Roanoke. There will be a morning session from 10 o'clock to 12:30, luncheon from 12:30 to 2 P. M., and an afternoon session from 2 o'clock to 4. Letters have been sent to several members of every vestry in the Diocese urging their utmost efforts to see that there is a full attendance of the laymen of the Diocese at this meeting. The hours were fixed with a view to convenience in the matter of railway schedules, and it is confidently expected that the attendance will be large and that every church will be represented. Important business is to come before the meeting, and there will be most interesting discussions of the business affairs of the Diocese and of the General Church.

The officers of the League are: President, Mr. W. D. Mount, of Lynchburg; Vice-President, representing James River Convocation, Mr. John D. Letcher, of Lexington; Vice-President, representing New River Convocation, Mr. E. E. Thacker, of Dante; Secretary, Mr. John M. Horton, of Roanoke.

Getting First-Hand Knowledge of Social Service.

Six students will resume their studies at three seminaries this autumn, with a practical knowledge of Christian Social Service, obtained at first hand, and by close contact with the everyday working of several Social Service agencies of the city of Cincinnati.

From Cambridge came Sumner Jerome Brown, who helped in the Juvenile Court all week and in the Church of the Epiphany, Walnut Hills, on Sundays, and Arthur Carl Lichtenberger, who followed the activities of the Social Hygiene Society and had charge of the Sunday evening services at Christ Church.

From Berkeley came C. Ronald Gar-me, who spent two busy months as a worker for the Ohio Humane Society, helped most acceptably in the Cincinnati City Mission and on Sundays held services in St. James' Church, Piqua.

From Bexley came three fine young fellows. R. Malcolm Ward was daily in the Juvenile Court as a volunteer investigator and divided his Sundays between the Church of the Redeemer, Hyde Park, Cincinnati, and St. Mary's, Hillsboro. Allen Perkins Roe had a similar position for the Juvenile Protective Association and helped Dr. Dunlop at the Church of the Advent, Walnut Hills. Russell E. Francis worked for the same organization and on Sundays helped at Christ Church, Glendale.

All but one of the party lived at the Diocesan House, adjoining St. Paul's Cathedral, and for the months of July and August were certainly in close touch with the problems which confront Christian workers in a large city. When they graduate and are ordained next June they will no doubt be better able to enter the ministry with a clearer vision of the trials, temptations and difficulties which beset the path of those whom they are to serve in Christ's name.

William S. Keller, M. D., should have the largest credit for the conception and furtherance of the plan for the further practical training of these students. His devotion to the principle of the expression of Christian teaching in practical social service is too well known to need further comment.

The impression made upon a priest of nearly twenty-five years' experience in missionary work in large cities, by the work and personality of these young men was most favorable, and promises well for the future development of the Church's ministry.

MARQUETTE.

Rt. Rev. R. L. Harris, D. D., Bishop.

Small Towns Welcoming Church.

A striking chapter of the Church's experience in rural work may be taken from the address of the Bishop of Marquette to this year's Diocesan Convention. If the following extract seems to be chiefly a list of unfamiliar names, the significance lies between the lines, in the fact that of the places mentioned only two had a population of 5,000 or over in the 1920 census, while ten of them are listed there as communities of less than 2,000:

"The Diocese of Marquette has had a very successful year. In spite of the financial depression in the copper country due to discouraging prices in copper and consequent curtailment of production and unemployment, the Diocese as a whole has made excellent progress.

"We have cut operating expenses to the bone. The clergy, while less in number, are carrying more work, covering more territory and doing their work quite as efficiently as possible under the circumstances.

"We have purchased a schoolhouse on an excellent corner lot at Lake Gogebic, and so have a church building of our own at this mission. At Amasa we have started services under very promising conditions. At Manistique we have rebuilt the rectory and placed the general missionary in charge, making it a missionary center for the eastern part of the Diocese.

"At Gwinn this year I confirmed a class of eighteen, more than the original communicant list when the general missionary began work a few years ago.

"In Detour, besides improving the church property, we have acquired and paid for a lot for a rectory.

"At Cedarville a campaign has been started for a new church building, as we are unable to accommodate the people at present attending our services. Practically the whole village now attends our church services, where five years ago we had only three communicants.

"Rev. William Maltas, though over seventy years of age, continues his wonderful work in the rural field where he is greatly beloved.

"At Chatham we have established regular services and have large congregations serving the whole community, although we have only one Church family in the village. At Harvey the dean of the Cathedral has opened a mission church, which is filled every Sunday.

"In L'Anse, where the large lumber interests of Henry Ford are located, we have begun services and hope soon to purchase a lot and establish a regular mission.

"In the eastern rural field our work is prospering. At Newberry we have now located a missionary with most satisfactory results. He is doing excellent work at Munising and St. Ignace.

"St. Mary's, our new church at Ralph, is doing well. At Crystal Falls we are rapidly paying off the debt on the new rectory, and at Iron River rebuilding and improving church property. Ontonagon is still unfortunately without a rector, due to lack of funds, but Archdeacon Poyseor is holding regular services and keeping the congregation together.

"In the Copper Country we are doing quite as well as could be expected under the circumstances, and more than holding our own. The Church there is steadily growing.

"The Bishop, Archdeacon and Dean made an automobile tour of the Diocese last fall, speaking for six weeks to large groups of men throughout the Diocese on the Nation-Wide Campaign, and organized a Laymen's Service League, which has greatly strengthened the Church in this north country. We have had larger congregations and more men engaged in Church work this year than ever before. Over four hundred men pledged themselves to pray daily for the spread of Christ's kingdom and to attend services from Advent to Easter.

"In addition to adding three new parishes within the last two years and acquiring considerable new church property, we have had the finest spiritual response to the appeal of the Church this last year in the history of the Diocese. We have every reason to be thankful and hopeful. We deeply appreciate the financial support from the General Church through the Nation-Wide Campaign, which has enabled us to aggressively push our missionary work with such fine results under the leadership of our consecrated missionaries.

"This Diocese is a real missionary field. We have vigorous churches fifty miles from mara ilroad. Our Church is becoming a great spiritual force in the expanding life of this north country, and its missionaries reach thousands of formerly un-churched people in isolated lumber camps, remote mining and lumbering communities and neglected rural places. When other denominations abandon a field we take it over. Archdeacon Poyseor has preached to nearly 3,000 lumberjacks in the woods during a year, and other of our splendid missionaries labor among people practically cut off from railroads and civilization for months during the winter.

"We hope another year to have a missionary Church automobile in order to reach with our limited number of clergy many remote districts during the summer, where people are hungry for the message of Christ.

"There is no question about our Church being eminently well fitted for rural work, judging from the response of the people in the Diocese of Marquette."

Death of the Rev. E. W. Wroth.

The Rev. Edward W. Wroth, of Darlington, Md., after an illness of ten days, died at the Church Home, Baltimore, on Monday, August 18, at the age of seventy-two. He was buried in the Darlington Cemetery beside his wife, whom he survived by only five months. The services were conducted by his cousin, the Rev. S. S. Hepburn, rector of I. U. Parish, Kent County, Md., assisted by the Rev. John I. Yellot, rector of Emanuel Church, Belair, and Mr. F. M. Heil, minister in charge of Grace Church, Darlington. The pall bearers, active and honorary, were members of Monumental Commandery, Knights Templar, which he had served for many years as Prelate, at the same time officiating as Grand Prelate of the Grand Commandery of Maryland, and Grand Chaplain of the Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons of Maryland. His long ministry had been spent in Smithfield, Isle of Wight County, Va.; Kingsville and Darlington, Harford County, Md., and All Saints' Church, Baltimore, Md. His brother, the Rev. Peregrine Wroth, D. D., for nearly fifty years rector of the Church of the Messiah, Baltimore, and his son, the Rev. E. Pinkney Wroth, rector of St. Philip's Parish, Laurel, Md., are active ministers of the Church.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

News Notes of Interest.

The Rev. Harry Bruce has accepted the call to St. Paul's Church, St. Joseph, and expects to be in residence September 1. A rectory is being purchased.

On Thursday, July 24, Bishop McCormick laid the cornerstone of the enlarged church and parish hall at Holland. Several of the diocesan clergy were present and the rector, the Rev. D. D. Douglas from Canada, is enjoying the hearty cooperation of his members.

The interior of St. Paul's Church, Muskegon, has been beautifully decorated and was opened for services on September 1.

A new pulpit has been placed in St. John's Church, Harbor Springs. The church is a memorial of the loving esteem held by the summer visitors in this section, for the late Bishop Tuttle, who for many years, through his vacation period, held regular Sunday services in this church. There is always a large congregation present, and the good Bishop's influence has not stopped with his departure from us. His prayers still follow us.

Bishop McCormick has visited Camp Custer, which is near Battle Creek, and, therefore in this diocese, holding services on Sunday with other speakers, at a mass meeting at which hundreds of the men were present. Five thousand men are in camp at this place, it being one of the C. M. T. C. Camps. Chaplain Fell is a Priest of the Church. The Commandant, General Moseley, is very anxious to maintain the camp at a high level, and all things possible are done to make the men thoroughly efficient.

FLORIDA.

Rev. F. A. Juhan, Bishop-elect.

St. John's Church, Jacksonville.

The Rev. Menard Doswell, Jr., rector of St. George's Church, New Orleans, La., has accepted the rectorship of St. John's Church, Jacksonville, succeeding the Rev. Dr. Van Winder Shields, who served the parish for thirty-seven years and who resigned June 1. Dr. Shields is now rector-emeritus of St. John's Church.

Mr. Doswell, who is thirty-two years old, is a native of New Orleans, and has spent most of his life there. In 1912, he graduated with high honors from Tulane University. He was one of the track stars of the University, having excelled in athletics as well as in his studies. He entered the Virginia Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va., in the fall of 1912, and was the youngest member of his class graduating in 1915. The following summer he was ordained for the diaconate and assumed the rectorship of Trinity Church, Crowley, La. Two years later he was ordained a priest and called to St. George's Church in New Orleans, a parish of some six hundred communicants. During the seven years he has been rector, the parish has prospered spiritually and materially, completely recovering from a disorganized condition which existed when he took charge.

Mr. Doswell expects to take charge of his new work on October 15, and will occupy the rectory, Church and Market Streets.

St. John's is one of the strongest parishes in the South. The beautiful church building, seating about 1,200. A $130,000 parish house has just been finished on St. John's Square. Across Duval Street is the Community House, where many parish activities center. It is free of debt, well organized and offers an unusual opportunity for service.

The Rev. Frank A. Juhan, rector of Christ Church, Greenville, S. C., Bishop-elect of the diocese, visited Jacksonville last week, meeting the clergy and laity at a lunch in the Mason Hotel.

Lay Cornerstone For New Church.

The cornerstone for the new Church of the Redeemer, Boyle Heights, Los Angeles, was laid on August 3. Services were begun in this section in June, 1909, and the mission organized in 1911, the Rev. Duncan F. Mackenzie being the founder. The present incumbent, the Rev. F. U. Bugbee, has taken full opportunity of the advantages offered by the growth of the city in this section, and the present new structure is the result of his efforts. It is estimated to cost in the neighborhood of $15,000. Bishop Johnson and Bishop Stevens officiated at the ceremony, with a large number of the parishioners present. Clergy of the diocese were also in attendance. The Church of the Redeemer is one of those of the diocese which more than meet their total quota for the General Church Program.

Collect for Twelfth Sunday After Trinity.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who art always more ready to hear than we to pray, and art wont to give more than either we desire or deserve; Pour down upon us the abundance of Thy mercy, forgiving us those things whereof our conscience is afraid, and giving us those good things which we are not worthy to ask, but through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, Our Lord. Amen.

The Test.

"Try me, Oh God, and seek the ground of my heart—Prove me, and examine my thoughts."
Ps. 139:22.

Try me, oh God, my soul lies open in the light
Of Thy most loving, yet most piercing, sight;
Wound, heal, and bless, with power infinite!

Seek, Lord, for in the darkness of my heart,
Fears and desires, fierce prisoners, dwell apart;
And at Thy Spirit's candle, shrink, and start.

Prove, Lord, by sharp, unceasing pain;
By cries and prayers that knock at heaven in vain;
If only so, my loss will turn to gain!

Examine, by the brightness of Thy gaze,
Thy myriad thoughts, that, through uncharted ways,
Are lost where Unfulfilment weaves her maze.
Try, seek, and rove,—examine,—if Thy love
But leave, alive within my soul, Thy Dove,
To bear me, on His wings at last, above!

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

Institution of the Lord's Supper.

III.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

A law of the Unseen is a necessary reference from the two speeches. Told with all the reasoning which shows it necessary, it is as bulky as this Life of Christ itself. Told without the reasoning, few will believe. Yet a long steady look through the veil, here rent in twain, is given. Perhaps we can so put it that though the incredulous must be incredulous still, the knowledge of him who believes shall be increased.

There is, then, a law. For convenience call it the law of Influx, though we do not mean the thing Swedenborg calls by that name. It is as fundamental a law of the spiritual world as the law of gravitation is of the natural; as fundamental and as many-sided. Viewed from that side which concerns us now, it is the law that, where a spiritual being is thought of, there it is. Another way of putting the same fact is that two spiritual beings come together by thinking of each other. A third is "Seek and ye shall find." Contiguity in space is not to be really predicated of spiritual entities. Space is a function of the material. There is no space, spiritually speaking. If there were, he who is summoned by two persons in different places if he went to one must be absent from the other; while, as a matter of fact, he is present with both. Still, space-terms furnish a real analogy, and we have no other.

Invocation—prayer—is therefore the method of securing a spiritual presence; not because the mere words affect the spiritual entity, but because they steady, centre and clinch the thought of the being who utters the invocation, and those thoughts do affect the spirit invoked. That spiritual entity can withdraw from and baffle the invoker, or can assist him. He who invokes an angel—which, by the way, is forbidden—can, for example, see the answering spiritual presence when he wills to see and the presence wills it strongly, also, using the will of the invoker to clothe itself.

Many who read this will take it for mad superstition and lay it aside. Those higher in insight will object that the Scriptural instances suggested were highly symbolic. "So is this." Those with spiritual experiences of their own will understand; and will see that the person invoked, having answered, can reach through the veil of our flesh only through media: words or thoughts for the mind, emotions or deeds for the spirit, and food, or the force which is its result, for the body. Words, or the thought in them, build up and become part of the mind. Deeds, or the emotions behind them, build up and become part of the character. Food, or the forces underlying it, becomes part of the body.

A law of nature is open to all. Satan as well as Jesus can use it—and does. Read St. Paul on devil-worship. No one knew better that the false gods of the heathen are dreams and fairytales. There never was a Diana of the Ephesians. But a spiritual entity, powerful and evil, used the flesh of animals sacrificed to Diana to harm Christians of small faith, or St. Paul was no writer. The very reason the power of God in the Eucharist is greater than the power of evil in the heathen sacrifices, is given. It is because the earth is the Lord's that evil spiritual entities use its products less easily, in proportion to their powers, than God does; to which we may add that the evil spirit has no human body and blood such as that of Our Lord.

To those whose object that this is grossly materialistic the silencing answer is "What is matter?" The last and most exhaustive reply is still that matter is a mode of motion of electrical charges. If we ask "What is electricity?" no man answers.

Invocation attracts the attention of a spiritual entity, as you prove every time you answer your name. You, yourself, are a spirit. So far as personal experience goes, you know more about the spiritual world than about the material. All your knowledge of the material world comes through the senses. Your spiritual knowledge is first-hand. That is why, when a thing that transcends your experience is said about the material world, you balance probabilities and end, if you are wise, by suspending judgment. When a thing transcending your experience but pertaining to the spiritual world is said, you know in a moment whether you believe or not. What you believe, therefore, gives an absolute diagnosis of your spiritual nature. It shows what kind of spirit you are.

Our Lord, then, through the reception of His body and blood in the Eucharist, enters and dwells in our bodies; as He enters into our minds by teaching and into our hearts by love. When you live in a body it becomes your body. He saves us out of the power of the Prince of this wicked world exactly as he saved His own flesh and blood—by living in it. Men who lay most stress on His entering into the spirit by obedience and love are Moralists or Mystics. Men who lay most stress on His entering into the mind by belief, teaching, self-surrender, are Evangelicals. Men who lay most stress on His entering into the body by sacraments—that is, by invocation sealed by a covenant-oath and by the use of media—are Sacramentalists. All are right, and all, unless they perceive truth in the others, are wrong. Every tripod has three legs and cannot stand on less, and any leg is as important as any other.

As replacing the Passover the Lord's Supper is for all of the New Covenant. As replacing the sin-offering it is especially for sinners. You could not offer the sin-offering at all unless you were a sinner. Practically, the two functions are identical; for, by His saying of the unprofitable servants who had done all commanded them, Our Lord pointed out that all are sinners. This fact is invisible to Pharisees. Phariseism is the unwillingness to see that the latent capacity for sin, even if unexercised, makes a man sinful; just as the latent ability to die, even unexercised, makes a man mortal. Give any child time enough and he will sin, exactly as, if you give him time enough, he will die. We are both sinful and mortal.

Our Lord saved His Supper to the last. At the last available moment,—for Judas was already gathering an armed band to take Him—at the last moment available before His death He instituted the Eucharist; for a remembrance. The Evangelical is wrong when he denies its other high and holy meanings; but he is right when he plunges through them to grasp, with unerring instinct, personal point. It is heartbreak too deep for tears that Our Lord knew that they—and we—would forget Him; not always, of course; not long at a time, perhaps; but so many times. It is joy too high for singing that He only foreknew and foresaw but forgave this, and gave the Eucharist to vivify our remembering. In this he takes up all human nature as one might take a little child into his arms; remembering and pardoning its weakness, forgiving and providing means to cure its forgetfulness. Do you forget Jesus in the trials and temptations of every day? Receive Communion often. Then when temptations come, they come innocuous; because you forget less, but remember the dying Saviour; and, at the foot of the cross, no Christian has the heart to sin. In this, not in denial of the sacramental value of the Eucharist, lies, we think, the holy high and glorious explanation of Our Lord's saying: "Do this in remembrance of me," and why it was the last thing He asked of us before He died.

From my casement window high above
The street, I hear the city's constant noise;
The clang and crash of passing cars,
the cry
Of venders with their wares, the shouts of boys.
A harsh, dramatic song, whose jarring chords
Are dissonances; yet, amid the crash,
Enchanting melody I hear—a host
Of fairy sounds: the tinkling plash
Of mountain stream, as joyously it flows
O'er smooth white pebbles; and the song of lark
Whose nest is in the fragrant clover field:
The rustling of the lilac bushes!—Hark!
Whence comes this lilting melody today?
'Tis little children, laughter, at their play!

What, Where and Who is God?

The Rev. Thos. F. Opie, D. D.

"Can'st thou by searching find out God?" inquires that ancient dignitary, Job. There are numerous queries in the Bible which appear at first to infer a negative answer, which, on closer investigation, call for an affirmative one! Can one by not searching find out God?

Are we to suppose that God is easier to find than gold and silver and iron?—or than knowledge, information, wisdom? Is the idea of God easier of mastery than geometry, science, philosophy?—than art, music, poetry?—than geography, grammar or graphics?

Any one who has not lost all acquaintance with goodness, truth, beauty—with love, purity, holiness—with justice, mercy, kindness—this man can indeed find God! These be God at work in the world.

Is God a great potentate? Is God a sort of cosmic giant with head, hands and physical form? Is God one who is magnified by "sinking you down to hell"? Little wonder that millions have never found God!

Is God one who kills, murders, tortures with death, diphtheria and deadly disease? Is He one who takes away baby, father, mother—husband, wife, sister, brother—to punish you for petty ignorance, petty sin (or for colossal ignorance and cardinal sin!)? Did not Isaiah say of Him, "A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench"? The reed is symbolic of feebleness, weakness, unworthiness—He will not crush it. He will not break or banish it—but will heal, strengthen, confirm it. The flickering wick will He not extinguish or trample—but this He will renew, replenish, rekindle.

Is God a Material Form in the heavens? Can you by searching find such a God? There are over five thousand million stars in the heavens and unmeasured space. If God be physical or of physical parts, can you visit these planets or this space and locate God? Can you by vocal inquiry, by physical search, optical investigation, discover God? It would require a million years to reach one of the billions of stars in the universe, if you traveled at the rate of sixty miles an hour. Your search would, therefore, end almost before it should begin.

Where, then, is God? God is within and all about you. In Him we live, we subsist, we develop, grow, think, love, aspire and achieve. In Him we move, we find locomotion, sense, progress, make a livelihood, attain to destiny. In Him we have our being. What aid is to the bird, what water is to the fish, what oxygen is to the lungs—that God is to the human soul. What love is to the heart, what thought is to the mind, what light is to the eye—that God is to us.

"God is the everlasting spirit or principle of good," says O. S. Harden. But, is that all? No! God is also everlasting spirit or principle of truth, of justice, beauty, fellowship, life development, perfection, purity. But is that all? No! God is infinitely more than we can think, feel or imagine!

Not by any physical search in a physical world can you find God. But if truth, justice, fellowship, beauty, perfection, purity be in the world—in you—in those about you—then, with spiritual apperception, you can by searching find Him. You will find Him only partially—but nevertheless you will find Him vitally, essentially and convincingly. "God, from beautiful necessity, is love."

Looking Forward.

Not long ago one of our pupil teachers, who has been with us since she was a small child, came into my room and told me, with a very smiling face, that the young teacher to whom she is engaged, had sent her a present with these words on it, "To my Lily of the Valley." Whereupon I asked her if she knew what a "Lily of the Valley" was. She replied "No mam." I then described it and told her how beautiful and white it was. "And I am as black as fire coal," said she, with a hearty laugh. Then I told her that no matter whether one's skin be black, red, or yellow, the heart can be as pure and white as the lily. "I like that name now," was the prompt reply. I am telling this anecdote because it is a part of my vision for these girls to live such pure good lives that they may beautify and brighten the lives of all with whom they come into contact.

A peculiarity of the African lily is that it bursts open about sunset and sends forth its first fragrance into the darkness. Is this not included in our vision of the future of the Native girls of this school, that they carry the love and joy and peace of the Gospel of Christ to their relatives and friends in the Interior who are now in the darkness of heathenism and Mohammedanism?

In order to realize this vision of the future certain things must come to pass in the near future. A new and larger building is much needed here. The portable house brought out by Miss Mahoney, which is nearly twenty years old and in such bad condition that it cannot be repaired, is a source of great anxiety for fear it will go over in a high wind. Our Liberian teacher, who lives there, has been warned to rush out quickly should she feel it going. We have now fifty girls who sleep in one room over our head. It is not a very sanitary dormitory for when it storms all the windows have to be closed. I wonder if any of the readers have ever had fifty children between the ages of four and twenty-six sleeping over their head every night! If so, they will readily understand how pleasant it is! The girls' dining room is so small that some are obliged to eat in one of the class rooms, and the small girls have no room to sit down so must stand at their meals. Besides another dining room and dormitory, a playroom is greatly needed for there is no place now for the children on rainy days except the large school room which adjoins the principal's bedroom. Not very conducive to rest or tired nerves! Although this house is not in good condition in some parts it can be repaired.

One night this week we were awakened by Bobbie, the dog, barking just outside my room door. Going out to see what the trouble was, I found a viper in the hall, coiled and ready to spring. It had evidently come in through a small hole in the floor of another room. Some of the older girls rushed down and soon killed it, but it was not a pleasant experience for three o'clock in the morning. This week has been a series of exciting experiences. The very next night a leopard carried off our teacher's dog. About a year ago our own dog was carried off one; but Bobbie, being a large dog, managed to escape, and got back about twelve hours later in a frightful condition. We thought that he would die, but after being cared for like a child, recovered and now sleeps in the house to avoid another such experience and to guard the workers from such wild things as vipers!

Although, the preceding experiences make missionary life somewhat exciting, it would be more peaceable if they could be avoided. Such material things as the new house, with dormitory, playroom, storerooms, school rooms and chapel, will be a great help towards the realization of the vision for the future. May God grant that it may soon be realized.—Margaretta S. Ridgely, in Lutheran Churchman.

Dreams and Visions.

F. Leonard.

Dear Lord, Thy Church stands dreaming age-old dreams
Of Truths forever new.
And at her door Thy young men wait,
With unlit torches in their hands,
Deep visions in their eyes,
And in their longing hearts fair altars consecrate
Unto the Unknown God.

Father of light, send down Thy living
Spirit's flame!
Awake the age-old dreams;
Baptize the nameless altars with Thy Name.
Guide youth to light its torches at the altar-coals
And gather dreamers and seers, with one accord
To know and speak the message of our Risen Lord.

The way seems too narrow only to those whose feet have never entered it. The gate seems too straight only to those who do not know that God's commandments are exceeding broad. Christ's law is a gracious liberty. His service is a perfect freedom. His statutes become our songs in the house of our pilgrimage.—W. M. Clow.

The Bird's Lesson.

Alice B. Joynes.

A tiny bird carols

On yonder green hill,

His musical throat

Running over with glee.

He whistles and chirps

And sings his sweet song,

Merry and happy

All the day long.

He cares not at all

For the clouds in the sky,

Though he hears the wind whistle

And sees the storm nigh,

He rocks on his branch,

Near his mate's little nest,

To cheer the whole world

He is doing his best.

O birdie, I pray,

Teach this lesson to me,

To sing and be happy

Wherever I be,

To look upon life

As cause for content,

And take as a blessing

Whatever is sent.

Why We Love Dolly Madison.

PART I.

Our "Queen Dolly" won her place in the hearts of all Americans, not because of her beauty and courage, but for the reason that she was always kind, good and lovable. We know that she was beautiful and so brave she narrowly escaped the chance of capture when the British destroyed our capital city. President Madison, of course, commanded her to leave the White House on the arrival of the enemy, which Dolly was obliged to do; but Admiral Cockburn told one of the citizens of Washington that if Dolly Madison had stayed at home he would not have burned the White House. He referred to our President as "Jim" and "Jimmy," but he ever spoke courteously of our lovely Dolly.

Maybe Admiral Cockburn never heard that Dolly would have fought for her home had it been possible, and that she wished for a cannon to be placed at every window. Such was the reception she would have liked to give Admiral Cockburn the very day in 1814, when he said, "I would rather protect than burn a house which sheltered so excellent a lady." It may be that he would have done so had she, contrary to orders, remained in the city.

It is comforting to know that Dolly Madison saved a wagon-load of White House treasures, besides the famous portrait of George Washington.

We all know that Dolly Madison was born a Quaker baby and was named Dorothea Payne. We are told that as a little girl she was "wondrously fair." Her Quaker mother not only made little Dolly wear a sunbonnet to school, but she sewed a white linen mask over her face to protect her skin from sunburn, tan and freckles.

When Dolly Madison was eighteen she is described as being "of slight form, possessing a delicately oval face, a nose tilted like a flower, yet black hair and blue eyes of wondrous sweetness."

When she was twenty-two years old she obeyed her father and married John Todd, Jr., after assuring the young man that "she never meant to marry."

Mr. and Mrs. Todd lived in Philadelphia until after the outbreak of yellow fever. Then, with her little boy, Dolly was sent away from the city while her husband, who was a hero, stayed to do his duty. When, at last, he too could leave the city, it was only to die of the fever. The lovely Dolly was stricken with the disease. When she recovered, her baby girl was dead, although the little boy lived.

At this time Dolly was twenty-five years old and so beautiful, a Quaker friend said to her one day, "Hide thy face—there are so many staring at thee."

About one year later Dorothy Todd, the lovely rich young widow, married James Madison, who took her home to Montpelier, his estate in Virginia. There her children came to live. Dolly Madison's little sister, Anna, the one she called her sister-child, had always shared her home, and the other child was her own little boy, Payne Todd.

Mrs. Harriet Taylor Upton says of the beautiful old home: "Montpelier was a true children's paradise. The house, garlanded with roses and jessamine, stood on a slightly slope sheltered at the north by the Blue Ridge Mountains. It possessed a great hall and a spacious many columned portico, where on rainy days the two children played dolls and hop-scotch and marbles, and where their dignified adopted father and his half-dozen brothers and sisters played before them; for Montpelier was an old place, the original Madison estate, taken up only fifteen years after the settlement of Jamestown. Outside was a boundless playground, three hundred acres, more or less. At the very doors were delightful old gardens and ancient trees, which hid from view the cabin and out-buildings that always clustered around a planter's house, where long paths led away bordered with silver pines."

There were flowers at Montpelier which the children were allowed to pick, and fruit in abundance. There Dolly Madison taught her little boy to read and played with the children on the lawns, and went for long walks or drives in the afternoons. There Grandma Madison told them stories and taught them much which it was necessary for old-fashioned children to know. It would be hard to imagine a happier childhood than little sister Anna and Payne Todd lived in Virginia. The time came when the little boy was sent to school in Baltimore, where he was placed in the care of the Bishop of Maryland.

When Mr. Madison became President Jefferson's Secretary of State, his wife and her sister Anna not only went to Washington to live, but it became their delightful duty to preside at the State dinners at the White House. It was at this time that "Queen Dolly," as she was soon lovingly called, began her reign. Mr. Jefferson's daughters loved Mrs. Madison, and history records that our Dolly was always ready to help them and their families in any way, from shopping for them to taking care of Mrs. Randolph's three little daughters, so that the first baby born in the White House, James Madison Randolph, might have his naps, undisturbed by laughing, romping little sisters.

Mrs. Upton says that one time Dolly Madison bought dolls for the three litle Randolph girls on one of these afternoons, which was a joyful and appreciated surprise.

It is no wonder that all the servant families at Montpelier were glad when Mr. and Mrs. Madison came home for their annual visit, because Mrs. Madison always brought gifts for the children and their mothers.

In 1804 Mrs. Madison's sister, Anna, married Mr. Cutts, a Congressman from Maine, whose home in Washington was on Lafayette Square, almost directly across from the White House. Five years later Mr. James Madison was elected President of the United States and Dolly Madison went to live for eight years in the White House, where she had so often been the useful and gracious guest of the Jeffersons for the eight preceding years.

Mr. Cutts, her sister Anna's husband, owned all the square in which his house stood and where you may now see the great bank building. When the little ones had the measles Mrs. Madison used to go every day to help care for them. It is remembered that she told fairy tales and made doll-clothes and was a welcome visitor always, measles or no measles.

Mrs. Madison was lovely toward all human beings. Although she no longer wore the Quaker dress, she always said "thee" and "thou" in her letters to her Quaker mother.

Imagine how radiant our Dolly must have looked at the New Year's reception at the White House in 1813. "Mrs. Madison received in a robe of pink satin," an old letter tells us, "pink satin trimmed elaborately with ermine, gold chains and clasps about her waist and wrists, and upon her head a white satin and velvet turban, with a crescent in front, and crowned with nodding ostrich plumes."—Frances Margaret Fox in Presbyterian Banner.

The Treetop Playhouse.

Mary Lou's mother and father had moved into a new house in a new part of town, and their yard had just been graded and sown to grass. The tiny green shoots were coming up, but Mary Lou quite understood that it would never do to walk on them. So she sat on the front porch and played with her doll Floribel or sat on the back porch and looked at the apple tree. Its lovely cool shade was inviting, but Mary Lou knew that, if she played under it, she would destroy the grass, and she did not want to do that. But she never grew tired of looking at the tree from the back porch or of dreaming of the time when she and Floribel could have tea parties under its big branches.

"I declare," said Mary Lou's mother one day, "if it were not so dusty under the tree, I should tell you to play there now."

"Oh, I can wait until next year, when the grass has grown strong," answered Mary Lou cheerfully.

That afternoon she carried her little table and chairs and Floribel's bed out on the front porch. Floribel had been fretful all the morning, and Mary Lou thought a nap would do her good. She was trying to rock her to sleep when some ladies came to see Mary Lou's mother. Since it was cool on the porch, they sat there. Mary Lou sat in her little rocker, but it is not very easy to quiet fretful babies when people all around you are talking.

After a while the ladies left, and Floribel had just begun to go to sleep when the boarders came home. You can't play house properly when four young men sit right there and joke about things. So mother noticed that when Mary Lou went upstairs to bed that night she was not an altogether happy little girl, and mother was a little worried.

The next morning Mrs. Jones, who lived next door, took Mary Lou into the country. All day long she and Floribel played under the trees, and the kind lady they visited even brought dinner and supper out to her. They did not reach home until dark, and Mary Lou was so tired that she went straight to bed, and slept later than usual the next morning.

"Aren't you going to get up, dear?" called her mother.

"Oh, yes," said Mary Lou. "I was thinking of yesterday under the trees, and I want to tell you all about it. I'll get up right away."

"Better hurry; I have something to show you," said her mother with a smile.

"Must I eat before you show me?"

"Not this once," was the startling answer.

Mary Lou could not think of anything's being so important as that. What could it be? Her mother led her down the back stairs and opened the back door. What do you think Mary Lou saw? A brand-new board walk leading right up to the apple tree! She clapped her hands and danced up and down. "Oh, isn't it lovely!" she exclaimed.

She skipped out to the tree, and another surprise was there—little narrow steps.

Up she climbed, and right there in the tree was a board platform with a stout railing round it, and Mary Lou's furniture all arranged. It was the shadiest, coolest, loveliest playhouse in the whole world; and Mary Lou said so when she could speak. She ate her breakfast there and almost all of her meals for the rest of the summer! After a while the robins and orioles didn't seem to mind having a little girl for a neighbor. They sang as usual, and Mary Lou sang too.—Youth's Companion.

A Little Churchgoer.

Today's the very firstest time

I ever went to church at all

I couldn't go before because

My mother said I was too small;

But now I've had a birthday, so

I'm plenty big enough to go.

I listened very hard today,

And sat up just as still and good.

The people sang such lovely hymns;

And I sang too, the best I could.

The preacher read the Bible twice.

I think that church is very nice.

My grandmamma, when she began

To go to church, was only three,

And she's been going sixty years;

She says she guesses I will be

Just like her—and I hope so, too;

I'm going to church my whole life through.

O Chie San.

It was a happy day for O Chie San, because that morning her father had said that she might begin going to the kindergarten taught by the young women missionaries. "You must not believe what you hear them tell about their God, for our gods in Japan are different," said her father. "But in their school you will learn the English language, so you may go tomorrow."

In the kindergarten O Chie San saw pictures and heard stories about Jesus, and she learned that God is a dear, loving heavenly Father who is always near to help, although people cannot see Him. The great, ugly stone god before which she had been taught to bow in the temple was not at all like that, and O Chie San was always afraid to look at it. But after she learned about Jesus she would whisper as she knelt beside her mother in the temple, "Dear Jesus, take care of me."

One day her whisper was loud enough for her mother to hear. "What are you saying, O Chie San?" her mother asked. When she found that her little girl had been praying to the missionary's God while she was bowing before an idol in a Japanese temple, she was greatly frightened. They hurried home, and the father and mother said many prayers and offered many gifts to the idols to keep them from doing something terrible to punish them all for what O Chie San had done.

The little girl was not allowed to go to kindergarten, and she was kept inside the house, except when she was taken to the temple to ask the idol's forgiveness. "But he cannot hear us as Jesus can," said O Chie San.

"You must not talk about Jesus any more," said her father.

Then one afternoon the teacher came to see why O Chie San did not come to kindergarten. O Chie San sat beside her and held her hand tightly while her father, her mother and the teacher talked. The teacher was so gentle and so kind that the father and mother could not keep on being angry with her; and when she went away she left a Bible which they promised to read.

They found new and wonderful things in the Bible. O Chie San was surprised when her father asked her to say for him the little prayer she had learned, and to sing the song, "Jesus Loves Me." The next morning she went back to the kindergarten.

"My father is coming soon to get you to tell him more about Jesus," she said.—Belfast Witness.

Jimmy and His Brass Bed.

Jimmy had a room of his own, and a bed of his own; it was a good room and a good bed; but one day the small boy told his mother that he wished to sleep in the big brass bed in the spare bedroom. That was the bed and the bedroom kept for company; where friends and aunts and uncles and grandfathers and grandmothers slept when they came visiting. It was a beautiful room, too, with blue paper on the walls and soft white curtains at the windows and blue silk draperies both sides of the curtains. The bed was a big brass bed with big posts and spindles. It looked as if it were big enough for the big bear to sleep in, and much too big for a little boy.

Yet Jimmy always wished to sleep in that bed. He told his mother that he could not remember back to a time when he did not want to sleep in that bed. At first Jimmy's mother laughed, then she said:

"Where would we put our company when they came to stay all night?"

"I would go back and sleep in my own bed, then," answered Jimmy.

"It is like this, Jimmy," the little boy's mother went on; "that room is where every one can see it who comes to call on me, and I should be ashamed if it were not in order. I wish that bed to look always just so! I wish everything to be in its place in that bedroom, and there must not be anything left on the floor in that room!"

"I shall keep it in order if you will let me sleep in there!" promised Jimmy.

"Very well," agreed his mother; "you shall sleep in the big brass bed, Jimmy, after you have learned to keep your room looking as mother wished it to look, and to keep your hair combed and your face and hands clean." But Jimmy was in the second grade in school before ever he slept in the big brass bed, and then it was a surprise.

He had gone to bed one night and was asleep, when his mother went in to be sure that he was covered and to kiss him good-night. Then she saw that his train of cars had been put where it belonged and nothing was out of order in his little room; it looked like the room of a dainty girl that night, and Jimmy's mother was glad.

She straightway went in the blue room and turned down the covers of the big brass bed; then she said to Jimmy's father, "You may carry him in, if you please, and he shall wake up in the brass bed, and he shall sleep there now as long as he is willing to keep the room clean."

And next morning, to Jimmy's great delight, he opened his eyes in the big brass bed. The dear little fellow sleeps there to this day, except when there is company.—Exchange.

Grace.

When thou dost eat from off thy plate,
I pray thee be thou temperate;
Unto thine elders at the board
Do thou sweet reverence accord;
And, though to dignity inclined,
Unto the serving folk be kind;
Be ever mindful of the poor,
Nor turn them hungry from the door;
And unto God, for health and food
And all that in thy life is good,
Give thou thy heart in gratitude.

The Story of the Teeny Weeny Pig.

Once upon a time there was a teeny weeny pig that lived on a farm. One day he was in a hurry for his dinner, and he got caught under a gate. And he squealed and he squealed, and he wouldn't stop crying.

Along came Mr. Rabbit, and he said, "Oh, dear, this is terrible!" So he went and got from my garden a nice cabbage, and he brought it to the little pig. But he squealed and he squealed, and he wouldn't stop crying.

Just then Mrs. Hen came to see what was the matter. "Oh dear, this is awful!" she said. So she went into my barn and found a nice bag of corn, which she brought to the little pig. But he squealed and he squealed, and wouldn't stop crying.

Old Mrs. Cow heard the noise and came to find out all about it. She said, "Oh dear, this is dreadful!" So she went into my field and found some nice clover, which she brought to the little pig. But he squealed and he squealed, and he wouldn't stop crying.

Mrs. Duck waddled up to see what she could do. She quacked, "Oh dear, this is horrible!" She hurried to my duck-pond, where she found some nice juicy water-lily roots, which she brought for the little pig. But he squealed and he squealed, and wouldn't stop crying.

Hearing the noise, Mr. Robin Redbreast came flying up to see if he could help. "Oh dear, this is unbearable!" he said. So he flew away to my cherry tree and found some nice cherries, which he brought for the little pig. But he squealed and he squealed, and he wouldn't stop crying.

About this time along came Little Boy. He said, "Oh dear, this is frightful! What is the matter?"

Mr. Rabbit said, "I brought him a cabbage, but he won't stop!"

Mrs. Hen said, "I brought him a bag of corn, but he won't stop!"

Mrs. Cow said, "I brought him some nice clover, but he won't stop!"

Mrs. Duck said, "I brought him some nice water-lily roots, but he won't stop!"

Mr. Robin Redbreast said, "I brought him some nice cherries, but he won't stop!"

Then Little Boy reached up and unfastened the latch of the gate, so that the gate opened. And out came the little pig.

And then he ate the cherries and said, "Thank you!" to Mr. Robin Redbreast.

And next the pig ate the nice juicy water-lily roots and said, "Thank you!" to Mrs. Duck.

Next the pig ate the clover and said, "Thank you!" to Mrs. Cow.

After finishing these, the pig ate the corn and said, "Thank you!" to Mrs. Hen.

And last, the pig ate the nice big cabbage and said, "Thank you!" to Mr. Rabbit.

Then he made a nice bow to Little Boy and all the others, and said, "I thank you one and all for your kindness!"

So saying, he jumped through a hole in the hedge and he never came back any more.—Selected.

How We Came to Have Pink Roses.

Once upon a time all the Roses in the world were white. There were no Yellow Roses, no Pink Roses, no Red Roses; all the Roses in all the world were solid white.

One morning, down by the garden fence, a little Rosebud peeped out and saw the big, round sun looking down at her. He stared and stared at her so hard that she became frightened; but after awhile she took courage and looked up at him and said bravely, "Mr. Sun, why do you look at me so hard?"

Then the old Sun laughed. He laughed and laughed. Then he said, teasingly, "Because you are so pretty."

Now, then, what do you suppose the little Pink Rosebud did? She blushed! She blushed pink!

And ever since then we have had Pink Roses.—Exchange.

Housekeeping.

Patty stood by the kitchen window, cuddling Daffodil, a soft, yellow kitten, and dreaming about the story that she had been reading.

"Patty! Patty!" called mother from the pantry; "come, child, why don't you get to work? It's almost school time."

Patty jumped and looked up at the clock. "Yes, mother," she replied as she dropped Daffodil and hastily tied on her blue checked gingham apron. Armed with dust cloth and mop, she made a dash for the living room, where in a desperate hurry to make up for lost time she began flourishing the mop over the hardwood floor.

But everything went wrong. Daffodil, who had followed her, persisted in chasing the mop till Patty was forced to take her to the kitchen; there, Daffodil begged for a drink; after that the postman rang, and Patty had to see if there was anything for her.

"I shan't be able to clean under the couch today either," she said with a frown. "It would make me late. But it'll never show, and one day more won't make any difference. I will surely do it tomorrow, though," she promised herself.

Patty shoved the dust still farther under the couch and pulled the front edge of the cover down a little nearer the floor; then she turned her attention to the polished furniture, where you could write your name on even one day's dust. "I must be sure to do the things that count," she said. For five whole days now she hadn't found time to clean the places where the dust didn't show. She had begun too late. There were so many pleasanter things to take up the minutes before school.

Yet Patty was ambitious to become a good housekeeper while she was still a little girl. Sometimes it was fun; it was fun, for example, baking frosted cup cakes, which she had done yesterday for supper. But she didn't like dusting, though mother said that it was quite as important as cooking and had given over the living room to her charge for one whole week.

That afternoon when Patty came in from school she heard some one talking in the next room. "It's Cousin Matilda Morehouse," she whispered to Daffodil, who came scampering to meet her. "She'll be sure to stay to tea, and we'll have the rest of the frosted cup cakes. Then mother will tell how I made them 'most all myself, and Cousin Matilda will believe I'm getting to be as fine a housekeeper as she was when she was my age—as she's always saying."

"Well, how that child does grow!" exclaimed the visitor as Patty slipped shyly into the living room with Daffodil in her arms. "I do hope, Sally," she remarked crisply, turning to Patty's mother, "that you are training her up to work. Why, when I was her age, my mother called me her right hand maid."

"Patty is going to be my little right-hand maid too," said mother as she sent a proud smile in Patty's direction.

Cousin Matilda nodded her head rather doubtfully as much as to say, "I haven't seen any particular signs of it yet." But Patty's cheeks grew rosy with pleasure at mother's praise, and it seemed to her that she couldn't wait till tea time when Cousin Matilda could sample the cup cakes and find out for herself.

"Clickity-click, clickity-click," went Cousin Matilda's bright knitting needles. Patty dropped Daffodil and sidled up close to watch the soft, sky-blue worsted growing into a beautiful carriage robe for Cousin Matilda's brand-new baby nephew. Cousin Matilda had on a spick-and-span white apron so that not a bit of dust came off her dress on the dainty robe. Patty longed to feel the lovely, fluffy, baby thing, but she didn't dare, for she was not sure that her hands were as clean as that snowy white apron. And, standing there with her fingers clasped behind her, she tried to picture the prim, spotless Cousin Matilda as once a real, live little girl who sometimes rumbled or soiled her clothes; but she couldn't imagine it.

"Please, daughter, will you go to my room and get my embroidery bag?" asked mother presently.

Patty hastened to obey; she had, however, barely crossed the hall when she heard a sudden exclamation from Cousin Matilda. She turned back to see what was the matter.

"Ugh!" grunted that dignified lady again, with a wry face. "A horrid cramp in my foot!" She gave a vigorous jerk of her knee, and off from her spick-and-span white apron tumbled the sky-blue worsted ball, down to the rug and the hard-wood floor and sped gayly on—straight for the couch!

Cousin Matilda and mother were so occupied with the cramp that they did not notice. But Patty, helpless and miserable, stood watching from the hall door. Before she could possibly reach it the ball would be far under the couch, deep in all that five days' dust; its lovely sky-blue all smudged over with the tell tale, ugly brown fuzz! A hundred cup cakes could not save her now from disgrace in Cousin Matilda's eyes, for of course Patty must confess the truth!

Then, like a streak of yellow lightning, from behind the morris chair darted Daffodil in hot pursuit of the pretty plaything! And just as it was about to disappear beneath the couch while Patty held her breath Daffodil pawed it back instead of under and saved the day for her wretched little mistress.

"Oh, you naughty, naughty kitten!" scolded Cousin Matilda in a shocked voice while mother went chasing after Daffodil and the ball.

"Oh, you darling, precious kitten!" murmured grateful Patty as she caught up Daffodil, now robbed of her plaything, and fled up stairs on the interrupted errand.

There, seated on the edge of mother's bed, for a moment she hid her face in Daffodil's soft fur and did a little thinking.

"But just watch tomorrow, Daffy, early,"—Patty rose with a resolute air,—"and you'll see the dust fly until there isn't a speck to be found in that whole living room, not even on top of the bookcase! Because under places and high-up places, you know, are exactly as important as places you can see, when you're learning to be a housekeeper."—Edna Brett, in Youth's Companion.

"Without Wax."

Do you ever use the word sincere? You know what it means, but do you know the origin of the word?

Long ago it was the custom to fill up flaws or cracks in marble, and sometimes in furniture, with wax. Of course this was a kind of deceit. The wax didn't show, but because it was soft it wouldn't wear well. Soon it would get scratched or come out and leave the crack.

So when marble, or anything of the sort, was guaranteed to be flawless, or perfect, it was marked "sine cera," which are the Latin words for "without wax."

So the words sine cera came to be "sincere." It still means pure or without deceit. When you say "a sincere promise," or "a sincere friend," you mean that your promise, or your friend, is real, and not just pretending.

The next time you make a promise, stop and ask yourself if you really mean it as a sincere promise, or whether there is wax in it. Do you really mean to keep the promise, or is there some little crack in it?—H. A.

"Asleep in Jesus."

PERSONAL NOTES.

Rev. Mr. Phares had been unofficially connected during the last two years.

The Rev. Richard Rathborne Graham, rector of Christ Church, Norwich, Conn., died suddenly at Sanford, Me., Saturday, August 16.

The Rev. Mr. Graham was born in the city of Dublin, Ireland, in 1860. On coming to the United States Mr. Graham became assistant at St. George's Church, New York City, and was successively priest in charge of St. Paul's Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Columbus, O., Director of the Associate Mission of Cincinnati, O., and rector of St. Paul's Church, Wickford, R. I. In 1912 he became rector of Christ Church, Norwich, Conn.

On Before.

It was Simon Peter who opened the conversation with Jesus that followed the Last Supper. Simon was a man who never repressed his impulses. Modesty and delicacy were factors which did not enter into his makeup. What he thought he spoke out. Such people are honest and sincere, but they are not always easy to live with.

The disciples all knew that night that Jesus was soon to leave them. They could almost see upon the threshold the shadow of the messenger who had come to call Him hence. It is not difficult to imagine what their first question would be in such an hour. You maybe have known what it was to sit beside some one who was soon to leave you to return no more. There were questions you long to ask: Where are you going? What lies beyond the shadow into which you are passing? Into what new realms of life does death conduct the departing soul?

This was Simon's meaning when he turned to Jesus, and said, "Master, whither goest Thou"? It is not to be supposed that Simon did not believe in the future life. God has put immortality in the instincts of men just as He put love there and fear and hope. Every man, no matter how primitive his origin and outlook, knows that there is a difference between the man and the beast in the future, just as there is a difference in the now.

As he grows older he feels his physical powers falling lower and lower, while all the time his spiritual strength is rising higher and higher. As Victor Hugo expressed in his last days, "I can see the eternal winter on my head, but I can feel the eternal spring-time in my heart."

Outside my window in a tree a few weeks ago a cocoon was hanging as dead and dry at last year's leaf flapping in the breeze. The outer part was dead. But there was an inner part that was not dead. And some warm morning, in response to the call of the heat and light, that outer shell will burst asunder and fall to mingle with the dust, but out of it there will come a new being, radiant and lovely.

This nature teaches. It tells us that the frail tenement which for a little while is our dwelling will break and decay, but that out of it will come another life, as much more beautiful and perfect as the butterfly that flies aloft is better than the worm that crawls in the dust.

From the very earliest times men have been listening to these voices of nature and there they have learned of immortality. The American Indian buried his dead in a sitting posture. Beside him were his bow and arrows, his spear and his drinking cup. He was ready when the morning came to spring up and renew the chase on the Happy Hunting Grounds. Socrates, the brightest light of paganism, before he drank the hemlock, spoke of the immortal hope that filled his thoughts.

It was their study of nature that has led scientists almost universally to a trust in the future life. They tell us we are going somewhere. The forms of life may change, but the life itself persists.

It remained for Jesus to tell us where we are going. We knew before that we were going on a journey. But our destination was a mystery till He came and showed us the way. "I go," He said, "to prepare a place for you; and if I go I will come again and receive you unto Myself, that where I am there ye may be also."

Crossing the mountains from Virginia into Kentucky some time ago, we thought of those hardy pioneers with Boone over a hundred years ago who went over those very hills with rifle and axe to open up that new land to the west. They cut paths through the forests and cleared away the jungle and built their cabins and planted their fields and then went back to bring their wives and children to the place they had prepared.

This is what Jesus did. He went on before. He climbed the slope of Calvary and opened a path through the Valley of the Shadow, and slew the giant that troubled those who passed that way. He made a way for those who follow Him.—Stuart Nye Hutchison in Presbyterian Banner.

"Comparisons Are Odious."

By Edith Lochridge Reid.

Clifford dislikes his Cousin Frank—in fact, the dislike almost amounts to hate—and the only reason is that ever since the two boys were old enough to distinguish right from wrong Frank has been held up as a "shining example" of behavior.

"Frank wouldn't sit down in the dirt with his best clothes on," is the way Clifford is reprimanded for his carelessness. "Frank doesn't take such big bites of food" is offered as an incentive toward good table manners.

The truth is that Frank is naturally disposed to be neat. His temperament is entirely unlike Clifford's and it isn't an effort for him to be clean and polite. Clifford has many good wholesome qualities, but he is husky and decidedly boylike, an altogether different make-up. But these things are not taken into consideration by his mother.

There is just one reason why a child should be asked or expected to act in a certain way or follow a given line of conduct, and that is because such a course of action is right and proper, not because some other child does thus and so. If you are going to set up an ideal for a child to attain, be sure the ideal is infallible. He will not reach this perfection of course, as no human being ever does, but it will be worth striving for. He should be inspired from an inward consciousness of right and not directed to act like some other child.

Julia's mother was very much crushed one day to find that her small daughter had stolen a bag of popcorn from the peddler's wagon.

"How could you do such a thing and make mother feel so bad?" was the first reprimand Julia received for this misdeed—a remark which in itself was very bad psychology. A child should be taught to be honest because stealing is wrong and not because it makes mother feel bad.

"Betty took a bag first," said Julia, defending herself.

"That's no excuse for you, my dear; you can't take things that belong to some one else, even if your friend does."

"But, mother, you always tell me Betty is so nice and quiet and good to her baby sister, so now why don't you put the blame on Betty?"

Can you wonder that Julia showed this resentment?

This case illustrates the fallacy of holding another child up as an ideal of behavior. Perhaps Jack does keep his hands clean, but he may be deplorably deceitful. Suppose Mildred does go to bed without pouting and picks up her playthings without being told, she may be a very disagreeable, selfish little girl when she plays with other children. So beware of holding Mildred up to your little Mary as an ideal, for Mary knows all about Mildred's faults. It all comes back to what Julia insinuated to her mother about Betty, that if an ideal is set up it should be followed in all points—and yet there never was a child so perfect that you could say you wanted your child to be like him in every respect.

The only safe way, then, is to comment favorably on the good traits your own child possesses, and by thus stressing his best natural characteristics, inspire him to develop other good ones, not because some playmate has these qualities, but because they appeal to him as desirable. And, whenever you are tempted to set up "shining examples" before your children, remember the old saying, "Comparisons are odious."

New Archeological Discoveries.

The foundation of all destructive modernism criticism is found in the bitter attacks made on the authenticity and historicity of the Holy Scriptures. Explode that foundation and all is chaos. But God is not asleep and He watches over His Church. One of the most remarkable things of late developments is the fact that today, as never before, one archeological discovery after another substantiates the accuracy of the Biblical record. These discoveries come so fast that it is almost impossible to keep up with them.

Some time ago an old Christian Church was excavated in Northern Egypt. It was found to be built on the relics of an older Egyptian temple in which records were found substantiating the fact that the Hebrews had been used in building the stronghold of Rameses. As we all know, one of the Old Testament books, Esther, was impugned as to its right to a place in the Canon of Scripture, notwithstanding the fact that the Jews of all subsequent ages celebrated the festival of Purim, in commemoration of the history therein recorded. And now some months ago diggings at Susa (Susan) brought a mass of tablets to light, which give us the Persian version of the old Biblical story.

A little later archeologists digging in the Jordan Valley stumbled on a mass of vitrified ruins which seem to indicate the exact location where the doomed cities of Genesis, Sodom and Gomorrah once stood. That whole story was laughed at by some critics as a myth. They said that such a name as Chedorlaomer was not found in any of the Chaldean records. Yet a tablet is found today in the Museum at Constantinople which not only substantiated the record of the Asiatic invasion of Palestine, which is mentioned in Genesis, but mentions Chedorlaomer and Tidal by name.

And now come two extraordinary discoveries. Professor R. A. S. MacAlister, with his exploring expedition of the city or fortress of Millo which until now baffled students of the historical reconstruction of Jerusalem, has settled the obscure references in II Samuel, Kings and Chronicles. Says the professor: "We claim to have settled finally two questions of topography—the minor question of the position and nature of Millo, and the major, all important question of the site of the City of David. The very ancient pottery that has been discovered shows that we have broken into the Jebusite city. Once for all it was on the Eastern hill, and the claim of the Western hill to be Mount Zion disappears forever."

And now comes the last but not the least. The late J. P. Morgan, of New York, financed some years ago an exploratory expedition to Babylon, which brought back some 5,000 cuneiform clay tablets. Of these four hundred have been deciphered up to this time. The work was done by Dr. A. F. Clay, professor of Babylonian and Assyrian literature at Yale—a reliable and wholly unbiased witness. The tablets range from 2,500 to 300 years before Christ. Their authenticity is unquestioned. The tablets under special consideration are proved to date about 2,000 years before Christ, and they tell the early story of the Flood. Moses lived about 1,300 years before Christ. The tablets go, therefore, seven centuries further back and what do they prove? (1) That Hebrew writing existed long before Moses, and that Moses has therefore unquestionably availed himself of older records referring to primitive times. (2) That the theory of Professor Delitsch in his "Babel and Bible" is evidently wrong, for the Hebrews did not borrow the story from the Babylonians, but the latter from the former. (3) Proof of which is found in the discovery of Dr. Clay that the Babylonians having no words to express the ideas "actually quoted the Hebrew words" to tell the story.

And thus, as the need arises, God opens the little windows of the distant past to validate His Word and to rescue it from the hands of His enemies. All the bitter attacks on the Bible have only served to substantiate its authority as Revelation. The Pilot is aboard and the ships is in safe hands. It will weather all storms and make a safe harbor at last.—Christian Observer.

The Laughing Prayer.

The sorry prayers go up to God
Day after weary day,
They whimper through the eternal blue
And down the Milky Way.

Deaf to the music of the stars,
The children of desire,
Beggars before the throne of God,
They wait for God to tire.

The proletariat of heaven
Swarmed in the golden street
One day when Michael's host came by Up to the Judgment Seat.

Above the heavenly mansions
Bright, streaming banners flowed,
While cherubim and seraphim
Were crowding in the road.

And then a little, laughing prayer
Came running from the sky,
Along the golden gutters where
The sorry prayers went by.

It had no fear of anything,
But in that holy place
It found the very throne of God
And smiled up in His face.

Then Michael waited in the road,
For Michael understood,
While God looked on the laughing prayer
And found it sweet and good.

So God was comforted. He said:
"There still is hope for men
One man prays happily!" And so
He turned to care again.

—Louise Driscoll.

Bishop Tuttle and Kingsley.

Lovers of Westword Ho and Water Babies may like to know that, fifty years ago, Charles Kingsley was visiting in this country and arrived in Salt Lake City a day too late for the consecration of St. Mark's Cathedral on Ascension Day, May 14, 1874. He preached the following Sunday night to a congregation that crowded the church and the steps and pavement outside. Bishop Tuttle, writing to the Board of Missions, mentions the preaching of "Canon Kingsley, of Westminster Abbey," and describes the consecration of the church, adding, "And so, on Thursday night, I, for one, went to bed all tired out, but as happy as a boy who has been on the winning side in a match at baseball."—Press Clipping.

A Chapel by the Sea.

The tides come in, the tides go out,
Ofttimes they shake the shore,
But never yet their storm-splashed spray
Has reached the chapel's door.

It stands alone beside the sea,
Where sleeps a village nigh;
Above its walls, so staunchly built,
A cross gleams bright and high.

In summertime the worshippers
Its pews devoutly fill,
Whom, consecrated eloquence
And sacred music thrill.

And when chill winter comes again
Upon the sheltered lee,
A faithful few still worship in
That chapel by the sea.

Servants in pleasure, singers of delight,
Suggesters to his soul of higher things
Than any of your highest! So at last
He shall look around on you with lids too straight
To hold the grateful tears, and thank you well,
And bless you when he prays his secret prayers,
And praise you when he sings his open songs
For the clear song-note he has learned in you
Of purifying sweetness, and extend

Education and Religion

"Education and religion are absolutely essential to true democracy," states a Bishop of the Church; and he adds: "It has been the province of Hobart College to blend the two to a remarkable degree."

That fact is the basis of Hobart's strong appeal to students who come from homes in which a definite religious atmosphere has been maintained. Hobart, ever since its founding, has recognized the value of religion to its students and has always given them ample facilities for the exercise of their religious instincts.

It is not surprising that many students, after entering Hobart, seek affiliation with the Church; nor is it surprising that nearly four hundred Hobart graduates have been ordained to the Protestant Episcopal Ministry.

Applications for admission to the 103rd class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.

When the difference in the lengths of the four periods of Daniel 12 is regarded as occurring at their beginnings instead of at their endings, and when they are seen thereby to have a common end and to culminate in a single year (the present one), is not this the opening of God's long closed timelock, the unsealing promised to "the wise" in "the time of the end?" Thoughts For the Thoughtful

A sad saint is a poor saint.—H. D. Ranns.

Our duty is to be useful—not according to our desires, but according to our powers.

One thing we can always give to God in all conditions and discouragements, and that is our own heart's consent to going on.

No man can do service for the Master that will really amount to anything while he is pitying himself for the hardness he must endure.—I. D. Lytle.

His great love hath compassed
Our nature and our need,
We know not; but He knoweth,
And He will bless indeed.

All my theology is reduced to this narrow compass—Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.—Archibald Alexander.

I warn you that sufferers may go one of two ways. You may rise into a royal life. You may bless by what you are, by the spirit in which you bear, and which always mystifies the world, the heroism of patience. Or you may sink into bitterness and helplessness and despair.—R. G. Campbell.

CHURCH AND STATE

The Eighteenth Century culminating in the French Revolution gave to the world the individual, naked and unashamed. To this individual it offered liberty, equality and fraternity, every one of which was interpreted wholly in the terms of individualism. Every one of which was material in the sense that it stood for the interests of the individual. The Revolution being a successful protest, it simply took over the assets of the ancient regime and under a contract attempted to secure for every victor a proportionate share of the spoils. Liberty, equality and fraternity are, however, all of them spiritual, not material terms; and the failure to recognize this fact destroyed in large part the social value of the victory over the selfish autocracy of the monarchy.

The democratization of selfishness increases the number of shareholders, but leaves government still a thing whose basis is the conscienceless power of the possessive class. Revolt against the inevitable tyranny of self-interest is met by increasing the capital stock in shares of small denomination, and bankruptcy postponed by making a limited number of the aggrieved, the possessors of these shares. That government exists for the people and not the people for the government is a truism, but one that is extremely difficult to translate into a maxim of conduct for the governing class.

The age old curse of rights of possession which found their perfect expression in the Roman Law, lays its blighting hand on government as well as individual. The sanctity of possession per se is the ancient creed of man, the true paganism, whose hymn is: "They should take who have the power, and they should keep who can." This world-wide empire maintains its ascendancy by the old practice of adoption into citizenship. All who by skill or cunning acquire, are initiated into the cult of interests; and all who come, bring the zeal of converts. The regicide if he can keep his feet is given an honored place, and soon learns to talk of lese majeste with the unction of a high priest of autocracy.

All the values of life are invisible and spiritual. Material things are only the channels of their energy. The worship of possession without responsibility is not only immoral, but folly unspeakable. The official creed of mankind is little removed in the scale of values from that of the African savage who counts his fetish the one thing worth dying for. Religion is the science of values—values that reach beyond the present, and await the enlarged experience of the race to furnish to them a language for their expression.

The government that does not trust the people is of necessity a tyranny. Belief in Humanity is the final creed of government. Its basis of ethic must be the worth of man. To those of us who have studied the Christ and tested the principle of His teaching, this worth of man is based upon man's kinship to God. This truth has been received by the Church and corrupted by failure to use it, but it is a truth nevertheless, and it offers the one way of life to the nations.

The long centuries which we call the dark ages taught man that he must seek a sanction for life outside of the present. He interpreted it to mean that heaven was the real explanation of his unrest. In seeking an other-world explanation of his existence, he lost his hold on the present and counted the hermit the truly wise man, the renaissance was the rediscovery of man and the visible earth. It mocked at monk and hermit and bade man awake and take possession of the earth. It sung again the joy of living. It set all the world talking; and let the mockers deride. It still remains true that given a large theme, talk is the most potent influence in history. An idea planted in the minds of men works with the resistless power of the forces of nature, and forces its way to light and air in most unlikely soils and places. Out of the gossip of good things that marked the beginning of the renaissance emerged at last the unfettered child of the present; the peasant of France, a very different being from the alert and thrifty bourgeois who spoke the same language but interpreted life in terms of proprietary rights and legal enactments.

It must not be forgotten that neither the Reformation nor the French Revolution produced, nor tended to produce, the social regeneration of even a part of the world. They developed the individual. The principles of each once accepted as the faith of a people worked out their inevitable results. Those results are apparent. The consequences of those principles are exhausted in these results. The social regeneration which is now the goal of the race can never be worked out from these old premises. New principles working in the lives and consciences of the children of emancipated individuals and in the hearts of those born free, must manifest themselves. Social regeneration has for its instruments and material the free and equal individual, but for the consummation of its task must have a new ethic which can come only as consequence of a new faith. It is not necessary to say faith in God, as this in a sense begs the question; for every tribe and people still has its own God. For governments, the one faith is faith in Humanity. It is the function of Religion to furnish to peoples the ground of that faith by proclaiming man's kinship to God, the infinitely Holy One.

THOSE RITUALISTS!

One of the most interesting of the criticisms of the Southern Churchman that has come to us was the statement that it had too much religion in its editorial columns. For our part, save as students of psychology, religion is a word that carries with it only secondary notions of value. Christ and the Apostles seem to have avoided the use of the term. St. Paul and St. James use it once or twice. As Kingsley was fond of saying: "Religion is only mentioned three times in the New Testament, and twice it is used in scorn." The New Testament word for the expression of the Christian life is godliness, or god-likeness.

The habit of a life of devotion forms for itself a mould of actions and words. It is this mould that is known as religion. Part of the Jewish ritual of worship was an imprecation upon the Samaritans. The echo of this habit is found in the damnatory clauses that form the ancient preface to the Athanasian Creed. The rigid ritualist, whether in our own Church or out of it, who is scrupulous in the exactness of a fixed ceremonial, belongs to the same temperamental group (and here we are classifying, not condemning) as those members of the old Etruscan hierarchy who explained the Barbarian conquest of Rome by a failure in the exact performance of a ritual, meant to win the favor of a protecting deity.

The Protestant of every degree has each his ritual of protest which is frequently as sacro-sanct as that of priest of any name.

Being a Protestant temperamentally and by tradition and training we are here speaking from experience: These moulds of the devotional life are strangely enough held to be the vital matters of the faith. Whereas they have only judgment values as indicating in some measure the conception of God and man on the part of those whose habit of worship move through the several channels. They are only imperfect indices of value and nothing more.

They used to tell a story in Cambridge of a Mohammedan student at Harvard who was shown around the grounds and the uses of the different buildings explained to him. One was pointed out to him as the old Chapel. His guide failed to tell him that this chapel was no longer used for worship, but had been turned over to the instructor in calisthenics. Some days later the young Mohammedan entered the old chapel while a class in calisthenics was being put through its exercises. He watched it all with great interest and later told his former guide: "I went yesterday to the chapel and watched the men at worship. It was not so very different from our worship." We confess to an utter inability to get excited over ritualistic controversies, for we have never met a man who was not a ritualist of some sort.

We are intensely interested in what the Prayer Book calls godly union and concord. To that end we must grant that people differ widely in temperament, training and taste. If any one doubt that this is a prerequisite let him read the One hundred and thirty-third Psalm; where spirit of unity is compared first to the ointment that ran down upon Aaron's beard and went down to the skirts of his garment, and is then compared to the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion. We belong definitely to those who prefer the second simile, but there are those who like the first.

There seems to be a constant temptation to the mind to make ritual which is the habit of worship the essential element in worship, and as a corollary of this, difference in ritual creates barriers that are insuperable. The taunt flung at the early disciples was that they were godless because their so-called worship was a mockery in that there was a fixed ritual. To this taunt St. James replies, "We have the only pure and undefiled ritual. It is the ritual of service to the poor and to the sorrowing ones and the ritual of a struggle to keep the life unstained by sin." So far as we know, this is the only authoritative statement in the New Testament in regard to ritual. By common consent of all controversialists this statement is left out of all ritualist discussions. The content of Christianity is godliness. Its one ritual is service and cleanliness. It flourishes best in the open and in homes. It becomes a pale and anaemic thing if it be shut up too much in church-buildings. We have got to learn that the church is not a building nor any fixed ritual nor any particular form of organization. The Church is a living thing, because it is the company of all faithful people. To belong to the Church means, if it means anything at all, to belong to Jim and Tom and Henry and Mary and Jane and Louise, and all the other men and women of goodwill who claim Christ as Lord and Master. So far from being a defender of any fixed ritual, our own or anybody else's; we know that we are becoming spiritually muscle-bound when any habit of worship other than our own provokes us to cruel and biting criticism.

THE CHURCH-BELL.

Church-bell, lost in great and noisy city
Thou wert cast for towns where far and nigh
All can hear where'er a babe is weeping
Or a mother sings her lullaby.

When, a child, I lived near field and forest.
Like a Heaven to me was Christmas morn;
Like an angel's voice glad tidings bringing,
Told thy chimes of joy to mankind born.

Higher still thy notes my soul uplifted,
When they rang with Easter-sun's first ray;
Chimed: "Rejoice, thy Saviour has arisen!"
Thou too rise in dawn of Easter Day."

Lovely, too, in harvest time to hear thee,
In the evening hours with quiet blest;
Listening while thy heavenly voice comes floating,
Over earth to call all souls to rest.

Yes, whenever now thy curfew tells me
That the sun is down, the birds asleep;
With the flowers I bow my head and softly
In between thy strokes this prayer will creep.

Church-bell! tho' my dust shall never hear thee
Tolling over it, Oh, tell them all;
Cheer my dear ones, tell them thither went he,
Leaving as the sun sets in the fall.

—(From the Danish, by John Volk.)

THE WINGS OF FAITH.

Give me the wings of faith to rise
Within the veil, and see
The saints above, how great their joys,
How bright their glories be.

I ask them whence their victory came;
They, with united breath,
Ascribe their conquest to the Lamb,
Their triumph to His death.

They marked the footsteps that He trod;
His zeal inspired their breast;
And, following their incarnate God,
Possess the promised rest.

—Isaac Watts.

NEW FRENCH PRESIDENT.

The newly elected President of France, Gaston Doumergue, is a member of the Huguenot Church, and he is a Protestant. The statement that he is the first Protestant to occupy that office is an error, as Clemenceau and other Presidents have been Protestants. Four Catholic priests were among the deputies who voted for him. It is also a matter of interest that the present Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Edouard Herriot, is also a Protestant.

JACOB AND THE ANGEL

By the Reverend Elwood Worcester, D. D.

And Jacob was left alone and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day.
Genesis 32:24.

THESE words recall one of the most mysterious stories of the olden time. Jacob, after his long absence, was on his way home. Forced to fly from Esau's anger, he had betaken himself to Laban in Haran, where he had turned his keen wits to such good account that he had acquired Laban's two daughters and most of his sheep. He had crossed Jordan with his staff in his hand, and he returned with two bands. But persons with such a highly developed faculty of acquisitiveness seldom find it desirable to remain in one place, and Jacob, having got all he could out of Laban, began to think of his old home and to turn his steps thither. But now the day of reckoning is at hand. There are no persons whom we ought to choose with greater care than our enemies, for we never know when we may be in their power. (Oscar Wilde.) As Jacob neared the confines of Canaan, he suddenly remembered his brother and the ancient wrong he had done him. He realized that he had come to a crisis in his life and, like most men under such circumstances, he desired to be alone. He sent his wives, his children and his flocks across the brook Jabbok, and he himself remained behind on the farther side, and darkness fell.

I wonder if any of you have spent a night alone in the wilderness with a heavy, troubled heart? If so, you will understand the horror of thick darkness which fell upon Jacob. The vast solitude of Nature, the silence and the voices of the night, the mysterious, intangible fear of the unknown still cause the human spirit to quail and shudder; and our night thoughts are so different from our day thoughts that it seems as if another spirit wakes within us.

It seemed to Jacob that God was against him, and that a being in the similitude of God wrestled with him, threatening to destroy him. And still he did not flinch, but wrestled with a man's strength. And the being said: "Let me go for the day breaketh." And he said: "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." And he said: "What is thy name?" And he said: "Jacob." And he said: "Thy name shall no more be called Jacob (the supplanter) but Israel (perseverer with God), for as a prince thou hast power with God and man and hast prevailed."

These are two scenes in the life of this man which reveal a nature at variance with his usual cupidity and cunning—his wrestling with God and his dream of the ladder set up between Heaven and earth, which he did not attempt to mount. The whole tenor of his life reveals him as the true father of the Jews, a being of contradictions, a combination of the sordid and the sublime. The Jews produced an incomparable race of prophets who always reproached them for their hardness of heart and incredulity. The Jews converted the world to monogamy without themselves ever condemning polygamy. They gave the world its Messiah and crucified Him. The world has believed in an eternal life for man on the word of the Jews who, themselves, have never half believed it.

But these contradictions are contained in human nature itself, for man is above all things a composite being. Everything connects him closely with the animal world. We see in him not merely the same bodily frame and organs, but the same animal nature and instincts,—the burden of the creature. And yet, at man's first appearance in history, he had already passed beyond the confines of the animal kingdom. He belongs to it, yet does not belong to it. He experiences emotions, thinks thoughts and does deeds which no animal has thought, experienced or attempted. By standing erect on his feet and by turning his face toward Heaven, he has liberated his hands to work for him. By depending on his wits, rather than on his strength, he has begun to develop an intellect to think for him; and who can say to what height it will exalt him? By his capacity for permanent affection, he has founded the family, and has begun to lead a moral life in the sense of accepting responsibility for his acts. While still a member of the animal kingdom, it is evident that he has passed beyond it; for, while other species remain stationary, he progresses. Human society is formed and the laws which govern human society, and at once it begins to make war on his animal nature, to impose many burdensome and severe restraints on his old tendencies. Of the writings of one of the old Greek sophists, but a single line has come down to us: "Law is the tyrant of man for it frequently compels him to forego his natural inclinations."

This second stage of development we may call the age of humanity, for the differences which separate him from the animal kingdom are already greater and more striking than the ties which unite him to it. But is this the end or the way to the end? He has subjected the animal without him. Can he transform the animal within him? Is this all he is capable of becoming, a citizen of this world, an animal which thinks, capable only of extending, solidifying, refining his social relationships? What prevents us from believing this is the rudiment which we already discover of new spiritual faculties, the faint perception of a relationship with an unseen world. He begins to commune with the invisible and to judge his life in the light of an ideal, and when stricken to earth he lifts his eyes to Heaven. Just as his intelligence was grafted onto his animality and began at once to redeem it, so is his spiritual faculty grafted onto both his animality and his intellect, and it begins a new work of redemption.

At first this faculty is very rudimentary, and its creations seem to us so bizarre and irrational that they look like aberrations—an element of insanity and superstition, rather than the revelation of a new world and the winning of a soul. And so they would be if these spiritual faculties remained stationary while the rest of our nature developed. But they do not. They are like the first glimmerings of reason, faint and weak, but of infinite promise for the future. They reveal to man the moral law to which his conscience bows in reverence. They offer him the only thing on earth of value for its own sake—the life of the soul. They open to him the infinite and eternal world of the spirit. They add a new cubit to his stature, a new charm to his intelligence. They set up new ideals of goodness which, without them, he would never attain. They incarnate themselves in the greatest geniuses of our race. From henceforth we may say: "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be."

These, then, are the three elements of human nature—the divine triad repeated in man—animality, humanity, spirituality. Man as an animal, man as a social being, man as a divine being. These, very simply stated, are the components of our human nature, and whatever we are capable of being or becoming results from the interplay of these forces. Because they are different in their nature, their appeal and their effects, there results, from their mingling in one being, all the strangeness of human life, its lack of harmony and its possibility of progress, the inconsistency of our conduct, the swift fluctuations of our feelings, as we yield to one or another of our instincts, the pain of struggle and of self-reproach, the sense of being drawn in opposite directions, the longing for peace, the amazing differences which exist between men, in short, the whole tragedy and the comedy of human life. People speak confidently of hypocrisy. In my experience I have rarely, if ever, encountered a conscious hypocrite. What we do constantly meet with is men and women whose conduct is inconsistent with itself, as now one and now another antagonistic element of their natures expresses itself, without reference to a higher controlling thought or purpose. This is what Plato referred to in his admirable parable of the charioteer. What makes man the most suffering of all creatures is that he has one foot on the finite and the other on the infinite, and is torn asunder, not between two wild horses, but between two worlds.

The task to be performed is the harmonizing of these three elements. That is the solution of the problem of human life and there is no other solution. Many persons have judged otherwise. They have sought not to develop and to harmonize but to crush and to kill. Some have aimed at the annihilation of the body, which they have represented as the source of all evil, and have overwhelmed with infamy. Others have sought to humiliate and trammel the intellect. Others have tried to extirpate the spiritual. But these attempts have never succeeded, and if they should succeed they would only dwarf and mutilate human nature. The law of life and peace and harmony and progress is that the lower should serve the higher. Animality must be subject to reason. Animality and reason must be directed by goodness. As the intellect, which belongs to earth and is concerned only with finite things, was given to transform our earthly condition and to make us rational beings, so spirituality was given to transform us more profoundly, to lift us above the things

THE MIRACLE MAN OF NEW ZEALAND

By Clair Price

In New York Times Magazine, August 3, 1924

IN the somewhat shoddy Walthamstow suburb of London and behind a shabby Y. M. C. A. building is a long tin hut which houses forty Maoris of the Ratana concert party and divine healing mission of New Zealand now on a world tour that may eventually reach the United States. Within that hut was an alluring mystery, for it sheltered Tahu Wiremu Ratana, the leader of the mission, who remained unknown to the sight of Europeans, just as he had kept aloof from the white men of far-off New Zealand.

His story is a curious one. Europeans in New Zealand—the word “European” in that land applies to all of us who are not Maoris—first heard of him in 1920 as a “miracle man” who had risen among the natives. Such stories were told of the “cures” he worked among his own people that Europeans began applying to him for treatment. Replies to their letters told them to pray for healing, promising that Ratana would also pray for them. Some of them who are said to have been “cured” sent him money, only to find it returned a few days later. Others went to his village to thank him, only to find a sign on the gateway announcing that no European except newspaper men equipped with proper credentials were permitted to enter. Uniformed Maori policemen were at the gate to enforce the rule. As for the New Zealand newspaper men, they were permitted to wander at will through the village, except into Ratana’s own bungalow. They have talked with everybody about the place except with Ratana himself.

The “miracle man’s” fame spread from New Zealand to Australia, and soon letters poured into his village from all over the world. P. T. Moko, his secretary, who handles all his correspondence, said that he has had 160,000 applications for “treatment” in the last three years and has returned a total of £100,000 voluntarily sent him by applicants whom he has “cured.”

“Ratana accepts no fees,” Moko said. “Excepting small amounts sent to prepay postage on replies to letters, we have returned every penny sent to us. We ask our correspondents to send only international postage coupons, for if we had to pay postage on replies to the six hundred letters a day which we have been receiving it would cost us heavily.

“Of 160,000 applications which have reached Ratana in the last three years, he has had letters from 110,000 telling him that he has cured them, and people from all over the world have sent us clippings from newspapers telling us of 5,200 other cures. These are in addition to the cures which Ratana has worked among the Maoris.”

Across the table in the lounge of the Y. M. C. A. Moko flung two linen charts on which were pasted rows of envelopes and paper money of all denominations. The letters had been extracted, but the envelopes themselves had been mailed from all over the world—Peru, Sierre Leone, China, the United States, South Africa, India, the British Isles and almost every country in the world.

Ratana appears to be completely indifferent to his world fame. Moko says the party is seeking no introductions in London, that its only business in London is that of a concert party, and that while all of Ratana’s followers are firm believers in his faith healing it plays no more part in the party’s present tour than an item in its program of Maori songs and scenes.

Although Ratana’s fame has been spreading throughout the world during the last three years, it was not until a little over a year ago that his most famous “cure” reattracted New Zealand’s attention to him. A Miss Fannie Lammas of Nelson, N. Z., had been a lifelong invalid. She could not sit up in bed without supporting herself with a frame which bound her from head to foot and she had not walked since childhood. She finally wrote to Ratana asking him how she could be cured (his home address is Whare-Marama Ratana Railway Station, Wanganui, N. Z.). Shortly afterward she received the following letter:

“Base your faith in the Lord your God with a sincere, truthful, reverent and untiring belief that the Lord has power to heal. Pray with an earnest will and repented heart. Appeal to Him to grant what you desire in the name of the Father, Son, the Holy Ghost and the Holy Angels, and to restore your health and strength as I will also pray to Him to grant your request. Sanctify His name and sing His praise forever and ever. Amen. Yours faithfully, T. W. Ratana.”

All Europeans who write to Ratana receive in return letters of this sort written by Moko and possibly signed by Ratana himself. Ratana sees no European, whether the applicant lives a mile from his village or 10,000 miles. In the case of Europeans, there is no “laying on of hands” or any other personal contact. A letter of this sort is written to the applicant, and the rest is up to the applicant himself. In the case of his most famous “cure,” Miss Lammas says that she prayed unceasingly for two days after receiving Ratana’s letter. Then, near midnight, she felt a “wave of strength” enter her body and, getting out of bed for the first time in twelve years, she went to the door of her room and called down the hall, “I’m walking, mother.” A week later she was completely “cured,” and it is said that she has since enjoyed ordinary strength.

Moko was asked whether Ratana requires his patients to leave off medical treatment. “No,” he replied, “Ratana knows nothing about medicine. All he requires from his patients is that they have faith in the One God as he himself has faith. People sometimes believe that there is some supernatural power in Ratana himself. Just before we left New Zealand, a European in Wellington telegraphed to Ratana begging him to come at once to heal his infant son who was dying. He offered Ratana a special train and all the money he could raise if he would only come and lay his hands on the child. Ratana telegraphed back that he could do no good by coming, that he would pray for the child and that the child’s father must also pray in complete faith that God could and would restore the child to health. The next day we had another telegram that the child had already taken a turn for the better.

“What do the doctors in New Zealand think of Ratana?”

“At first none of them believed in him. Whether any of them believe in him now I don’t know, but some of them, when they find a patient is incurable by their methods, refer him to Ratana. We have had quite a number of letters before we left New Zealand from Europeans who said their doctors had given them up and had suggested that as a last resort they try Ratana.”

Thus Ratana as the world sees him from the outside. From the inside his story is a very different one and restricted in its scope to the Maoris themselves. He is a Maori who lives of, by and for the Maoris, and it is hardly possible to understand him without first attempting to understand the Maori setting in which he has so remarkably risen.

The Maoris’ own form of worship was a sort of idolatry for which the Maori word is tohungaism, a worship of countless spirits whose impress is still apparent on the Maori mind.

A century ago the only Europeans who had established contact with the original Maori population of New Zealand were the missionaries. In time they built up a community of some 200,000 Maori Christians, and their influence was a wide and wholesome one. The story of the European traders who followed them is, however, quite another story. The Maori population steadily dwindled until a few years ago there were 1,100,000 Europeans in New Zealand and a remnant of 47,000 Maoris, many of them returned to tohungaism, diseased and soaked with cheap liquor. This, briefly, is Ratana’s background.

In 1918 Ratana was a prosperous Maori homesteader on the North Island. He owned six hundred acres on the downs, about one hundred and twenty-five miles from Wellington. His grandfather was a chief of local distinction, a convert to Anglicanism. Ratana himself married into a Maori Presbyterian Church, and has seven children.

Shortly after the war ended, the Maoris were swept by an influenza epidemic and Ratana was one of its victims. It is said to have left him stone deaf. Deprived of his hearing, he turned to reading, and what happened next may be related in his own words: “I began by reading the New Testament,” he wrote shortly afterward. “I came to the passage where the centurion appealed to Jesus to heal his servant, who was at the point of death. Jesus commended this man’s great faith. He healed the sick servant while He spoke; for when the messengers sent to Jesus by the centurion returned, they found that the servant was healed even at the moment Jesus spoke. So I said to myself, my word, yes; I believe that is quite feasible. So I started out on my work in that assurance. I have carried out the pattern to the fullest extent of my ability.”

He began by fasting and praying for six days and at the end his hearing is said to have returned. Thereafter he began an attempt to heal other Maori victims of the epidemic. There are hundreds of stories about these early “cures” among his own people, and it is impossible (for this writer, at any rate) to make any attempt at a sifting out of the true from the false. Here is a sample of the many stories which are told of this early period: A Maori woman who had been left blind by the epidemic came to him. He told her to have faith "in the one God" and to confess her sins, "not to me but in prayer." Then he passed his hat over her eyes and took it away, "What do you see?" "I see a little light." He passed his hat over her eyes again: "What do you see now?" "A few objects dimly." "Go home now, and tomorrow your sight will come back to you." It is said that it did.

Thus began his work, not so much of healing his people as of startling them out of their relapse into tohungaism and bringing them back to Christianity. As soon as Europeans began applying to him to be "cured," he was faced with a task wholly outside his work. "It is not necessary for Ratana to see Europeans," it was said for him, "for they already believe in the one God, and it is only necessary to remind them by letter that faith in God can cure them and that Ratana also will pray for their cure. But among the Maoris there are many who cling stubbornly to tohungaism, and it is among these that Ratana's work lies." From that day to this he has refused to see any European "patient," but has devoted himself to as intimate and wide a contact with the Maoris as possible. Excepting one or two New Zealand Government officials on official business, no European has caught more than the most fugitive glimpses of him.

European Christian bodies in New Zealand soon investigated his work. Archdeacon Russell, a well-known Churchman in the Dominion who has spent most of his life among the Maoris and speaks their language, published a report in which he said that "if Ratana's work is tohungaism, it is the sort of tohungaism which we want to encourage." The Wellington Diocesan Synod adopted a resolution in which it "sends greetings to Ratana and expresses its thankfulness for the great moral and spiritual revival resulting from his work among the Maoris and prays for God's continued blessings upon his work for the future." The Maori Council has issued an appeal to all the Maoris to follow Ratana away from tohungaism and back to Christianity.

Ratana's homestead today has become a village of some seventy buildings, simple wooden structures which make it look very much like a mining camp. The original bungalow is now occupied by Ratana himself and a considerable staff with an office for Moko. There is a railway station at which Maori sick are deposited on stretchers and carried away to a long gable shed, half hospital and the other half a museum of cast-off European crutches and abandoned Maori charms. The sick are said to spend about a day in the hospital before they rise "cured" of their ailments. There are sleeping and dining quarters for those who have been "cured," in which they spend a few days before returning to their homes, and there are uniformed Maori policemen about to keep Europeans outside.

Ratana himself pays all expenses connected with the village, and these run into considerable sums at Easter and Christmas times. On these occasions, there are festivals which last for a week and which attract thousands of Maoris from throughout the Dominion. Extra tents are then put up to accommodate the overflow and Maoris say that there is no other man left in the race today who can equal the old-fashioned florid Maori oratory which Ratana pours upon his great festival audiences seated on the grass, as he paces back and forth on the veranda of his bungalow.

There is also a flagpole in the village, from which flies a curious flag bearing Bible verses in English and Maori with the Union Jack in a lower corner, typifying "the laws of man," and a crescent and star, typifying "the laws of God," in an upper corner. Herein lies another aspect of Ratana's movement. Since he began his work he has put before his race a "covenant" whose signatories bound themselves to faith in Christianity, to the renunciation of tohungaism, to baptism, to fidelity in marriage, to the better care of children, to prayer for the end of the liquor business, to abstinence from cigarettes on the part of children and women, to the observation of family prayers, to attendance at Christian churches and to the curtailing of tangis (Maori wakes). Before he left New Zealand, Ratana had secured 24,410 Maori signatures to this "covenant." These "covenanters" now call themselves the Union of the Maori Remnant. This "covenant" movement is conducted with Masonic secrecy, and it seems possible that it will eventually take a sharply political turn.

New Zealanders say that, although the future of Ratana's movement is still a riddle, it has been a movement so far for the regeneration of a race by faith and a remarkably successful one. They say that Ratana has driven a number of saloon-keepers out of business, that he has lifted the Maori birthrate by fifty per cent, and that the Maori population of the Dominion has increased from 47,000 to 52,300 in the last six years. Those of them who have caught fugitive glimpses of Ratana himself as he traveled from village to village among his own people, say that his is an athletic rather than an ascetic figure, that his thick black hair is well sprinkled with gray, that he dresses in European clothing of blue serge, that he is invariably seen leading one of his little sons by the hand, that except for his bronzed complexion and his incessant smile he resembles a prosperous English country gentleman, and that he is easily the most important figure in the Dominion today.

THE CHURCH AT WORK SEVEN DAYS IN THE WEEK

By the Reverend Worth M. Tippy

Secretary Federal Council's Commission on the Church and Social Service.

A SILENT revolution is taking place in our thinking about the Church building and its use. In rapidly increasing numbers the church doors are open every day and every evening of the whole year for a continuous and well-founded ministry to the community. And why should not all our Churches be more largely used seven days in the week? There they stand, representing great capital investments from the savings of the congregation and the community. For a Church to stand idle most of the time when it might be used for the good of the community is both a spiritual and an economic waste. It ought to be developed as much as if it were an office building instead of a Church. If anything, ought we not to be more careful of money consecrated to human welfare of that which is applied to economic production?

A pastor and a congregation may well regard the use made of the building as one of the norms by which to judge the completeness of their Church's work. It is not the only standard, nor the highest, but it is a good one and salutary.

To be more concrete and definite: every Church should provide a five-fold program of worship, religious education, organized friendship and social life, opportunities for the service of God and humanity, and recreation. Multiply these five types of service by the natural age and sex groups of a Church, which are not less than seven or eight, and you have a good weekly calendar.

But the calendar will be much more extensive than this bit of multiplication would indicate. Each Sunday-school class, each club will want its own week-day committee meetings, parties, tramps into the country starting from the Church, periods of instruction, and the like. The young men will want basket ball twice a week, and the girls will want the same. The young people's society will have its committee meetings, its parties and its special forms of service. There are likely to be two or three Boy Scout patrols meeting separately as well as in a troop and as many Girl Scouts.

Additional forms of service should grow out of a parish or community survey. I do not mean by this a study going into elaborate detail, which brings together a mass of information that cannot be used before it gets out of date, but rather a project study to discover facts about the parish which the Church should know in order to develop its own work intelligently.

The main facts to be discovered are the following: a house-to-house knowledge of the people of the parish, classified by age, sex, religion, vocation, married or single, in homes, boarding houses, apartments or hotels; community or social agencies such as Churches, schools, clubs, settlements, lodges, hospitals and library; recreational needs and facilities, such as parks, playgrounds or lack of them, commercial forms of recreation and their character; general social conditions such as housing, health, streets, sanitation and safety, especially conditions which endanger the public welfare. Most denominations are prepared to give help to pastors in making surveys. The Federal Council's Commission on the Church and Social Service will send questionnaires and give other assistance on request.

Out of such a parish study is sure to come, not only the knowledge of a large number of new families and individuals, but also valuable and unexpected opportunities for service. An old down-town Church in Philadelphia, for example, not long ago found itself with its former families moving out, and splendid old homes being turned into boarding houses, with inevitable effects upon the work of the Church. A trained worker was sent out to visit one hundred of these young people in boarding houses, to discover what they wanted from the Church, and the answers were classified. The young women asked for facilities for washing, ironing, and sewing. Both sexes wanted athletics, library, game room, a pleasant Sunday afternoon and evening at the church, organized social life during the week, and parties including social dancing. As a result of this inquiry, the Church has become the neighborhood center for the district and is having a far-reaching influence on large numbers of young people who had been practically untouched by the Church.

I suggest to pastors the study of the experience of outstanding churches. A pastor or a committee will always come back from a visit to another church with ideas applicable to their own parish. When it is not practicable to visit churches on the ground, they may be studied by means of their year books. The Federal Council of Churches will be glad to give suggestions concerning typical churches for study.

Pastors are likely to say of the seven-day idea that it is applicable to large churches which can have salaried help, but not to small communities and to the country. This is a real difficulty, but is not prohibitive. The country and the village community need the open church as much as or more than the city, for cities have many neighborhood centers and the country few. If the pastor has the gift of organization, or if he has learned it by study, almost any church can become a center of seven-day service. If he gives great attention to selecting leaders, if he builds gradually and patiently, if he opens the church for community organizations, he will gradually develop an open church, whose life has flowed out into the community and to which the community has come back with gratitude and confidence.

MEN WHO TITHE

By William G. Shepherd

Condensed From the World's Work

I DON'T suppose that any one knows where that Salvation Army girl is now.

If you were to hunt for her, you would have to seek among white-haired women and find one who had been a Salvation Army girl in the city of Seattle about thirty years ago. And then you would have to refresh her memory, for the incident was a passing one—very small and easily forgotten.

She was standing on the sidewalk, so the story goes, when a young man came out of a saloon. She smiled and shook her tambourine at him. She didn't know that this young man had been a partner of "Dude" Lewis in the real estate business, and that the firm was busted; she didn't know that "Dude" Lewis was a quarter of a century or more later, to be known as United States Senator J. Ham Lewis. Neither did she know that this young man was to become, in a strange way, one of the rich oil-finders of the United States—Charles Page, of Tulsa and Sand Springs, Oklahoma. So she only smiled and shook her tambourine.

"I'm broke," said the young man. "I'm down to my last dollar."

"Well, why don't you tithe?" she asked, still smiling.

"Tithe? What does that mean?" asked the young fellow.

"Why, the Bible says that we ought to give one tenth of what we have to the Lord," she explained.

"All right!" said the youth. "I've got a dollar and fifteen cents. I'll do better than one tenth. I'll give fifteen cents."

He tossed the fifteen cents into the tambourine and went his way.

"You'd have to ask this white-haired woman, if you found her, whether she remembered this passing incident; and she would probably be unable to recall it. It was only a case of youth meeting a girl in a poke bonnet, a farmer boy away from home in rather shabby clothes on the sidewalk of an uncouth town, and chatting and smiling together for a moment and then going their separate ways.

But, if you could find her, you could show her an amazing thing; you could show her that her laughing Bible lesson was perhaps the most important thing she ever did in her life.

From that day, so they tell you in Tulsa, Charles Page "tithed," and more than "tithed."

"Charlie" Page has been working with "God's money" ever since.

His luck at striking oil has been phenomenal; there is a tradition in the oil fields of the country that "Charlie" Page never misses a "hole." Where he drills oil comes, they say. You cannot get Page to talk about his "partnership"; it is his own private affair. But once he told a friend, in speaking of his success at drilling:

"I think I've missed only two holes in my life. You see I couldn't miss, because I was in partnership with the Big Fellow and He made geology."

A Children's Ideal Community.

If there is a finer sight in this country than Sand Springs, Oklahoma, I haven't encountered it. It is a town, built entirely around children who have been unfortunate in life.

"Charlie" Page's tithes did not go into the church; they went into helping children who were unlucky. He built himself a home in the country, outside of Tulsa, some years ago; then he built another home near by for children. There wasn't room in his own house for all the children in trouble. That was twenty or more years ago.

Today, if you will walk up toward the great brick building which houses "Charlie" Page's children, you will be met with an onrush of boys and girls that may sweep you off your feet. That Salvation Army girl would like to see it. They all called him "Daddy" the day I went there with him. At least fifty of them tried to reach him and maul him.

Tell It To the Bees.

The folks laugh pleasantly, at Tulsa, when they tell you about how "Charlie" Page's enterprises always succeed. They have this story about him:

He made up his mind that it would be interesting to have a hobby—something that wouldn't turn into a profitable business on his hands. A friend suggested bees. Page sent East for a bee expert.

The expert brought samples of bees.

"You'll have to plant alfalfa for this one and clover for this one," explained the expert, describing the peculiarities of each variety of bee. Page listened patiently until the expert was through. Then he said:

"Blankety blank! Those aren't the kinds of bees I want. I want a bee that you can turn loose to play, not work. I want one that you can tell: 'Here, bee! Here's the whole great state of Oklahoma. Go out and have a good time and find some honey. If you can't find it here, you can't find it anywhere!'"

That the man who takes God into honest, square partnership cannot get into financial trouble, or any other very deep trouble, is "Charlie" Page's belief. A Bishop went to see him one time, they tell you in Tulsa; the church needed money. Not much of "Charlie" Page's money goes into churches, I am told; they say he is a little impatient with churches that are in financial need; he cannot understand it. The Bishop seated himself, at Page's invitation, but before the Bishop could say a word Page looked him square in the eye and said, simply:

"Bishop, do you tithe?"

"Why, I give my entire time to the church," was the answer.

"Yes, I know," answered Page. "I understand that. But do you tithe?"

The Bishop admitted that he did not. The story in Tulsa goes that the Bishop's effort was not a success.

Mysticism or Superstition?

There are many men in business in America today who are consistent tithers; you find them among both Jews and Gentiles.

You may call it mysticism, if you please, or even superstition, but these men will tell you unashamedly that it pays to tithe.

In these days when believers in odd doctrines obtain ready hearing in the United States, it is not irrational to entertain the statements of believers in the tithing system. Unlike believers in most mystic doctrines, your convinced tither will show you mathematically that he has prospered financially as well as in other directions.

A noted Southern lawyer recently announced to friends and associates that some years before he had adopted the principle of tithing. His motto was a verse from the Old Testament: "Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him; because that for this thing the Lord, thy God, shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou putteth thine hand unto." He announced his yearly earnings to show his experience. In a certain year he made $3,900; the next year he made $5,303.17; the next year his earnings were $21,451.44; they more than doubled the ensuing year, when he earned $55,455.30. During the year that he made his unusual announcement he earned $75,862.34.

In the Southwest there is a string of twenty-eight stores which form a great monument to a business man who, throughout his business career, followed the practice of tithing. He explained once, to friends, why he tithed.

"Why, you and I tithe each other," he said. "We would not lend a neighbor money with which to run his business without interest. Neither would we expect him to lend us money without paying interest. I found I was using God's money and the business talents He had given me without paying Him interest. That's all I've done in tithing—just met my interest obligations."

There is a string of five hundred chain stores, operated in almost as many towns and cities in the United States, that is headed by a business man who has tithed consistently. The founder of the business was a tither, and the president of the company who followed him continued the practice. Ten years ago the sales of this company were $2,500,000 a year. Last year they amounted to more than $60,000,000.

"Experience has taught me," the president of this company told me, "that the man prospers best who gives most freely of the bounty that comes to him. The man who founded our company was an example to all of us who grew up in the business with him. We all believe that free giving is worth while in more ways than one. In its turn it promotes prosperity which makes giving possible."

Many American men and women wear gloves of a well-known brand that are manufactured by a man who tithes.

Ask him why more and more of us wear his gloves every year, and this manufacturer will smilingly tell you that he has reason to believe that it is because, five years ago, he began to tithe.

"The pastor of my church advocated tithing for its spiritual benefits," this manufacturer told me. "He also insisted that business men would find it a good investment. I tried it and I discovered that he was right in both respects."

"Giving away one tenth of my income has never reduced my net personal income below that of the previous year. And what's more, our business is increasing steadily."

In the glove trade it was estimated that the sales of this company had increased almost fifty per cent in one year; its improvement in business was one of the notable events of the trade in 1923.

One Man Out Of Eight.

Eight brothers, within recent years, have established a firm which manufactures a certain food which may be found on most American tables. The firm has become the largest of its kind in the world. Its sales last year were made not only through the United States but also in Europe, Asia and Africa, and the product is now reaching a world market. To many business men conversant with this particular line of business the progress of this firm has been a mystery. Its products seemed suddenly to become a household necessity.

I should violate a confidence if I were to name this firm and its products; but one of the eight brothers, a vice-president of the company, told me:

"Up to the start of 1923 I had been making fairly liberal contributions to religious and charitable causes, but the amounts varied so much every year that I wasn't sure I was giving my share. So I began to tithe in January, 1923. One of my brothers, who is president of the company has been a tither for many years. When I saw him a few months ago, he told me that he had quit tithing and was giving away twenty-five per cent of his income instead of ten per cent."

"If there's any good luck in tithing—though I'm sure that neither my brothers nor myself are thinking of luck, when we try to do a little good with our money—our president and the rest of my brothers haven't any reason to dispute the statement. There are eight of us brothers in the business, and we have seen it climb from a small beginning to our present concern, which sold $40,000,000 worth of products throughout the entire world last year."

Tithing a Sound Business Investment.

In New York City there is a merchant tailor with a large shop in one of the high-rent buildings which hundreds of thousands of persons pass daily; it is along one of the very congested pathways of the city.

To this man his own success in business has only one explanation—his tithing. He spoke to me as frankly about it as he might about any other business practice.

"Any man who plays fair with God," he said, "is sure to prosper. I started tithing when I got the idea some years ago that all I had belonged to God, and that He was permitting me to use it. I expected, of course, when I began to tithe, that my net income would be reduced by ten per cent. But this has never happened to me. Each year's net income has been larger in spite of tithing."

"When the lease on these quarters ran out a few years ago, a great increase in rent was demanded. We have a very choice corner in a very superior location, but it was hard to see how we could make the payments. I talked the matter over with my wife, and we both decided that, even if it became necessary to move, we would not stop tithing. We signed the new lease, and at the end of the next twelve months our net profits showed a fine increase."

"Talent loaned by God, time loaned by God, and money loaned by God," has been the working motto of one of the most noted furnace manufacturers of the country.

He has a life of business achievement behind him, and he attributes it all to the fact that he has considered himself a steward of divinely lent elements of success.

"I had to leave school when I was fourteen," he explained to me, "because of ill-health. I was the oldest of seven children. When I was a boy the pastor of our church convinced me that everything I had, or would have, in life would belong to God. As soon as I understood this I began putting aside one tenth of everything I earned, every day, no matter how small it was. I went out into life with empty pockets and willing hands and a firm belief in my responsibility to God. God has more than kept His promise to me financially and spiritually."

Ask this man for a formula for success in life and he will give it readily: "Everything you have, even your time, is divinely lent to you. If you accept it as a divine loan, you cannot fail."

The Gospel of Tithing.

The tithers are busy groups; they are not so difficult to discover, working away in American life, as were Sir Arthur's spiritists. They have a mystic belief and they abide by it earnestly. They press it, too, most earnestly upon those they encounter, for they seem to feel that they have solved the mystery of the value of life and work, and that all the world ought to know it.

In the world of tithers, where "Charlie" Page, the oil man, and the rest of them live and work and succeed, the outsider can only stand silent and wonder.

People believe many strange things these days. The world is full of creeds and doctrines and mysteries.

Who can take away the self-proven belief of the tithers? They have the soundest arguments of all.

If you endeavor to explain their belief on the ground of psychology alone you run up against a stone wall.

"It is faith," one eminent psychologist explained. "Faith gives confidence."

Another said, "I will not attempt to explain the belief of the tithers on materialistic grounds. No one can say that there is not something mystic about their success. I am a Christian myself and I believe that God takes care of His children."

The Psychologist's Comment.

Prof. Robert Sessions Woodworth, head of the department of psychology at Columbia University, put the cold yardstick of the science of psychology up against the belief—and the successes—of the tithers. He said:

"The belief that their money was a loan from God, that they were in partnership with Him, would give these men who tithe more confidence and self-reliance, would minimize all difficulties in their eyes, and would, no doubt, go far toward bringing them success."

"On the other hand, they were evidently by nature men of unusual energy and self-reliance. In the first place, had they not possessed these qualities they would not have felt that they would dare to begin tithing at a time when their resources were so limited. Men of less natural energy, weak men, could have been influenced through their reliance on such partnership with Omnipotence to relax their own efforts and trust so far to divine aid that their business could have failed instead of prospering."

"The fact that these men did have so much self-confi-

COMMUNITY BUILDING.

A friend has handed us a newspaper clipping which gives the record of an unusual combination for the benefit of community welfare.

In Southern Georgia a minister and a railroad have cooperated very successfully, and brought about a condition that is most cheering from the material viewpoint at least.

We quote as follows:

"South Georgia today gives promise of having one of the greatest years known to the tobacco industry in that section with its bumper crop of tobacco now being put on the market. An idea of the vast amount of tobacco being raised in that section and what it means to that section, which is traversed by the Georgia and Florida Railway, is the fact that a sum of money estimated at $500,000 is being turned loose each day through the sale of tobacco. The people of Augusta and this section cannot realize the enormous crop of tobacco that is being raised at their very doors unless they make a trip to the tobacco fields of South Georgia where some of the world's finest tobacco is being raised and marketed.

"The most satisfied farmer in Georgia today is the farmer in South Georgia, who, upon getting his slips for the sale of his tobacco, proceeds to the bank where the slips are immediately turned into cash. From the banks the farmer mingles with the townfolks and the merchant who benefits as does the farmer for he sells to the tobacco raiser the supplies necessary for his home and his farm. The merchants are facing one of their best years as result of the bumper crop. The stores are all well stocked and every line of business anticipates a splendid fall. The fields all along the line of the Georgia and Florida Railway and adjoining territory are already white with cotton that is ready for picking. This crop also gives promise of being a great one for the farmer this year. Vidalia shipped its first bale to the market an August 6.

"Tobacco raising in Georgia is practically a new venture. A tale of romance could be woven around a story of the first tobacco crop. The actual beginning of the great money making crop, which proved to be the salvation of the farmer after the boll weevil ravages several years ago, was started by a Baptist minister, of the hard shell kind who receive no remuneration for their service. A Rev. Smith, who besides farming did a great deal of preaching in that section of Georgia, realized just what the boll weevil meant to his people and he right away quietly suggested to some of his people to raise a small quantity of tobacco as an experiment. He offered his services to them in the matter of teaching them how to plant the crop and go about raising and gathering it, as he had had practical experience while farming in South Carolina. The farmers to whom he suggested this venture readily agreed, as they were willing to raise anything that would aid them in their fight against the boll weevil which had ravaged their farms and cotton crops. The first year was very encouraging. The first crop was sold in the Carolinas and brought a good price.

"The Georgia and Florida which then was just getting into that territory realized the possibilities of this vast money making crop which the humble minister of the gospel started as a means of aiding his people and at once put the minister on their payroll as its tobacco agent and sent him over the lines of the railroad to interest the people in the raising of tobacco. Due to continued bad years in the cotton fields the new tobacco agent found hundreds of farmers ready and willing to listen to his suggestions. His suggestions were their fortunes as will be evidenced by the large crops that are raised each year in that section of Georgia. It was their salvation. From the mere raising of the crop they went into the scientific culture of the weed and today there is a brand of tobacco being raised down there that has no equal in the world.

"It is to the credit of the Georgia and Florida Railway that the farmer of that section was given the opportunity of marketing his tobacco and raising it. When large quantities of tobacco were raised the company communicated with the big tobacco industries who immediately sent their agents into the new tobacco territory.

"A wonderful opportunity lies open to the man who would raise tobacco. Of course the crop has to be raised in a manner the same as other crops. You just can't go out and plant a crop and expect it to grow by itself. It needs the best of attention and care and the first venture into the business requires a small amount of money. After the first crop, which if a success, the sailing is smooth. There is plenty of open land in South Georgia that could be used for the raising of tobacco and which can right now be purchased for very small sums. The way the crop is now being raised means that in the next few years this entire section of South Georgia will be active in the raising of tobacco."

Of course, it is not the primary purpose either of the Church as an institution, nor of clergymen as individuals, to bring to pass material prosperity, but might it not be well for our rural churches to give more attention to this thought, just as a by-product, so to speak?

No doubt the Rev. Mr. Smith, of this incident, had some special training and natural proclivities which he turned to good account.

There are, however, many opportunities similar to this in which our rural churches can exert a beneficent leadership if their rectors would only awake and grasp the position of leadership which they have for the taking.

Often there is a tract of from one to ten acres of land that goes with a rural rectory. We think it a serious mistake for the country rector to turn himself into a farmer or market gardener, or even to supplement his salary by renting the rectory land. Country parishes should recognize the fact that it is their duty to support their minister, as a minister, and not expect him to have to eke out his salary by work for which he is not fitted, and that is not in his line.

There are, however, in many counties agricultural agents or home demonstration teachers, who would be delighted to have a small tract of land placed at their disposal for demonstration purposes. Boys' and girls' canning clubs could be organized under the auspices of the church to work the church property according to progressive scientific methods outlined by the county agent. In this way the rural church could become useful in the most practical way, and serve as the advance agent for showing that modern methods of agriculture are not mere theories.

In places where there is no county agent, there may be a nearby high school where an agricultural course is being introduced, and a demonstration plot would be invaluable. Often, too, the state or national agricultural departments are glad to send out a special representative to advise or supervise the planting and cultivation of certain crops in which they are especially interested.

Another matter mentioned in the clipping we have quoted is the cooperation of the railroad company in helping to promote the prosperity of the country through which it runs. Of course, everybody knows that this is part of the regular business of a railroad company. Many people, however, are not aware that such corporations are also willing to help in welfare and charitable efforts. Special rates, and, sometimes, free transportation are granted for deserving persons, who need to travel to hospitals, or other institutions, or through unfortunate circumstances are stranded away from home. Such charity rates or passes are usually issued through some agency, like the State or County Board of Public Welfare, on whose investigation the companies can depend so that their liberality will not be abused. As an Executive Secretary for Social Service, the writer has had frequent experiences of this helpful attitude of transportation companies, and it is well that the public should know that these corporations have hearts, if not souls.

The Great Commission

THE CHURCH IN SHANGHAI.

Present conditions of civil war around Shanghai draw attention especially to the institutions and parishes of the Episcopal Church's Missionary District of Shanghai, which constitutes the Diocese of Shanghai in the Chinese Church.

There are about twenty-eight parishes or mission stations, their communicant membership varying in number from little groups of fifteen or twenty to larger congregations of two hundred and three hundred. The Church of Our Saviour in Hongkew was founded in 1845; Grace Church, Shanghai, in 1848.

The outstanding institution is perhaps St. John's University, with its fine record of training young Chinese men for leadership, through its schools of arts and sciences and through its theological, medical and engineering schools and departments. Chinese history and literature are taught by Chinese scholars. A library, athletics, publications, and a loyal body of alumni are other features that make this a university of excellent standing.

Secondary schools are too numerous for separate description. Most of them, probably all, are crowded. Many have long years of history behind them. Their reputations have been built up by our faithful missionaries of former years and are sustained and added to by those of the present time. The leading school for girls is St. Mary's Hall, Shanghai. Among other familiar names are Chants Academy, Soochow Academy, Epiphany School, Soochow, St. Mark's, Wusih, Mahan and St. Faith's, Yangchow. There is also the Church Training School for Bible Women, in Soochow.

St. Luke's and St. Elizabeth's Hospital, in Shanghai, St. Andrew's in Wusih, and the Church Hospital in Changshu are important and interesting institutions, good hospitals, stations for intensely practical social service, training schools for Chinese nurses, and centers of regular evangelistic teaching and preaching.

One who does not share the conventional distaste for statistics, which frequently only betrays a faulty imagination, may find interest in some of the figures for the Shanghai District, as given in The Living Church Annual. That the diocese is becoming really Chinese in character may be seen from the fact that the foreign clergy number seventeen priests and two deacons, while there are twenty-two Chinese priests and eight Chinese deacons, with three Chinese candidates for Orders, forty-one Chinese Catechists and assistants, and twenty-six Bible women. The ratio is even better in the other missionary professions, as Chinese physicians and teachers considerably outnumber the foreigners. There are also nineteen medical students and seventy-three student nurses, about half of the latter being men.

There are over 6,000 baptized persons on the rolls, and 3,004 communicants, an increase of three hundred and ninety-nine communicants since the last yearly report.

MATERIAL FOR EVERY MEMBER CANVASS.

New literature for general use in connection with the fall Canvass is confined this year to two issues of The Church at Work and a reprint of Chapter IV of Mr. Gill's book, "My Father's Business." Leaflets used in previous years are still available.

The first of the two fall issues of The Church at Work is to be ready early in October. This is to contain in shortened form the little book, "My Father's Business," written by the Rev. J. M. B. Gill, which, although only recently published, has already received enthusiastic notice. It is a popular book for every Church member, and is reprinted in The Church at Work in the hope that it may be of the widest possible usefulness.

Stewardship in its largest meaning is the idea of Chapter IV of this book. The chapter has been reprinted in attractive form as Leaflet 2115, for separate free distribution. It is possible by means of a proper use of this Leaflet to put in the hands of every Church family a really interesting discussion of what the Church should mean to every person, and, more especially, what every person should mean to the Church.

In the second fall issue of The Church at Work, to be ready early in November for distribution well in advance of the Canvass on December 7, another new book is to be partly reprinted, "Evangelism in the Church," by the Rev. J. A. Schaad, a book which is being eagerly welcomed on all sides as the first of its kind to emphasize the place and the character of evangelism in and through the Church.

PRAYING FOR YOUR NEIGHBORS.

A rector who believed in his own ministry of prayer conceived the idea of having all the members of his congregation help him quite definitely in praying for each other. To each one, after a preparatory statement and a sermon on intercession, he gave a card containing the name of the person to whom it was given, three or four brief prayers, printed, and the names of three members of the congregation. These names were confidential. In each case no one knew them but the rector and the owner of the card. Each one knew that his own name had been assigned to three others, a spur to mutual faithfulness, though he did not know who the others were.

It took a considerable amount of careful thought and work to assign the names. As a rule women prayed for women, men for men, and children for children. The specially devoted communicants were assigned names of indifferent or inactive members. Sometimes a best friend's name was assigned. Various motives determined the choice. The rector did not call for volunteers, which would have brought out only the most devoted, but laid upon all a share of the priest's responsibility to pray for his flock by name. Only one person declined.

"Really," says the rector, "the appeal was unanswerable, if you professed at all to believe in the Church. One might have all sorts of excuses for not doing Church work and for not coming to Church, but none for not saying his prayers!" He suggests the use of the idea through Advent or Lent, or throughout the year with perhaps a quarterly change of the names assigned. "It is an effort to assign the names, but worth it."

ENGLISH CHURCHES IN EUROPE.

In connection with the American Churches in Europe, it is interesting to know the extent of the work of the English Church there. There are two Anglican dioceses, Northern and Central Europe, and Gibraltar. In this area the S. P. G. has about twenty chaplaincies that are permanent, and two hundred and eighty that are seasonal. There are fifty-nine churches. Work is carried on for British students at French universities, especially at Grenoble and Tours. The churches in Germany are not yet all reopened. Of Berlin, Frankfurt and Baden, a report says, "No words can describe the extreme difficulty experienced by the chaplains in these places to meet the necessary expense of keeping these churches open." The S. P. G. report about the European work in general says that the provision for chaplains in places frequented by tourists is the least important part of the work. It is primarily for "the thousands of sick and suffering members of the Church who are ordered to the continent in hope of regaining their health and who should while there receive the fullest consolation and support that spiritual ministrations alone can give them."

THE GREAT GUEST COMES IN.

While the cobbler mused there passed his pane
A beggar drenched by the driving rain.
He called him in from the stormy street,
And gave him shoes for his bruised feet.
The beggar went and there came a crone,
Her face with wrinkles of sorrow sown.
A bundle of faggots bowed her back,
And she was spent with the wrench and rack.
He gave her his loaf and steadied her load
As she took her way on the weary road.
Then to his door came a little child,
Lost and afraid in the world so wild.
In the big dark world. Catching it up,
He gave it milk in the waiting cup,
And led it home to mother's arms.

The day went down in the crimson west,
And with it the hope of the Blessed Guest,
And Conrad sighed as the world turned gray:
"Why is it, Lord, that your feet delay?
Did you forget that this was the day?"
Then soft in the silence a voice he heard:
"Lift your heart, for I kept my word;
Three times I came to your friendly door;
Three times my shadow was on your floor;
I was the beggar with the bruised feet;
I was the woman you gave to eat;
I was the child on the homeless street."

Thirty-Ninth Annual Convention, Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The annual gathering of Church Men and Church Boys, under the auspices of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, will take place this year at Albany, New York, on October 8 to 12. Leaders of the Church, clerical and lay, will bring contributions of practical helpfulness, experiences and methods found fruitful in the cause of the Kingdom.

The Program.

The program has been constructed with the average man particularly in mind. He will have more opportunities than usual to ask his questions and take part in the discussion of the work that holds for him the largest interest. The Discussion Conference plan is to be used, an innovation in Brotherhood Conventions. The Convention will divide itself into three parts each morning. Each part will be led by an experienced man and each part will discuss a vital and compelling subject. The three Discussion Groups will consider "The Individual Christian at Work," "The Senior Chapter at Work," and "The Brotherhood's New Junior Plan."

Prominent speakers at the Convention are: the Rt. Rev. Richard H. Nelson, D. D., Bishop of Albany; the Rt. Rev. G. Ashton Oldham, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Albany; the Rt. Rev. W. H. Moreland, D. D., Bishop of Sacramento; the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop of Washington; the Rt. Rev. William A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop of South Carolina; the Rt. Rev. Granville G. Bennett, D. D., Bishop of Duluth; Mr. John W. Wood, D. C. L., Executive Secretary, Department of Missions, National Council; Mr. G. Warfield Hobbs, Editor of the Spirit of Missions; Mr. John L. Alexander, Director of the Leadership Training Division, American Youth Foundation; the Rev. W. H. Owen, rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Harlem, New York City; Mr. George A. Ballachey, of the Brotherhood National Council; the Rev. Duncan M. Genns, rector of St. Thomas Church, Brooklyn; the Rev. H. H. Hart, D. D., Russell Sage Foundation, New York; the Rev. Thomas Burgess, in charge of the Church's work among the Foreign-born; the Rev. Charles D. Broughton, rector of the Church of the Ascension, Buffalo; the Rev. H. P. A. Abbott, D. D., rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, Md.; the Rev. P. T. Edrop, Assistant at Emmanuel Church, Boston; the Rev. James A. Mitchell, rector of All Hallows' Church, Snow Hill, Maryland; and others. The Brotherhood Secretaries who are scheduled to lead Discussion Groups and participate in the Program are Mr. John H. Frizzell, Mr. Leon C. Palmer, Mr. Francis A. Williams, Mr. S. Mendelson Meehan. An important Discussion is to be led by Mr. H. Lawrence Choate, Director of St. Paul's Chapter, Chicago, and member of the Brotherhood National Council.

Attendance of Bishops.

As the House of Bishops will be in session in New York City just about the time of the Convention, it is expected that an unusual number of the Bishops of the Church will visit the Convention, particularly over the weekend.

Arrangements in Albany.

A visit to the Convention will be a delightful experience, as well as one of spiritual strengthening. The arrangements provide convenient and economical accommodations for visitors, and Albany is a beautiful and interesting city, one which most men and boys want to visit. Visitors will be accommodated at the Hotel Wellington, at unusually modest rates, meals will be served in St. Paul's Parish House, through the cooperation of Archdeacon Brooks, business sessions of the Convention will be held in the Westminster Presbyterian Church, and the religious services of the Convention will be located in All Saints' Cathedral.

The Junior Convention.

The Convention of Church Boys, which runs concurrently with the Senior MISSIONARIES IN CHINA SAFE.

The following cable despatch was received by the Department of Missions of the Episcopal Church at No. 281 Fourth Avenue, in response to a despatch to the Rt. Rev. Frederick R. Graves, D. D., Bishop of Shanghai, requesting information as to the safety of missionaries in the Chinese war zone. The despatch to Bishop Graves directed him to spare no expense in assuring the safety of all missionaries in the territory where the fighting is going on. Dr. C. M. Lee, mentioned in the despatch as in charge of the Red Cross Hospital at Wusih, is the Director of St. Anthony's Episcopal Hospital at that point. Bishop Graves' despatch, which was dated September 4, is as follows:

"There is no cause for anxiety at present. No need extra expenses. Missionaries at their stations helping Chinese men, women and children. Dr. C. M. Lee in charge of Red Cross Hospital at Wusih. St. John's University and St. Mary's Hall is opening as usual. Some schools postponed temporarily. Send new missionaries according to plan."

(Signed)

Bishop Graves.

Convention will have its headquarters in the Guild Hall of All Saints' Cathedral, and boys in attendance will live on the top floor of the Hotel Wellington. The Junior Program is in charge of Mr. Francis A. Williams, Brotherhood Secretary in charge of Junior Work, and it is believed that it is the best conceived program ever offered the older boys of the Church. Not only are the subjects admirably chosen and phrased in a language appealing to boys, but the speakers are men who are without question apostles to boys. The Chaplain of the Junior Convention is the Rev. William H. Owen, and leading speakers are Mr. John L. Alexander, Mr. C. Lawson Willard, the Rev. P. T. Edrop, the Rev. James A. Mitchell, Mr. Forrest A. Brown, Mr. Clarence W. Brickman, Jr., and others.

A General Invitation.

The Brotherhood is urging that men and boys of the Church, whether members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew or not, arrange to make a "Spiritual Pilgrimage" to Albany in October, for the purpose of meeting men who are outstanding workers in the Church, of hearing their messages, of contributing their own experiences for the benefit of others, and of renewing their inspiration and consecration for the work of leading men to Christ.

It is particularly urged that men who intend to come to Albany signify their intention promptly, that accommodations may be made for them. Registration cards are obtainable from the officers of Brotherhood Chapters everywhere, from the Brotherhood National Office, at 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia, and from the Chairman of the Registration Committee, Mr. George S. Clerk, 226 Broadway, Albany, N. Y.

The Banquets.

The Convention will open with a Banquet for Seniors, to be held at the Ten Eyck Hotel, Mr. Courtney Barber, of Chicago, Toastmaster, and for Juniors, to be held at the Parish House of St. Paul's Church, Mr. Francis A. Williams in charge. Speakers at the Senior Dinner will be Bishops Nelson and Oldham, Mr. John L. Alexander, whose topic will be "The Future Leadership of the Church," and Bishop Freeman, who will speak on "First Things First in America."

Convention Addresses.

The subjects assigned to Convention speakers indicate the strongly practical purpose of the gathering, and its certain helpfulness to men who attend. "The Progress of the Kingdom," is a topic to be discussed by three speakers, "Through organization and use of personal influence," "Through Religious Education," and "Through Development and Use of Spiritual Resources." Brotherhood activities are discussed under the heads, "Organization and Work of Local and Diocesan Assemblies," "Work Among Men and Boys in Rural Parishes," "Bible Classes," "Workers With Boys Twelve to Fifteen Years Old," "Printers' Ink and Evangelism," discussed by Mr. Hobbs, Editorial Secretary of the Department of Publicity of the National Council of the Church, is certain to be interesting and illuminating; "Conference of the Clergy," "Work Among the Foreign Born," "The Value of a Boy," "Am I My Brother's Keeper," "I Can Do All Things Through Christ," are highlights from the Provisional Program being distributed by the Brotherhood.

Corporate Communion.

The great Annual Corporate Communion, always a feature of Brotherhood Conventions, will be held in All Saints' Cathedral, on Sunday, October 12, at 7:30 A. M., Bishop Nelson being the celebrant.

At the eleven o'clock service, Brotherhood workers, laymen of the Church, will be the speakers in our Churches in Albany, Troy and Schenectady.

It is announced that the principal meetings and services of the Convention will be broadcast by radio, through Station WGY, of Schenectady.

The contributions, the loans, the letters of appreciation of what it is hoped this exhibition may do, and the letters of good wishes are all cordially appreciated.

Among those whose assistance has been gratefully received should be mentioned, the Bishops of Connecticut, Chicago, Colorado, Texas, South Dakota, Arizona, Pittsburgh, Mississippi, Georgia, North Carolina, East Carolina, New Hampshire, and the Bishop-Coadjutor of Massachusetts; the Architects Frohman, Robb and Little and Cram and Ferguson of Boston, Day and Klauder of Philadelphia, Wilfred Edwards Antony of New York, Hewitt and Brown of Minneapolis, MacLaren and Hetherington of Colorado Springs, Benedict, Hoyt, Fisher and Fisher, Manning and Varian of Denver; the Craftsmen and Artists, D'Ascenzo of Philadelphia, and Connick of Boston, who sent stained glass designs; Oscar Bach of New York and Victor S. The arranging of the circuit for this Traveling Exhibition is in charge of the Rev. Neil E. Stanley, 1956 Grant Street, Denver, Colorado.

Whole Family in Deaf Mute Work.

Miss Olive A. Whildin, one of the daughters of the Rev. Oliver J. Whildin, missionary to the Deaf in our Church, has been appointed a Special Teacher of the Deaf in the Baltimore Public Schools by the Board of Education of that city.

Miss Whildin is qualified for the important and newly created position, not alone by reason of a life-long association with the Deaf, but also by a five-years' thorough course of normal training in the best methods of educating the Deaf. It is interesting to note that her duties require her to inspect all the schools of the city, to provide medical attention for children who show early signs of losing their hearing, to arrange for instrumental aids for the partially deaf and to furnish instruction in speech and lip reading to all who cannot hear in order to enable them to read their teacher's lips and thus to keep abreast of the normal children in their class studies.

A younger sister, Miss Mabel Whildin, is also engaged in teaching the Deaf, in the Preparatory School of Gallaudet College for the Deaf, Washington, D. C. Being experts not only in speech and lip reading, but also in the use of the language of signs as applied to conversation and public speaking, the Rev. Mr. Whildin and also Mrs. Whildin, who is greatly interested in the social and humane sides of the Mission, find the frequent and practical aid of their daughters, as advisers and interpreters, invaluable to them and very much appreciated by the silent people. It is somewhat unusual to find all the members of a family so thoroughly interested in the church and educational work among the Deaf in this country.

The American Guild of Health.

The Rev. Franklyn Cole Sherman, President of the American Guild of Health, has returned from the summer in Europe, where he spent his time studying the work of the parent organization, the Guild of Health in London. He attended the Annual Conference of the English Guild of Health held at St. Margaret's Hall at Oxford.

The fall work of the American Guild of Health is being opened with a two weeks' session of "The Cleveland School of Applied Religion," the teaching organ of the Guild. This School is a unique method used by Mr. Sherman as a means of making the Christian Religion practical in the daily life. Special stress is laid on the true relation of the Spiritual Life to mental and physical health. Lectures are given on both the spiritual and scientific aspects of the subject of Religion and Health. The work of the School is not confined to Cleveland; classes are organized in various cities. The School usually covers a period of two weeks.

The American Guild of Health has permanent headquarters in the Ulmer Building in Cleveland.

Establish Church Connections With the Students.

The Rev. George P. Mayo, rector of Monumental Church, requests us to announce that if persons have sons or friends attending the Medical College of Virginia, in Richmond, and will notify him giving the names, and, if possible, the addresses of such students he will take pleasure in calling on them, and endeavoring to interest them in the Church life of the Monumental Church, which is situated close to the College.

The Rev. Noble C. Powell, rector of St. Paul's Memorial Church, Charlottesville, will also be glad to have the names and addresses of students attending the University of Virginia. He will be assisted this year by the Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, who graduated last year from the Theological Seminary in Virginia.

Friends or parents of students attending the University of Richmond, and boarding at the College, should notify the Rev. Giles B. Palmer, Westhampton, R. F. D. No. 2, Richmond, Va.

Opening of a New Church School.

It is interesting to note that a new unit has been added to the system of Church Schools in the Diocese of Virginia. St. Agnes' Episcopal School for Girls opens for its first session on September 24, in the old Lloyd Mansion near Alexandria. The principal is Miss Mary Josephine White, whose address is Alexandria, Va.

Mission at Grace Church, Cismont.

Our community has been stirred up mentally, morally, spiritually, and we hope, permanently, by a mission held from August 24 to 31, by the Rev. Loaring Clark, D. D., of Chattanooga, Tenn., who is one of the Missioners of the Episcopal Council in New York. He preached in the most earnest manner, twice each day.

The congregations were good at the morning services, but at night our church was filled to overflowing, as people came from far and near. Dr.

Clark is a wonderful preacher, most inspiring, being filled with energy, ability, humor, information, and above all, with the Holy Spirit, which he prayed might fall on every one of us. The box, at the church door, showed by the questions and petitions for prayer it contained the general interest that was aroused. Dr. Clark does not usually go to small country parishes, and we are indebted to Dr. and Mrs. G. Freeland Peter, who have a summer home in our neighborhood, for this wonderful opportunity for good. We are praying that God's blessing is upon us and will remain with us, and will be shown by a much larger number than usual for confirmation, when Bishop Brown visits us.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The New River Convocation: The fall meeting of the New River Convocation will be held in Christ Church, Martinsville, Monday and Tuesday, October 20 and 21. The Rev. D. L. Gwathmey, of Wytheville, is Dean of the Convocation, and the Rev. H. P. S. Huntington of Norton is Secretary.

Mission at St. Barnabas', Piney: A very successful and helpful mission was held by the Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, D. D., of the College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Virginia, at St. Barnabas', Piney, near Ivanhoe, in Wythe County, August 28 to 31, inclusive. The mission was very well attended, especially by people living in the community, and at the concluding service there were a great many people from Wytheville also.

Bazaar at Piney: Under the direction of Mrs. William Wilkins, a bazaar was held again this summer at St. Barnabas, Piney, on August 16, the proceeds from which were to help in extending the session of the community school.

Clergy Visiting at Wytheville: Several ministers spent all or part of their summer vacation at Wytheville; these being the Rev. Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin, of Williamsburg, the Rev. Fred D. Goodwin of the National Council, New York, the Rev. J. Hubard Lloyd of Blacksburg, the Rev. Robert Mayo of West River, Maryland, and the Rev. Page Dame of Baltimore.

Powhatan Church School Institute.

This organization includes the churches in Amelia and Powhatan counties, and holds two meetings each year in the spring and fall. The spring meeting is under the auspices of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education. In the fall local members make up the program.

This autumn's session was held on Wednesday, September 3, in the old Grub Hill Church, which was built in 1727.

The attendance was not large, but great interest was manifested by those present. The program was of a very practical nature, as follows:

11:00 A. M.—Morning Prayer, the Rev. C. Stewart.

11:30 A. M.—The Teaching Function of the Christian Church, the Rev. R. Cary Montague.

12:30 P. M.—Business Session.

1:00 P. M.—Luncheon.

2:00 P. M.—The Preparation and Presentation of the Lesson, Mrs. C. F. Ruan.

3:30 P. M.—Adjourn.

Mr. Montague used the Prayer Book as the basis of his address, emphasizing the way in which the Gospels for the Sundays throughout the year offer the opportunity for teaching the various incidents of Our Lord's life and words.

After a brief business session, which showed the Institute to be in a flourishing condition, adjournment was taken, for luncheon, which was provided most bountifully, baskets having been brought by those attending.

At the afternoon session Mrs. Ruan of Petersburg delivered an interesting, and thoroughly practical address on the preparation and teaching of the Sunday-school lesson. She concluded by turning the Institute into an interesting class, which she taught with such enthusiasm and earnestness, that we all wished we could be young again and go to Sunday School to her every Sunday.

The Institute adjourned to meet in the spring at Grace Church, Powhatan County. M.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D.

Service of Institution.

Bishop Freeman on Sunday, September 7, formally instituted the Rev. Raymond L. Wolven as vicar of Trinity Diocesan Church. Mr. Wolven, has been, prior to assuming this new position, minister-in-charge at Epiphany during the long period when Epiphany was without a rector.

At the service of institution Bishop Freeman made a short address and the Rev. Mr. Wolven preached the sermon. Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop. Special music was rendered by the quartette of Epiphany choir. A boys' choir will be organized at Trinity Church with the coming of Mr. Wolven as vicar and plans are already under way for the enrollment and training of its members.

The Bishop's Secretary: Mr. Thomas G. Spence, personal secretary to the Bishop, has resigned, in order to accept the offer of the vestry of the Church of the Epiphany to act as executive secretary of the parish. The Rev. Calvert Buck has been appointed by the Bishop as his chaplain and in this capacity will act as executive secretary of the diocese and assistant to the Bishop in his mission work. For the present Mr. Buck will have charge of the services at Christ Church, Southeast, which is without a rector. Mr. Buck has been rector-in-charge of the joint services of Christ Church and St. John's, Georgetown, during the summer, and has made a strong appeal to all who heard him by his forceful, scholarly and earnest presentation of a subject.

Many of the Clergy who have been absent on vacations, were in their channels on the first Sunday in September, and this Sunday marked also the reorganization of choirs and Sunday Schools.

The Rev. Robert Browning, rector of the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, and formerly associate rector of Epiphany, was the preacher at Epiphany Church on Sunday morning, September 7.

The preacher at the open-air service Washington Cathedral was the Rt. Rev. G. Ashton Oldham, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Albany.

The Valle Crucis Summer School.

The note of adventure in Christian Missions and in Christian Education appeared in the Valle Crucis Summer School for Religious Education held August 23-29, under the direction of the Department of Education in the Diocese. Mr. William E. Leidt of the Department of Missions, New York, cited the man to whom life had become so drab that the only adventure of life left was the Ku Klux Klan; real adventure for God and His Church was open to all believers in the mission field at home and abroad, and in bringing the masses of men to the mind of God for the day in which we live.

Genuine success has been the verdict of teachers and students who attended the Valle Crucis Summer School. There were fifty-four registrations at this first venture of a Summer School in the Diocese. They represented four of the Carolina dioceses. Nineteen of the clergy of these dioceses and Bishop Horner of Western North Carolina were present. The attendance of the mountain people at the evening sessions filled the large assembly hall six successive evenings. The need for early provision for the new chapel of the Mission School was apparent. The Rev. J. Preston Burke and his able principal, Miss Bouldin and other members of his staff showed by many courtesies and care of the school the advantage of the use of a going institution of the Church for this special work. The spacious buildings can accommodate twice the number attending this year.

The faculty included the Rev. Homer W. Starr, Ph. D., of Charleston, S. C., who taught the "Devotional Life of the Church"; the Rev. Robert E. Gribben, of Winston-Salem, N. C., the course on "Our Bible"; Miss Mabel Lee Cooper, teaching "Christian Nurture"; the Rev. A. W. Farnum, of Hendersonville, on "The Church School Service League," and Mr. William E. Leidt, of New York, on "The Church at Work." A special address by the Rev. Willis G. Clark was given on "Confirmation and the Congregation."

There was abundant recreation in the mountain region three thousand feet above the sea, and special musical programs, including the singing of old mountain ballads by members of the mission school. Many felt that this was the first step towards a summer school for the united dioceses of the Carolinas.

Almighty and merciful God, of whose only gift it cometh that Thy faithful people do unto Thee true and laudable service; Grant, we beseech Thee, that we may so faithfully serve Thee in this life that we fail not finally to attain Thy Heavenly promises; through the merits of Jesus Christ Our Lord. Christian, Stand Fast!

Harold V. Smedberg.

Christian, stand fast; though evil off
assail thee,
Tempting thee sore with dreams of golden gain,
Taunting thy faith that Christ can aught avail thee,
Pouring out promises in luring rain
Hold to the Law! that He hath spread before thee,
Pointing to righteousness as needle
to the Pole,
Fixed in its course like sun ascending
o'er thee,
Guiding thee straight to Heav'n's immortal goal.

Christian, plod on! though friends may try to stay thee,
Offering rich gifts of power and renown,
Gilding the traps with which they would betray thee,
Hiding the sword aloft to strike thee down,
Clasp firm the Book! its teachings pure will save thee,
Give needed strength sin's honors to refuse,
Unmask the false who vainly would en-slave thee,
Shame those who teach'rously thy soul would bruise.

Christian, rejoice! for God is reigning
o'er thee,
Watching thy trials from His throning sky;
And soon thy day shall break in deathless glory,
Soon shall the woes of life be past and by.
Walk in the Lord! for He will bring thee surely
To that bright world wherein His blessed dwell;
He'll bind thy hurts, of sorrow's wounds will cure thee;
Wrap thee in tenderness, and make thee well.

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

St. Peter Warned.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

"Then said Jesus, This night you shall all be scandalized at me; for it is written, I will smite the shepherd and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad. But after I am arisen again, I will go before you into Galilee."

The quotation is from Zech. 13:7, where it is said of the man who is God's "fellow," or equal. Its reference to scattered sheep applies to the Apostles; but from Zechariah we have a larger reference, to all Israel, which, by causes set in motion by Our Lord's crucifixion, was scattered in a world-wide dispersion and remains so to this day. The going before into Galilee, which was fulfilled in its larger sense a promise to all Israel not yet accomplished. The phrase is sometimes used of a shepherd leading his sheep. No great painter has yet made a picture of Our Lord leading broken Israel home, but it shall be done.

Simon Peter said to Him: "Lord, where will you go?"

"Where I go you are not able to follow Me now, but you shall follow Me later."

"Lord, why am I not able to follow You now? If all shall be scandalized at You, I will never be scandalized."

Simon, Simon, Satan has asked for you that he may sift you like grain, but I have prayed for you that your faith may not fail; and when you are turned back again, strengthen your brethren."

"Lord, I am ready to go with You both into prison and to death. I will lay down my life for Your sake."

"Will you lay down your life for Me? Amen, Amen, I say to you, Peter, that this very night, before the cock crow twice you will deny Me thrice."

"If I should die with You I would not deny You in any way." And so said they all.

The balance of evidence puts this protest in the house, before going out to Gethsemane, and before the sacerdotal prayer. Did we yield to instinct as against evidence we would put the conversation with Peter after leaving the house and before reaching the garden; because it was vine-pruning season, and the prunings from the vines, lying in the lanes underfoot, in the suburbs, would suggest the comparison of the vine and its branches.

The "Cock crowing twice" means, "Before second cock-crow." A parallel case would be "Before the clock strike twice." This means less than two hours. If one of these hours be midnight, the clock may strike twelve strokes without falsifying the prediction. Cocks are popularly, and, we believe, truthfully, supposed to crow at about midnight and three A. M. That Satan asked for Simon to sift him is illuminating. The person from whom Satan asked is the Father, for Christ also asked, in prayer, that Simon fail not. This, like the parable of the rich fool, opens up a wonderful and terrible vista into the unseen. Simon Peter is as totally unconscious of the notice as is the rich fool in the parable. Either, if questioned, would have unhesitatingly denied, on the ground of insignificance. Our own denial of the same attention on the same ground may be incorrect. Add what Our Lord said elsewhere about angels rejoicing over a repentant sinner and what St. Paul says of the innumerable company of witnesses watching as the audience watched the athletes in a Greek stadium, and we have a view of life terrible, wonderful, and grotesquely counter to our ordinary thoughts. We are more important than we think. There is no privacy anywhere. Every man gets sympathetic credit for the good he does, as well as blame for the evil, though that good be unknown and unsuspected. That Satan can "Ask" anything of the Father is noteworthy.

So much concerning the temporal power of the Roman Church has been built on the mention of two swords that we shrink a little from Edersheim's interpretation of the phrase as due to gross misunderstanding on the part of the Apostles. It seems so commonplace a puncturing of so enormous a soap-bubble. Yet we cannot help agreeing. Common-place common sense is the one element conspicuously lacking in Christendom's interpretation of Christ; and, wherever anybody introduces it, it is both shocking and welcome.

Our Lord notifies the eleven that the public will no longer support them and they must now support and defend themselves. He gives as a reason that He, and therefore they also, are reckoned among the transgressors, and that the prophecies concerning Him are rapidly drawing to fulfillment. The remark concerning the purchase of swords is the divine grant to Christians of the right of self-defense. It cannot mean less and probably does not mean more. As such it is unmistakably grander, more important, on a higher moral level, than the practical and immediate misinterpretation the eleven gave it or the higher but still low interpretation of the Church of Rome. Christians may defend themselves, this is their authority. The instinct of Christendom rings true. Aggressive force is permitted nowhere. Defensive force is enjoined here. We may defend ourselves, if necessary, and may prepare for such defense. Yet Our Master refused to defend Himself.

A Parable for Preachers.

The parish priest of Austerity,
Climbed up in a high church steeple,
To be nearer God, that he might
Hand down His word unto the people.

So he daily wrote in sermon script,
What he thought was sent from Heaven,
And he dropped this down on the people's heads
Two times one day in seven.

In his age, God said, "Come down and die."
And he cried from out the steeple,
"Where art Thou, Lord?" and the Lord replied,
"Down here, among my people."
—Bishop Doane.

"Rubbing It In."

Some one asked the principal of our high school why he did not make a greater effort to keep a certain efficient and very popular teacher of mathematics who had just resigned to accept another position. The principal, a cautious and discreet young man, hesitated, but spoke out at last. "Since she is gone," he said, "I will tell you just why I had very little sympathy with her. She knew mathematics and she knew how to teach. She had a strong and, I hope, a good influence over the students, although that influence was due in a large degree to adroit flattery. She graded too high, and she systematically proselytized to draw pupils away from the other mathematics teachers. But what exasperated me most was her diabolical skill in hurting people's feelings."

The questioner was astonished. "I had always heard that she was the kindest person in the world," he said.

"Kind—to her superiors, to the pupils, to people in general, yes. She would work her head off for the children. But some of her colleagues suffered torments at her hands. One of them in particular, a frank and sensible young woman who talks to me freely, used to describe to me a quiet way the girl had of wounding others without seeming to intend to. Thus she would contrive, when in the company of one of the English teachers, for example, to bring the conversation around to another of the English teachers who was very successful, and to remark innocently, 'I hear that Mr. _____ (the superintendent) told the board at their last meeting that Miss _____ is very much the strongest English teacher in the school.' Or she would exclaim enthusiastically, while she walked home with a less popular teacher whose pupils were not in the habit of making her gifts, 'Did I show you the beautiful fountain pen my Senior class gave me for Christmas? It makes me feel so happy to realize how much the children seem to appreciate me.' Or again, she would say to a mathematics colleague, speaking of a boy in one of her classes who, as she had conveniently forgotten, had done his earlier work in mathematics with this same colleague, 'Robert is doing beautifully with his mathematics now. And he says he never got anything out of it, and never liked it, till this semester.'"

"That is why," said the young principal, "although I should never have asked her to resign, I was perfectly willing that Miss _____ should leave us. I can't believe that a teacher's influence can be entirely wholesome, if the teacher is not fundamentally honest and generous."—R. T. House.

The Soul Athirst.

W. B. Lydenberg.

Drifting and groping, guessing, wondering.

My soul, awakening, cries out for light;
Some feeble rays within itself it finds.

Expanding, yearning, long it cries for love,

And finds such little love as it may give.
Defiant, boastful, proud, dethroned, de-based,

Cries for those better things that are to be.

O have you looked beneath your breast,
My soul?

Fear not, my soul, the darkness that appears,

The dreary stretches of the lonesome day;
Nor dread the anguish with its leaden tears;

The Hand that made you leads you all the way.

What light, love, peace by intellect was gained?

By hope we're comforted, by faith sustained!

The Peril Ahead.

God is not only behind us, He also goes before. He delivers from the perils that await us in the days ahead. The greatest of these is worry. Worry and work are often coupled together in our speech, but they are as far apart as the poles. Work builds up; Worry tears down. Work makes us sleep; Worry makes us sleepless. Work blesses us with satisfaction; Worry troubles us with discontent. Work makes us optimists; Worry changes us into pessimists. It is the enemy that besets us before.

There are three prevailing causes for worry. One is that our strength and resources will not be sufficient for what is before us. But God has said, "My grace is sufficient for thee and My strength is made perfect in thy weakness."

Again we worry lest we or those dependent on us should come to want. But David said, "I have been young and now am old and I have not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."

We worry over sickness and death and God has said, "When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee."

Around us as we march out to meet the coming days He has set a wall of promises which have been tried and tested and not found wanting and behind them we are safe.—Dr. S. N. Huchison.

Things That Cannot Fail.

When the anchors that faith have cast
Are dragging in the gale,
I am quietly holding fast
To the things that cannot fail.

I know that right is right;
That it is not good to lie;
That love is better than spite,
And a neighbor than a spy.
I know that passion needs
The leash of sober mind;
I know the generous deeds
Some sure reward will find.

That the rulers must obey;
That the givers shall increase;
That duty lights the way;
For the beautiful feet of Peace.

In the darkest night of the year,
When the stars have all gone out
That courage is better than fear,
That faith is truer than doubt.

And fierce though the fiends may fight,
And long though the angels hide,
I know that Truth and Right
Have the universe on their side.
—Washington Gladden.

"Glorious Way."

"Let us get rid of all this stupid sentimentality. We talk such a tremendous lot about military courage. The simple truth is that any normal man who can eat bacon and eggs for breakfast, and can sleep eight hours, can be trusted to be brave in battle. Yet the man who faces a machine gun with a laugh goes down like a ninepin before the simplest form of moral temptation. It is all bosh to put military courage before civil courage. A great deal of the courage in battle is not of the highest order at all. What we want today is the courage of moral conviction. I don't want to detract for a moment from the bravery of our men. I love them. But it was a great deal easier to face death in battle than it is to face ridicule in civil life. To suppose that all the men died glorious deaths is sheer sentimentality. I have seen them shivering with fright like trapped rabbits. Nothing will cover up the fact that war is a degrading, dirty, filthy business. We must simply refuse to be bamboozled by shams.

When I see the Guards marching down the streets in all their pomp and finery I am fed up to the back teeth with such nonsense. Are we to perpetuate among our children that idea of glory? I know the man underneath the bushy now. He is precisely the same sort of man as the man who makes my boots. He knows well enough there was more glory in the poor old stretcher-bearer, covered with mud and vermin, than in all this bombastic foolery. The men themselves saw through this bunkum. When the generals used to come saying, "Well, men, I am glad you have the chance of going into action and covering yourselves with glory," you could hear them groan sarcastically, "Oh, good God!"

I know no other glory than the glory of the crown of thorns. There is only one glory—the glory of service and sacrifice. The men who were glorious in the war were those here and there who suffered, yet remained hopeful, bright and cheery. We have really changed our God. We have ceased bowing down before a crowned person sitting on a great throne surrounded by a peaceful singing angels. There is no such person. He is dead—killed long ago. The God we worship is the God still suffering over the sorrows of humanity, the God with tears in His heart for the sorrows of this world—the God who is like Jesus Christ.—Rev. G. Studdert Kennedy.

In the Name of Jesus Christ.

In the name of Jesus Christ—
To whom the sea is as a drop of water,
And a flock of dust the land.
To whom the pinions of an eagle are as fan,
And the shadow of a mountain
as the shadow of His hand.

I asked for wings in the morning;
Plumed they were, like an eagle for a great ascent;
I asked for wings at night,
And they were folded like a flag
when the wind is spent.

I asked in the morning for power,
And it crashed like the tide of the sea over the reverberant floor;
In the evening I asked for peace,
And it rested like the shadow of a mountain upon a quiet shore.

For I asked in the name of Jesus Christ,
To whom the sheaves of shining stars
Are but a harvest ripe for reaping;
To whom the four winds of Heaven
Are but a lullaby for sleeping.
—Claudia Cranston in The Atlantic Monthly.

In the graveyard where the great astronomer Copernicus lies buried is an inscription on his tombstone which expresses his faith. It reads: "I crave not the favor which Paul received, nor the grace with which Thou didst pardon Peter. I crave only that grace which Thou didst bestow on the thief on the cross." How much more significant is that dependence of God's grace than the pompous words which a proud nation inscribed on a monument reared in his honor. He is there called the "mover of the earth and the establisher of the sun in the Heavens."—Selected.

For the Young Folks

The Boy of Nazareth.

O holy Boy of Nazareth,
Of all-surpassing grace,
Pain would we see Thy beauteous form
And gaze on Thy sweet face;
How perfect was Thy boyhood;
How lovely was Thy youth!
As silently there shone in Thee
All purity and truth.

O gentle Boy of Nazareth,
We gladly would behold
The cottage where Thy Mother-maid
And Joseph lived of old;
How happy they who daily
Beheld Thy loveliness,
Who saw Thee smile, and play and toil,
And in all virtue press.

O blessed Boy of Nazareth,
Though now we cannot see
Thy face within that lowly town
Of ancient Galilee;
Yet soon we hope to meet Thee
All beautiful above,
Robed in the light of kingly might,
The Lord of life and love.

O gracious Boy of Nazareth,
Dwell in our hearts we pray;
Teach us to love Thee more and more
And Thy blest will obey;
While walking in Thy footsteps
May we become like Thee,
And sing Thy praise throughout our days
And in eternity.

Why We Love Dolly Madison.

Part II.

It seems that every one who knew her, loved Dolly Madison, and over and over we read that it was not her beauty which won all hearts, but her kindness toward all whose lives touched hers. She was always unselfish and lovely. She had a terrible life-long sorrow too, which was hers to the last. Her son, Payne Todd, wasted his life. With every opportunity in the world to be a good and even a great man, he was a careless spendthrift and broke his mother's heart; he went through his own fortune and his mother's. James Madison paid his debts and when Mr. Madison died, Montpelier was finally sold to pay more debts. It is some satisfaction to know that at the last, when his beautiful mother had been dead three years, Payne Todd was filled with remorse. They tell us that Mrs. Madison's last words were "My poor boy!" She always hoped for and forgave him.

Until Dolly Madison died at the age of eighty-three, there were children who loved her devotedly even as she loved them. She was an old lady when she adopted a little niece, whose name was Anna Payne; and it was this merry child who grew up in the house known ever after as the Madison House, on Lafayette Square. This was after President Madison died and Dolly Madison could not endure the loneliness of beautiful Montpelier.

Little Anna from Kentucky was the daughter of Dolly Madison's brother. She was named for her Aunt Anna Cutts who had gone from our world four years before James Madison died. The child had lived with Mrs. Madison through some of the happiest and the very saddest days at Montpelier.

The Cutts children used to love to visit at Montpelier in the happy days, especially Mary and Dolly. These two, so we are told, used to write to President Madison from their home in Maine, and one day they made and sent him a little bead ring. The dignified President Madison not only wrote and thanked Mary and Dolly for his ring, but he wore it. In one of her letters to these dear children Mrs. Madison speaks of the ring:

Said she: "I see him looking at it every now and then, without saying anything."

These little girls and their brother never forgot the charms of Montpelier. Mrs. Upton says: "The house was full of treasures—books, precious manuscripts, medallions, miniatures and paintings, quaint silver and historic old-world furniture; the framed Declaration of Independence hung for a long time on the walls of Montpelier. Everything had its interesting associations out-of-doors and in; even the tiger lilies in the grass were growing from seed sent over by Lafayette."

Thomas Jefferson's children used to come over to play with Dolly and Mary Cutts and their brother, and many, many other boys and girls of those olden times in Virginia, were Dolly Madison's guests at Montpelier. Little Anna Payne knew them all, although they were no longer children with her.

When little Anna went to Washington to live in the house on Lafayette Square, she must have been glad that Aunt Dolly still loved the presence of many children and welcomed the grandchildren of her friends, who romped and played with her to their heart's content. It is a wonder little Anna wasn't spoiled, for we are assured by Mrs. Upton, "It is told that wherever this little Anna Payne appeared, no matter how grave the personages, or how important the topic they had been discussing, there immediately ensued a sound of laughter and great fun."

"Her pranks," Mrs. Upton continues, "were often those of the madcap sort, and she was no 'respector of persons'. Once, on the first of April, she invited a gentleman who was then President of the United States, to dine with her aunt and herself. She had the pleasure of sitting by the window and seeing his carriage drive to the door at the hour named. Going downstairs she beheld with joy the consternation of her adopted mother at having the President unexpectedly announced at dinner-time, and still more did she enjoy the privilege of rushing in and informing them both that it was April First!"

In the years that followed, Dolly Madison, with sweet Anna's help, endured sorrows and tribulations with dignified, cheerful patience. After Montpelier was sold to pay the debts of Payne Todd, there was little property left and Dolly Madison must have been penniless at the end, had not Congress purchased from her Mr. Madison's manuscripts. The twenty thousand dollars which she thus received was so placed that it could not be touched in any way by her son.

Anna Payne was married soon after Dolly Madison died, but lived only a few years more. One who knew her well, said of this sweet girl who cheered the closing years of Dolly Madison's life, "She was one of the purely unselfish persons with whom one may meet in a life-time."

In reading Dolly Madison's story, one fact illumines her life. She loved children and added to the happiness of their never-forgotten years. These children did what so few really great women expect them to do; they became in time persons of importance. Then they wrote in many a time-worn letter their precious memories of "Aunt Dolly," and it is these children, grown, who tell us exactly what this beautiful woman was like; how gay and happy and kind and good she was; how at receptions "she disliked nothing so much as loud talking or laughing"; how she won the love of all because she herself was the most gracious, loving and forgiving of mortals.

It is the children with whom she associated through her long life, to whom we owe our grateful thanks for our most vivid pictures of "Queen Dolly."—Frances Fox, in Presbyterian Banner.

Roses.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Roses are very dainty and delicate looking. Roses are the fine ladies of the gardens, the society ladies. They are exclusive. They like to live with themselves and other roses. They like very rich food and a great many baths. They must have their beauty sleep, too. So the branches are cut back. They do not want too much work. So the gardener takes off many of the buds. They do not use powder, but they have their little toilet preparations, not exactly the kind that society ladies usually like. Roses like kerosene spray, and whale-oil emulsion, and Bordeaux mixture, instead of cologne. And when roses begin to bloom they like some liquid fertilizer; this is their tonic.

Plants are like people. When they become very highly cultivated the Father in Heaven does much; but the gardener must do somewhat also. Little children's parents do a heap to make their little ones grow into useful men and women, but the children themselves must do somewhat to help, else they do not become what they should.

Did you ever see the eyes in the rose stalks? They are the little bumps on the stalk. These are the little windows for the new little leaves can peep out of when they are looking to see if it is warm enough to come out in the spring-time. Look hard at the little bumps. They may have tiny branches that are called grafts. That means that a slice has been taken off two rose trees. One is called the papa and the other is called the baby. The two cut surfaces are fitted together and tied as carefully as a doctor would bind a broken limb. Then the papa has to provide for the baby. All that he gets to eat from the soil goes to make the baby fat. Papa can have no pretty clothes; the child gets them all. Papa must just work, work, sending out roots, and finding something to eat. It is a hard life for papa! The child just lives doing nothing but grow big and look pretty until he can take care of himself.

But sometimes the papa forgets he has a child to care for. He thinks he would like to be pretty himself. So he uses up some of the baby's food. Then he sends up a shoot from below the graft. This is called a sucker. It must be cut off. If it were not, the graft (baby) would have but little to eat; for the papa is stronger. That is why, when planting, the graft is put down in the ground below the surface a little way. The papa cannot then breathe, so he cannot send up shoots. He does not need to breathe. He must just work and find food for the baby, that is all he is meant to do.

Dawn.

The golden sun comes up the sky
Through clouds of pearl and pink.
God must be glad to see how fair
His sunrise is, I think.

The green world's full of shining dew;
A wind walks in the trees.
I'm glad God put us here to watch
Bright summer days like these.

In Old Calabar.

The missionary's wife looked up from her letter home, and, because she hadn't been in Calabar very long, she started a little as she met the inquiring eyes of a little black girl, who stood bashfully on the verandah steps half hiding her face behind a bunch of flowers. The missionary's wife smiled. The little black girl showed very white teeth in a broad answering smile. "Come," said the white lady, holding out her hand; then, without waiting for a second invitation, the visitor's bare feet pattered across the verandah, and the flowers were laid in the new Ma's lap with a look that said as plain as print, "For you." How, the white lady wondered as she smiled and nodded her thanks for the flowers, was she to entertain this visitor, whose language she could not speak. Indoors the little girl's eyes wandered round the room, taking in all that they saw; her hostess could imagine how she would chatter when she got back to the village. "Don't I wish I could hear her describing us," she thought, "and understand it all." Pictures were produced, but the little face was grave and questioning. There was no way of explaining them, or of finding out how much she really saw in them. You boys and girls can have no idea what a meaningless blur even the simplest Bible picture is to untrained African eyes. Just at first sight they see no more in it than you would in their bush where they are so quick to distinguish bird and snake or the least sign of danger.

"A return present would be the thing," thought the missionary's wife. "Now what have I got that she would like and understand how to use? I know!" Quickly she opened the cupboard door, and took therefrom a large lump of white, glittering sugar. The little girl held out her hand for it eagerly enough, and stood solemnly contemplating it. Her new friend made the gesture of carrying food to her mouth, encouragingly—in vain. The bright eyes were very serious, even troubled. They turned upon the missionary's wife a look of intense reproach and disappointment. "Now, whatever is the matter?" thought the lady. Suddenly it flashed into her mind—"What was it some one said about their terror of being poisoned—that every Chief has 'tasters,' and Calabar people won't accept food until the host has eaten some of it himself to show that no harm is intended. Of course, it's that! Here, dear—" Nodding reassuringly, the amazing white lady took up the strange, shiny, beautifully white thing that she had laid on the small black palm, and bit off a tiny corner. Then she handed it back. What a change! The little girl laughed out merrily—pop went the sugar into a capacious mouth. Then, with a wild flourish of heels, she was gone—running home as hard as she could pelt to tell her companions in the village all about her adventure. The missionary's wife smiled as she set the table for supper.

"I had a visitor when you were out," she said, as she and her husband sat over the meal together. "I do want to get on quickly with the language, and be able to teach those boys and girls. I am sure we should soon be friends."

Her husband smiled at the story of the lump of sugar. Next day, while they worked at the language, and all was quiet, they heard a scuffling sound outside the door, the pit-pat of many little feet, and loud, exciting breathing. At last they opened the door. The verandah was crowded with dark-skinned boys and girls, each hugging a large bunch of flowers!

They had come to the place where the nice white sugar was!—Great-Heart.

What Happened to the Thirteenth Doll.

On Mary Jane's seventh birthday Aunt Elizabeth gave her a doll's bathtub, and of all the presents that Mary Jane received she liked her little bathtub best.

"Now I shall be able to give all my dolls a bath often," she said to Aunt Elizabeth. "Of course I shan't be able to bathe them all every day as I should do, because I have thirteen, and that is too many children to bathe every day. One day I shall give half of them a bath and the next day the other half."

Aunt Elizabeth smiled down at her little niece as if she had thought of something funny, but all she said was, "Don't you think that it will be rather hard to bathe half of thirteen children?"

Mary Jane's forehead puckered into a frown. She did not know what half of thirteen was. To be sure, mother had tried to teach her about fractions, but Mary Jane had not learned easily. To tell the truth, she had not tried very hard. After all, Mary Jane was only seven years old.

Suddenly an idea popped into her head, and she smiled at Aunt Elizabeth as if she had thought of something funny, but all she said was, "I don't think it will be hard, but I shall see."

Off she ran to the play room. All her dolls were together on the couch where she usually kept them.

"I shall find out how many half of you is," said Mary Jane.

She lifted one doll and put it on one side of the couch and then she lifted another and put it on the other side of the couch and so on until she had as many dolls on one side as on the other end and only one doll left.

How Mary Jane laughed! She ran back to Aunt Elizabeth as fast as she could run, laughing very hard all the time.

"Oh!" she said. "I see now. When you take half of thirteen you have one left. What shall I do?"

"Why don't you bathe six dolls one day and seven the next?" asked Aunt Elizabeth.

But Mary Jane did not like that idea. Besides, since the thirteenth doll was the largest and bathing her would take more time than bathing any of the others, it did not seem quite fair to bathe her on the seven dolls' day. Mary Jane thought about it for some time.

Besides, Kitty, which was the name of the thirteenth doll, was not only larger than any of the other dolls, but was made differently. She was made of papier-mache, and that gets dirty much faster than china. Mary Jane thought that Kitty would have to be scrubbed a great deal harder.

She was discouraged that night when she went to bed, but she decided to wash the seven dolls on the first day and Kitty was to be the first doll that she washed.

So in the morning at bath time she put Kitty into the tub and scrubbed her hard. All the dust and stains and dirt began to come off Kitty, but some of the skin began to come off too. In fact Kitty suddenly began to soften all over, and before Mary Jane knew what was happening she didn't have any thirteenth doll at all. Even poor Kitty's bones had softened until you would think that she had no bones. In fact, if you had a bowl of mush and a tub of Kitty, you wouldn't be able to tell which was mush and which was Kitty except by the color and the taste, maybe.

Poor Mary Jane did not know what in the world to do.

"Kitty," she cried, "that's not the way to behave when you take a bath!"

But what had once been Kitty paid not the slightest attention.

"Aunt Elizabeth," cried Mary Jane, "Aunt Elizabeth!"

But Aunt Elizabeth had gone for a walk that beautiful summer morning and so of course could not hear her little niece calling her. When she came back she went into the play room where the little bathtub was kept to see how the bathing was getting along. When she opened the door she saw a little girl on the floor with her head in her hands, crying as if her heart would break.

"Why, Mary Jane, dear, what can be the matter?" asked Aunt Elizabeth. She ran to the little girl and lifted her in her arms, and Mary Jane sobbed out the story of poor Kitty.

Aunt Elizabeth rocked her in her lap and talked about the birds that she had heard singing in the trees that morning and about the flowers that she had seen all along the way, and by and by Mary Jane felt better.

She sat up and dried her eyes and smiled her prettiest smile. "Now I can bathe half the dolls one day and half the next, and that is a better plan anyway."

"Aren't you glad," said Aunt Elizabeth, "that it is the thirteenth instead of one of the others that is gone?"

Mary Jane frowned a wee little puzzled frown and thought for a whole minute before she said anything at all. Then she looked at Aunt Elizabeth and smiled. "It wouldn't make any difference which doll it was," she said. "There would still be an even number left, and you can always divide an even number evenly!"

Then Mary Jane and Aunt Elizabeth looked at each other in a very wise way, as if they had found out a great deal and shared a delightful and important secret. After that Jane had no more trouble in bathing half of her dolls at a time.—Youth's Companion.

Some Curious Clocks.

The oldest clock still running is in the Cathedral of St. Petersburg, England. It was made by a Monk in 1320, and is the only clock now known that is wound up over a wooden wheel. The first cuckoo clock was made by a Swiss about two centuries ago. A remarkable clock was made by a clockmaker in the Black Forest many years ago. It shows the seasons, years and leap-years, to the last second of the year, 99,999; besides a host of astronomical, geographical and historical facts.

There is a famous clock in the Cathedral at Strasburg, Germany. It represents the denial of Christ by the Apostle Peter. There are figures representing Christ and the twelve Apostles, which go through a certain ceremony every day at noon. All of the Apostles, except St. Peter, greet their Lord and Master. After St. Peter has refused to acknowledge Him, a door opens and a cocks appears and crows.

Of quaint and curious clocks the United States has few examples. But the largest clock in the world is in the City Hall, Philadelphia. It is three hundred and fifteen feet above the pavement, and the dial is twenty-five feet in diameter. The hour hand is nine feet long. The bell weighs more than twenty pounds, and an engine is used to wind the clock.—Selected.

MRS. MARY LEWIS ANDERSON MCGHEE

MRS. MARY LEWIS ANDERSON MCGHEE, widow of John W. McGhee, died at the home of Mrs. James A. Fishburne, Waynesboro, Virginia, August 14, 1924. She was born at Pantops, near Charlottesville, January 1, 1842.

Mrs. McGhee is survived by one daughter, Miss Mary Walker McGhee, who is now with Mrs. Fishburne, at Waynesboro.

By birth, by nature and by environment Mrs. McGhee possessed that beautiful charm which so enriched her generation that it may be fairly characterized as a period of glory in the life of womanhood. Such a life is a veritable guiding star to which one may point with pride and with confidence, and as an example worthy of perpetual emulation.

Mrs. McGhee for twenty years filled the position of matron at the Fishburne Military School, Waynesboro. She was a noble mother to all and her saintly character and gentle cheerfulness sweetened and brightened the atmosphere of the whole school home. Her character radiantly reflected the holy life of Him whom she delighted to proclaim as God's dear Son and her Saviour. Thus a good woman became a benediction to the plastic life of the great number of boys who came and went. To all she was a friend.

The inadequate tribute here given would be still less complete if I should fail to record Mrs. McGhee's devotion to her church. She was one of the founders and supporters of St. John's Church, Waynesboro. As long as she was physically able she attested her loyalty by her presence at church. The writer—her former rector, who so loves and honors her memory—will ever hold sacred her consecrated, willing and unflinching cooperation. What a loss to those who knew her and to the Church! But to her and to Heaven itself what a gain!

RESOLUTIONS.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM M. ARCHER.

Profoundly sensible of the loss which the vestry and congregation of St. Thomas Church have sustained in the death of Captain William M. Archer, who died in his eighty-eighth year at his home on the Hermitage Road, on the morning of the 26th day of August, 1924, the Vestry desire to record a tribute to his memory.

Captain Archer became a member of St. Thomas Church in 1910. Was elected to the Vestry in the same year and served as senior warden for fourteen years. He had always a lively interest in the work of the diocese and attended many of its councils. At St. Thomas his faithfulness and zeal in the extension of Christ's Kingdom will remain a constant inspiration to all; his courage an example of true Christian living.

Wherefore, be it resolved, that in honor to his memory, this resolution be placed upon the records of the Church and read before the congregation, a copy be sent to his family, and copies sent for publication to the Southern Churchman, the Virginia Churchman and the News Leader.

A Tribute.

The success of the Church is in those great men who in their lives and characters approach the ideal that we have in the life and philosophy of Jesus Christ.

Those men who profoundly affect the lives of others by their sincerity, and grace, and goodness.

Such a man was TARTON FLEMING HEATH, who died at his home on Westover Avenue, Petersburg, Virginia, July 25, 1924.

He was born in Goochland County November 30, 1860, the son of the late Jesse Hartwell Heath, of Petersburg, Captain and Assistant Adjutant General of the Confederate Army, and his wife Sarah Eleanor Fleming, of Goochland County.

He was educated in the public schools of Petersburg and at the famous University School, of which Captain W. Gordon McCabe was head master.

In 1887 he married Miss Rosa Gilmour

Arrington, of Warrenton, North Carolina, who survives him, with the following children: Jesse Hartwell and Tarton Fleming Heath, of Petersburg, and Mrs. William Lunsford Long, of Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina. He is also survived by one sister, Miss Jane Rives Heath, of St. Timothy's School, Catonsville, Maryland.

For more than a generation Captain Heath was prominent in the social, commercial and religious life of the city.

At the time of his death he was a member of the Vestry and Junior Warden of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, of which he has been a devoted and zealous member since his boyhood.

The duties of the various positions of trust he occupied were performed with singular fidelity and ability, and always with a prevailing spirit of courtesy.

Kindliness was inwoven with his frame.

He exemplified in his life those graces and virtues that strength and beauty, which mark that highest of human ideals, the Christian gentleman.

That which might appear unmeaning flattery to those who knew him not, seems faint praise enough to those who knew this noble man with clean hands and a heart of gold. A son and brother, thoughtful and affectionate. A husband and father, loyal and loving. A friend, steadfast and true. A citizen, patriotic and progressive. A Christian after the pattern of his Master.

In all the affairs of life, he played the man, broad and large hearted, and has left to posterity a priceless legacy—the memory of a well spent life. Living upon a high plane, manly and straightforward in his intercourse with his fellows, he hated with all the serenity of a knightly soul, all trickery, double dealing and hypocrisy.

His life was gentle, and the elements so mixt in him, that Nature might stand up and say to all the world, "This was a man."

Betje's Kitten.

Johanna's little klompen clattered down the street until she came to her home. Of course, Johanna's little blue-stocking feet were in those little klompen, and very dutifully they slipped out when they reached the red and green and white tiling that led up to the steps of her house, just as all little Dutch feet have been taught to do for years and years and years.

Johanna picked up the little wooden shoes and climbed the freshly scrubbed steps. She placed her little klompens on the top step and went in.

Her little baby sister, Betje, tiny, roly-poly, and pink-cheeked, pounded on the wooden tray of the queer little wooden chair she was fastened into, and her little fat cheeks stretched with the smile she gave when she saw her.

Johanna unfastened the little door that held Betje in her chair, and baby Betje toddled over to the huge fireplace. The smile faded from her little face as she pointed to an empty basket that stood upon the hearth, and a big tear filled each blue eye. "Pues, pues," she said and shook her head. "Pues," was the way baby Betje said "kitty" in Dutch.

JACOB AND THE ANGEL.

of time, and to make us citizens of an eternal world.

This is not a work which can be done in a day. Already we see man subjected to a certain extent to this spiritualizing process, but at war with his intellect and bound by instincts and appetites inherited from an illimitable past. His animality demands one form of expression. Social laws and requirements insist on modifying it, and demand at least a certain outward conformity and standard of conduct. Spirituality demands a profounder and a more inward change, that the whole man, in his inmost thought and heart's desire, be brought into conformity with the highest ideal of goodness. "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time—but I say unto you"—such is its injunction.

So begins the great struggle of life in which he who subjects the spiritual to the animal is defeated, and he who subjects the physical to the spiritual gains the victory. Intellect without spirituality is but a monster which may at any time annihilate progress. Intellect at war with spirituality is dissociation of our highest faculties—which paralyzes us and works fearful havoc. We have witnessed the greatest example of this which the world has ever seen in the war. In one of his most philosophical books, "The Magic Skin," Balzac draws for us a sombre picture of the conflict of the different elements of our nature. He represents Raphael, as Goethe represented Faust, as a man of the highest intellect in order to show that intellect, in itself, is no safeguard against the temptations of our lower nature any more than it is a safeguard against suicide, but that men of intellect are peculiarly exposed to such temptations, and that intellect and egotism form a particularly dangerous combination.

Raphael, after years of poverty and hardship, honorably borne, is famishing for pleasure. He finds his opportunity in the gift of the Magic Skin from the old antiquary, which has power to grant his every wish, but, with each gratification the skin shrinks and the end of the skin is the end of his life. No sooner is he in possession of this talisman than he dares not use it, for to such a man death is the worst of evils. Having power to gratify every desire he loses all capacity for enjoyment. He cannot even afford the luxury of a good action, for this, too, causes the skin to contract. Do we not see that the wages of sin is death? He was conqueror only as far as he was able to repress every desire, good as well as bad, for every desire yielded to brought him nearer death. His futile attempts to get rid of the skin, to lose it, to expand it again by the aid of the greatest men of science, only show that the laws of cause and effect cannot be broken. At last love, in its purest, loveliest form is offered to him, but it comes too late. When he loves Pauline for her sake the skin does not contract and deliriously he thinks he is saved. But as soon as, in accordance with his nature, he loves her for his own sake, and as the minister of his pleasure, death is at the door.

This, in the opinion of two such observers as Goethe and Balzac, is what it is to lose our soul. It is to subject it to the senses until the spiritual gives up the struggle and ceases to exist for us. The essence of pleasure lies in receiving, not in giving, while the life of the soul lies in action and in service. Therein lies woman's great superiority to man. Woman's power is spirituality. She is more directly in contact with the divine and we must receive this gift from her, and she spiritualizes all she gives us. She knows the blessedness of giving for its own sake, and we must learn the lesson of purity, unselfishness and love from her and through her. What a man is able to discern in woman and to appropriate from her is the highest test of his spirituality, and I sometimes think with Renan that the final judgment we shall all undergo in the great valley of Jehoshaphat will be but the echo of the judgment pronounced on us in silence by the women who have loved us.

"All things temporal
Are but as symbols sent.
Earth's insufficiency
Here draws to event
The indescribable,
Here it is done,
The woman soul leadeth us
Upward and on."

These are the last words of Goethe's wisdom.

MEN WHO TITHE.

dence and energy raises the question whether their success was due to these qualities mainly and whether they could not have succeeded eventually without tithing.

"But, still, their belief, considered by itself, does present an element of mysticism, and this belief was doubtless strengthened by their putting it into action; had they merely entertained it as an abstract conviction it would never have impressed them so deeply.

"In the case of the Oklahoma oil man, however, we must recognize a distinction. Finding profitable oil wells, as far as I know, is largely a matter of chance. If that is the case, granted to the finder a certain knowledge of geology, the finder's natural energy and self-reliance would be of relatively little importance.

"There are missing factors, of course, the absence of which prevents our reaching an accurate conclusion. We should hear from those oil men who did not tithe and did not share the tither's belief as to divine partnership and who, nevertheless, were remarkably successful in striking oil; also, we should hear from sincere tithers, if any, who sought for oil and usually missed it. And, as to business men generally, we lack the testimony of the honest tithers who have not prospered in a material way. In New England, where I was reared, the ministers habitually advocated tithing as a duty. I have no doubt that many persons of slender means were there induced to adopt the practice and that not all of these persons attained material prosperity.

"But men are not inclined to talk about their failures. It is practically impossible to supply these absent factors and hence any precise solution of the problem—the effect of tithing on the tither—can hardly be expected."

That's the nearest I could come to securing from science an explanation of the stories of success which smiling-faced business men have laid before me within recent weeks.

I presented this explanation to a business man who tithes.

"Yes," he said, "that sounds all right. But you know there are other successes than money ones. I've got something more than money out of tithing; it's given me happiness and contentment that I never could have bought. Suppose some of the New England families who tithed did not succeed financially? Could science measure the contentment which these families might have through knowing that God was a partner in home affairs?"

Tithing means giving one tenth of income.

Most of the business men mentioned in this article ceased "tithing" some time ago. Now they give far more than one tenth.

"Tithing is the minimum that your partner expects from you," said one eminently successful man. "That's only good interest. 'I've been trying to use half of my income in His affairs lately. That's full partnership."

Johanna looked at the empty basket. It was kitty's own basket that big brother Kasper had brought home for the little black kitten to sleep in. Usually when Johanna came home from school kitty was fast asleep in it, but today she wasn't there.

"Don't cry, Betje, I will find her," said Johanna, and she went all over the house calling "Kitty," but no kitty appeared.

"I think she ran out when the baker came," said mother. "She is probably waiting at the door to come in." Johanna ran to the back door, but there was no black kitty there. It was getting dark and chilly, and the night wind had begun to blow.

Johanna put baby Betje back into her little wooden chair and fastened her in. "I will go down the street and look for her," she said.

She went to the door and opened it. The firelight gleamed out into the darkness and shone on her little klompen standing just where she had placed them. She bent to get them to slip on and started back with a frightened cry, for from one of them gleamed two bright green lights. Then she heard a tiny "mieow."

How Johanna laughed. It was the little black kitten. He had run away and then crept back home. The door was shut, and he could not get in, so as it was chilly in the darkness he had crept into the little shoe to keep warm.

How glad baby Betje was to see him, and she hugged him tight and shared her bread and milk with him.

Long after the black kitten was too big to get in the wooden shoe baby Betje would still look for him there. But now she knows better, for she is a baby no longer. And the kitten is now a big black cat, not only too big for Johanna's shoe, but too big for his own basket and almost too big for Betje to carry.—Selected.

THE angels of the Lord are ever found
Encamped about the soul that looks to Him:
They are an inner lamp when all is dim Without
Even as a myriad sunbeams hour by hour
Melt to make rich one little summer flower;
Or as a myriad souls of flowers fleet
Away to make a single summer sweet—
So many spirits make one smile of God
That feeds your life transfiguring from its clod.

Education and Religion

"Education and religion are absolutely essential to true democracy," states a Bishop of the Church; and he adds: "It has been the province of Hobart College to blend the two to a remarkable degree."

That fact is the basis of Hobart's strong appeal to students who come from homes in which a definite religious atmosphere has been maintained. Hobart, ever since its founding, has recognized the value of religion to its students and has always given them ample facilities for the exercise of their religious instincts.

It is not surprising that many students, after entering Hobart, seek affiliation with the Church; nor is it surprising that nearly four hundred Hobart graduates have been ordained to the Protestant Episcopal Ministry.

Applications for admission to the 103rd class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Power, to its last particle, is duty.

"Ye are My witnesses," saith the Lord. "This honor have all His saints."

Many could pray better if they would first do better.

I do the little that I can

And leave the rest to Thee.

Don't mind criticism. If it is untrue, disregard it; if it is unfair, keep from irritation; if it is ignorant, smile; if it is justified, learn from it.

Balzac, in "The Alchemist," in depicting an ideally perfect love, makes the object of it deformed, thus indicating that love is not at its height and perfection without the element of pity.—T. T. Munger.

Live for God and humanity! then eternal realities will loom up, vast and grand, and the petty playthings of society, and worldly business and pleasure, will only occupy their proper place.

The Lord's answers to prayer are infinitely perfect, and eternity will show that often, when we were asking for a stone that looked like bread, He was giving us bread that to our shortsightedness looked like a stone.

True self-control is not negative—the mere holding of oneself back in restraint from the evil, but the complete mastery of one's powers for positive achievement in good, for the largest and finest expression of oneself in action.

The inspired writers give Him all the titles of the Most High God. They call him over and over by the uncommunicable name Jehovah, never given to any creature. They ascribe to Him all the attributes and all the works of God. So that we need not scruple to pronounce Him God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; in glory equal with the Father, in majesty co-eternal.—John Wesley.

In ordinary vernacular speech the word temperance is usually limited to the narrow significance of temperance in drink. A gracious gift sufficiently divine to be considered the top and crown of spiritual experience must, by the logical necessity of the case, be a gift of ampler scope than the restraint of any single, bodily appetite. The Greek word used by St. Paul is a large and broad word: a word of great power: a word which denotes the mighty holding of one's self in temperance, in the inspired Pauline sense, therefore, is synonymous with self-control.—Bishop Diggle.

PETER'S LADDER

One day, when we were studying the life of Christ, it suddenly flashed into our mind that what Christ was trying to do for us was to show the laws of our own being. He revealed in His own life the nature of God's being, and then said: "God is your Father. You are kin to Him, and were meant to be like Him." This is the Gospel. The Christian life is taking Christ at His word. To believe that you are kin to God opens a new world of hope and adventure—as St. Paul says, it makes you "a boy or girl again in the spirit of your mind." Peter says the same thing. If you would realize your divine nature, the means are ready to your hand. First of all, you have got to believe in Christ sufficiently to test His promises. We talk about the promises of Christ. The word is unfortunate; for it obscures the very truth it tries to reveal. When you promise a trembling little child that the big stone lion crouching on the steps of a public building will not hurt him, you are only telling him what you know to be a fact. What you are giving him is knowledge; and if you have been fair to your child, your promise will be to him a revelation of fact. Christ has been fair to us, and His promises are always such revelations.

St. Peter is perhaps the most interesting of the apostles—eager, able, outspoken, eloquent, loving, vain. His vanity and a too sensitive dread of what people thought, let the sneer of a servant girl make him deny his Lord, and threatened to spoil his whole life. But Jesus would not let him go, and Peter's struggle back to manhood is one of the finest things in history. It is this struggle to find one's real self, to realize one's divine nature, that he is describing here. The first thing, he says, that is necessary is an honest, serious purpose. You have got to be in earnest if you wish to find out the laws of your being; and you have got to train yourself for the task. In your faith there must be virtue. Virtue is the sum of those qualities of which honor, fair dealing, purity, endurance, fair-mindedness form the series.

The language and literature of to-day are cluttered up with talk about complexes. The whole furor is an amazing thing. Whatever of truth there is in it all is written large in the New Testament. "The pure in heart shall see God"—and the converse, "The impure shall not," are laws of man's own being. The unforgiving heart shall never know peace in this world, is a truth we learned in the Lord's Prayer. The covetous mind is the seed-bed of cruelty, is an axiom of Christ's teaching. Fear is caused by turning away from the light of the Father's face and groping in the dark where suspicion, which heeds no argument and rejects evidence, loves to dwell. 'Tis a difficult thing to pass through a single day without a stain upon the life. Physical untidiness is often the mark of the beginning of degeneracy. You would not leave upon the body either the soiled garments or the stains of toil or play. It is the stains of yesterday that spoil the coming day. "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath," is not mere counsel of perfection. It is the revelation of the fact that harbored resentment warps the mind and eats like a canker in the brain.

It is a man's duty to think. St. Paul says he prayed every day that his people should increase in knowledge. Nature teaches us that the best fruit and the fairest flowers are on this year's growth. The faith of our fathers, if it had any worth at all, consisted in the fact that they heard the voice of the living God speaking to their experience, and in obedience went out not knowing whither. Faith is the willingness to put all that we know on board and to set sail for the unknown continent. Heine wrote: "Men sought an earthly India and found America. They now seek a spiritual India. What will they find?" It is man's privilege today to study spiritual geography, for the known always creates the yearning for more knowledge still.

The next rung of the ladder is self-control. The value of an engine is estimated not by its power, but by its means of control. The big Mogul locomotive would be worse than useless without the breaks. There are plenty of strong men in the world. The only ones who are of any value to the race are those who are masters of their strength.

Patience comes next: When Keppler discovered the fact that the planets moved in an elliptical orbit, his brother scientists made mock of his discovery. One of Keppler's friends went to condole with him. When he began to express his regret, Keppler smiled and said: "The ridicule does not worry me. If God waited 6,000 years for Keppler to find out this truth, surely Keppler ought to have patience enough to wait a generation." We are children of the patient God.

The next step upwards is not godliness, as the word is translated both in the King James and Revised Version—for if we had attained to godliness we could go no higher. The word means the religious spirit, and the essence of that spirit is prayer. The value of prayer in the congregation makes selfishness impossible. The healing and creative words of prayer are "we" and "our." It is these words that lift us to the next rung, the love of the brethren. Hospitality is a primary Christian virtue. The hospitality of the parish-house kind is at best a poor substitute for that of the home. Were it a necessary substitute, its only value consists in the opportunity it affords to share our best without grudging and without patronage.

Love is the topmost rung. To our mind Bishop Martensen's words furnish an adequate test of the presence of love in the heart: "Love only exists where one who might live for himself wills to live in and for others."

A MISSION FIELD AT HOME

Has the Church sufficient provision to care for its members and others who might become members at your State University or nearest large college?

Now that the trial of the two young Chicago murderers is all over, their sentence pronounced and executed, and that they have begun the monotonous round of a life term in the Illinois penitentiary, we cannot be accused of sensationalism in making this incident the subject for some editorial comment of a nature wherein the Church has a serious part to play.

It was admitted that these two youths were above the average in intelligence, and that their intellects had been highly developed along the lines of modern education. It is just this fact that should give our churches cause to pause, and to ask themselves if they have contributed their share—or any share at all—to a course of instruction that terminates in a foul murder followed by life imprisonment.

Of course no one should think for a second that Leopold and Loeb are either typical or representative of the student body of the University of Chicago; nevertheless they had had the benefit of being members of that group, and that privilege seemed to exert no influence whatever toward the prevention of a deed which might have been committed by a pair of ignorant thugs.

"The education of the youth is the foundation of the State," is a maxim that may be read on many a high school building throughout our country. In the face of such an incident as this, is it not time to begin to qualify that sentence and to ask the question, "What kind of an education?"

The Los Angeles Times is moved to exclaim in an editorial:

"What avails chemistry without character? What use has mathematics without manhood? Who can trust the sharp mentality of a moral idiot? We have all had our pity stirred by Dr. Hale's story of 'The Man Without a Country,' but the man without a conscience is worse.

Wanted: Schools that teach the essential worth of the human soul. Wanted: Colleges that put first in importance conscience and character. Wanted: Universities that regard great souls as of more importance than great sprinters. The citizens who support these educational institutions have the moral, the financial and the civil right to expect from them 'first things first.' Real people are getting tired of education, so called, that stops short of the real thing. An education that stops short of conscience, character and courageous citizenship is not the real thing. It is even a dangerous thing. The duller the knife in the hands of a fool the better. It is dangerous to furnish an idiot with a loaded gun. Let the guardians and the conservators of our Christian American civilization beware of the educated moral idiot and of any institution that fosters conditions to produce him—or her."

If a secular daily newspaper is so impressed by this tragic incident, how much more is it the duty of our religious press to take note of it?

Of course we all know that the teaching of religion in the public school system, which includes our State universities, is not permissible as a part of the compulsory curriculum, but there are ways whereby the Church can reach the student body with its influence, if it has the right equipment.

Most of our Protestant bodies have recognized this, and are rapidly making proper provision in church buildings and parish halls, and by appointing student pastors, men who have special qualifications by reason of their age, and temperaments for reaching the young men in attendance at the universities.

In order to answer the question with which we begin this discussion, it should be recognized from the beginning that the local congregation in a college town is very seldom strong enough to erect the kind of buildings that are needed to do this sort of work effectively.

The most popular and energetic college rector cannot do what the Church ought to do for our young men in these circumstances if a transformed class room has to be substituted for a chapel, as has been the case at the University of Illinois, or if the building used is ugly and unattractive, and not nearly large enough to accommodate all the men who would like to attend, as is the case at the University of Virginia.

At Chapel Hill, in North Carolina, a wealthy citizen has recognized the strategic value of the situation and has contributed one hundred thousand dollars to the enlargement of the church there, and its proper equipment with a parish house for the accommodation and entertainment of the students of the University of North Carolina.

Why cannot more of our well-to-do churchmen see the vision and grasp the fact that any place where there are from one to five thousand young people gathered together for intellectual development offers a real missionary field, and a challenge to the Church that is just as big and compelling as anything in foreign lands?

This situation is an appeal to every religious body, but it is especially applicable to the Episcopal Church. It is a well-known fact that our breadth of view, our form of service appeals more particularly to the educated mind. Indeed, this very condition is a serious handicap to our work among the more unsophisticated; then why not grasp the opportunity when it is a real asset?

There is nothing local about this problem. It exists in every community where there are large secular educational institutions in small towns. Not only should the Diocese recognize it as a responsibility, but we believe it is of sufficient importance to have the attention of the National Council. The same sort of machinery should be employed in every case throughout the country. Lists of the alumni who are churchmen, and of means, could be compiled in a central office for the University of Michigan or the University of Alabama using the bound paper volumes in which every such institution keeps records of its graduates, and the further necessary clerical work could be performed by one staff for a number of colleges with the same typewriters and addressographs.

College fraternities are continually building new "frat houses." They organize this appeal to include men long graduated. Only the other day a young woman who was taking a summer course and rooming temporarily in one of these houses, remarked, "It is a coincidence I am in the house belonging to father's fraternity, and he made a payment to its building fund just the other day." That "father" had been out of college for more than a quarter of a century.

Let the Church be wise enough to organize the alumni of universities and colleges for its proper equipment to carry on its work with aggressive efficiency in these institutions so that they may be training grounds for the soldiers of Christ to prepare them for their spiritual careers as well as for the battle of life.

A GREAT LEADER PROMOTED

The death of Dr. Silas McBee, which occurred at his home in Charleston, S. C., early this month, has deprived the Church and the world of one of those leaders who possessed true vision. Although he was not a clergyman, Dr. McBee was a preacher—a preacher of the great cause of unity among God's people. In the days, when, as editor of The Churchman (from 1896 to 1912), Dr. McBee wrote much on this subject, it was not so popular as it is today. At that time no modification had been made by the General Convention to the "closed pulpit" canon, and union services were neither so frequent nor so popular as they are today.

Later, when he established the Constructive Quarterly, he carried on with greater concentration his work for Christian unity. It is a matter of gratification that he lived to see the great strides made toward the goal he so longed for.

FROM ATLANTIC TO SALT LAKE---A GLIMPSE OF THE CHURCH

By the Reverend James Sheerin

UPPER New York State is a section of America a little more typical of the best than other districts, for it seems to have within itself much of the solidity of character as well as intelligent democracy of the better West, with a liberal share of the supposedly superior culture of the East. Speaking from the standpoint of the Episcopal Church, the whole State is pre-eminently a sort of paradise, so far as numbers and wealth go. There is within the borders of New York State almost one-fourth of the Episcopalians of the United States. In the city of New York there is about one-tenth, with a ratio, in spite of its overwhelming foreign population, of about one communicant in thirty inhabitants. As the train carries the passenger North and West it passes through handsome little cities like Poughkeepsie, with its extraordinary proportion of one communicant in eighteen inhabitants; Albany, with one in thirty-five; Syracuse, one in forty; Rochester and Buffalo, one in about forty-five to fifty. Some of the other smaller cities vie with Poughkeepsie in ratio of Episcopalians, and small towns, which further West or in New England would scarcely know the Episcopal Church, have parishes in size equal to the best in other sections of America. The strange thing is how the ratio drops off after New York State is left. In Cleveland it is about one in one hundred. Detroit is better, with about one in ninety; helped possibly by the proximity of Canada, but, after that, the Church grows weaker until in Chicago there is scarcely one communicant in one hundred and fifty people, and the smaller towns are as often without as with communicant lists or church buildings.

Of course the traveler does not see these statistics from his car window, but it is easy to compare official reports in the United States census and Church almanacs, and a few hours' stop with a glance about the streets for church buildings gives one a fair idea of the relative material strength of a denomination. At best, it is more or less approximate in estimate, and leaves much to be imagined as to the spiritual intelligence behind the external evidences.

On the way West Denver may be made the more important starting point, so as to avoid the criticism of not knowing just where the West begins! Davenport, Iowa, on the western bank of the Mississippi, makes a very plausible claim to being the real gateway of the West. Further down, Kansas City is sure that it is the right starting point, as it surely was for many pioneers in pre-war times. An interesting contrast is made between St. Louis and Kansas City, one being called eastern in its tastes and tendencies, one other western. But when you get to Denver, there is a rather startling readiness to speak of travel to Kansas City and Omaha as "going East," as of course it literally is. To this way of thinking Davenport, handsome and cultured, but weak in Episcopal churchmanship, is altogether out of the reckoning as a Western centre, or even as a gateway to the actual West.

Denver is an exceptional city in many ways. Its setting of expansive prairies coming up to its eastern doors and a hundred mile stretch of gigantic Rocky Mountains on its western borders, has given it a glory that, as far as nature goes, is not unlike that of ancient Rome, standing superb between the plains of the Campagna and the shining Alban hills. Besides this great natural advantage, Denver began with wealth enough to build better than other cities, and today there is at its heart the making of a community centre unsurpassed, with its museum, its outdoor theatre, its amphitheatre, etc. Denver would be an ideal capital of North America because of "the lay of the land" on which it stands, and because of its extraordinary geographical situation. It has other capital qualifications as a metropolis. From the first, influenced in part by an unusually cultured element coming there in search of health, and in part by the proximity of awe-inspiring scenery, Denver has always been more religious, artistic and educational in its ideals than most other Western cities. It has had powerful preachers in the Protestant ministry, men who could not only preach unusually well, but who were well read and were world characters in other than worldly ways. Among these was the late H. Martyn Hart, Dean of the Cathedral, and a man of great brilliance of intellect as well as bigness of soul. His eccentricities were made much of, such as riding a horse while wearing a Prince Albert coat and silk hat, or attacking the public schools as godless places while he himself refused to become a citizen. These oddities never seemed to reduce his value as a spiritual leader, as they might if he had been a lesser man. He was distinguished in looks as well as utterance. A thorough believer in the value of the Protestant Reformation, a scholar of the highest British university training, he openly scorned "priestcraft" and all its ways, and crowded his cathedral night and morning with thousands eager to hear his eager messages.

It is a fact that men of letters or of dramatic reputation were glad to spend their days in Denver, finding in it something akin to their own love of refined atmosphere. What they found there could hardly be called Eastern, nor was it altogether Western. Like every other Western city, it had elements of both, the Eastern and the English being a little more evident in Denver than elsewhere. It may be somewhat fanciful, but it does not seem altogether improbable that the difference was embodied to a degree in the Tabor Grand Opera House, now changed to a "movie." The man who provided the money for the building was an overnight millionaire whose career is one of the most picturesque in mining history. Great actors and singers gave longer seasons there than was usual outside New York in the eighties and nineties. On its drop curtain there were painted some classic ruins, with Kingsley's haunting words inscribed below:

"So fleet the works of men, back to the earth again; Ancient and holy things fade like a dream."

Is it beyond at least artistic reason to imagine that seeing these lines night after night by thousands of theatre-goers had something to do with creating a generation who desired a city of the soul as much as they did a great commercial capital?

There is of course something of ecclesiastical caddishness in the claim, but there is reason to assert that it is in just such a cosmopolitan environment the Episcopal Church has its best chance, if properly presented. That it did grow in Denver to a fair degree of strength greater than in Milwaukee, Chicago, Kansas City or Omaha, is in part traceable to such influences.

Among the more immediate causes of this relatively greater strength in Denver, I shall name three interesting features. Strong religious personalities always bring strength to a church out of proportion to the membership lists. Phillips Brooks influenced the public of Massachusetts towards the Episcopal Church in a greater sense than could be estimated by the congregations assembling in Trinity, Boston. In spite of all his enemies, or the satire heaped upon his words and deeds, it is probable that Dean Hart had more to do with putting Denver upon the ecclesiastical map during its first half century than all other religious forces combined. This was felt in the city as well as in all its adjacent territory, and there was not a clergyman or an informed layman in any part of the country who did not know of and frequently admire this Colorado cathedral and character builder. Next to the intrepid dean I should place the little woman who was wife of one Bishop and mother of another. In the cathedral crypt, for practically as long a time as the dean preached upstairs, Mrs. Spalding carried on a young men's Bible class. It was always large in numbers, one of the largest in the whole Episcopal Church, and its graduates provided an intelligent spiritual backbone for Western Episcopalianism that few cities could approach. It was one of those modest religious works which are like the kingdom of God that cometh without observation; and for this reason was widespread and permanent. There were other clergy who had their influence for the Church, such as one popularly known as "Charlie" Marshall, who, in spite of his extreme "Catholicity," had been a man amongst men for the whole history of Denver, and had experiences with miners and cowboys that would make a stirring book of Western adventure.

The third great cause probably lies in the kind of people who came to Denver in the eighties and nineties of the last century. The pioneers who flocked there were not the rougher, more venturesome type; but were the thousands from what are usually called "the better classes" of Eastern people, i. e., men and women of a fair degree of education and refinement who as often as not, from reasons of health in themselves, or in some beloved member of the family, sought residence in the high and dry climate of Colorado. Among these the Episcopalian element was prominent, and some of them, English or Eastern, were loyal enough to help establish at least one strong church in the cathedral. In the midst of this influx of intelligent Church people was a Bishop "high" enough to be ardent in holding his own, and shrewd enough to acquire property, even when it did not seem to be immediately necessary. The Senior Bishop Spalding had lots of land in Denver by the hundred, and the left-handed compliment of calling him "the Jay Gould of the Church" followed his eager efforts to build up her material fortunes in a pioneer community. He was more like a good Methodist or Roman Catholic in this respect than any of our missionary bishops. No one now seems to know just what became of all that landed property, and the fine Church School for Girls, Wolfe Hall, as well as the very attractive boys' school, Jarvis Hall, are no longer in existence. It is said that there is not even a fund left to commemorate that gifted and aristocratic churchwoman, Miss Wolfe, whose fame and picture are in Grace Church, New York, as well as in the Metropolitan Museum, and whose generosity had made Wolfe Hall possible in Denver. Somebody blundered in later management, and no one seems to know who or how. Current expenses must have swallowed considerable of these benefactions, as in so many church communities.

Nevertheless, though there was lamentable loss, the Episcopal Church has a fairly solid foundation in Denver, probably better in proportion to population than in any city west of Pittsburgh. There is no longer a vigorous Dean Hart to be forerunner for the Church with his hostility to hurtful excesses in ritual, and the lady of the Bible class is by the laws of nature at the end of her great work. It is to be hoped that the new authorities, who are spoken of as "Higher" in churchmanship, will not forget just what the principles and methods were that laid the foundations on which they can more safely build.

It is rather sad to find, in the higher places of the mountains, parishes that once flourished and are now scarcely alive. Leadville, greatest of old mining towns, has sunk from 50,000 population to 5,000, but it does seem that even that would be enough inhabitants to keep one Episcopal Church going. The little city, pathetically dead in parts, is wonderfully and beautifully situated in an amphitheatre-like valley between towering white mountains, its own altitude exceeding 10,000 feet. Some day it may come back in business. Also some day it may be developed as a health resort not easily surpassed in any part of the world for summer climate and romantic beauty. Maybe in that day there will be a parish caring more for altitude in character than mere external churchmanship.

Salt Lake City is hardly a place in which one would look for Episcopalian strength. Pre-occupied by Mormons, it has remained their strong capital. Handsomely built, its chief buildings are Mormon in ownership and occupation. Nevertheless, the Episcopal Church has secured a place that exceeds the proportionate strength in Chicago and other Mid-West centres. This is true in figures, and it is still more true in that influence which goes with strong personal character and helpful public institutions. Rowland Hall is said to be one of the best schools for girls in the West. St. Mark's is spoken of as the leading hospital in the State. At the State University, which rivals Eastern colleges with its more than three thousand students, Episcopalians have built Emery Memorial House, where a body of students is being reached and helped, as they ought to be, in their home life. They live and study in this fine dormitory or club building with an attention to health and morals that includes Christian tact as well as scientific knowledge. It is a plan that has been urged elsewhere at State universities by some of the greatest educators of the nation, and it has elements in it not unlike the foundations of small colleges at Oxford and Cambridge.

What has made the Episcopal Church in this Mormon capital average high in its influence is probably the fact that it has had a line of bishops simple in manner and Christian at heart, who have been the pride of the whole Church. The foundations were laid by that great Christian apostle, Bishop Tuttle, whose character and work will remain national treasures. Few men were more genuinely Christian and progressive than his successor, Bishop Abiel Leonard. The two following him were so Christian as to fall into Socialism, which, however defective as a social theory, is undoubtedly very attractive to zealous Church workers who would more than all else feed the Lord's sheep. Frank Spalding, cut off in his early prime by a reckless girl automobile driver, was probably the most brilliant young Bishop in the Episcopal Church. His work in Utah doubtless won for the Episcopal Church the interest of a good many who are usually indifferent or hostile to organized religion. If he had lived to be sixty he probably would have had a large part in the reconstruction of American Churchmanship along better sociological and more human ecclesiastical lines. Whatever else may be said of his successor, Paul Jones, who was rather young to be diplomatic, there is really no disputing the truth of his main contention, that war is unchristian and inhuman. Unfortunately, he said such things when the world needed our military help; but the fact that he said them, and that they are true, may have the effect in days to come of reinstating the Church in the hearts of men who feared it had too readily surrendered its gospel of peace. The main thing is not to permit the belief to grow that war is anything more than an ugly and inexcusable fact, which sometimes we seem to have to permit because of the wretched state of political civilization. Some day there will be a Christendom without war, and the youthful Bishop who injured his prospects by premature expression may then be taken as one of its earlier minor prophets! At any rate, he will not be counted a Pariah because of his seemingly unpatriotic but conscientious protest when others seemed to forget religious principles in trying to be patriotic.

The claim has been made in some quarters that the founder of Mormonism began life as an Episcopalian. This has not been verified. It is probably based in part on the fact that in every village and town there are families, or youthful members of families, who stand in revolt against all the local churches, and give as a reason that they will join none among the sects they see represented because they hate sectarianism. Oftentimes these are finally won by the larger claims of a real Catholicity made by a late coming Episcopal Church into the community.

A large proportion of these families, who are often led into eccentric religious views, are probably descended from Church of England forefathers who remained apart and developed a semi-heathenism when they discovered no church of their own in new American communities. They degenerate equally in morals and religion.

The main tradition of Joseph Smith's youth, speaking religiously, was his refusal to be converted by the perennial revivals, added to his repeated assertion that he had dreams of a church that would be truly catholic and united. The perversion of this not reprehensible idea is to start a church of your own, and this the youthful Smith, not too conscientious in any time, did in due time. One could easily do a bit of wondering as to what would have become of him and his dreams if some enthusiastic Episcopalian had become his inspirer and had led him into a belief that the Episcopal Church is historically and theologically freer from sectarianism than any of the emotional denominations from which he shrank. The forged Bible and the strange ritual might have been transplanted by a "Catholic" ritual and ecclesiastical horn very pleasing to the tastes of many an "advanced Churchman" who loves the Church idea above nearly everything else.

There may be psychological reasons in this fanciful query that account for what seems to be a fact, that, on the whole, Episcopalians have the reputation in Salt Lake City of being better able than some other "Gentiles" to understand and appreciate the ways and ideals of the Mormon religion. There is at the Episcopal helm just now a Bishop who has a unique capacity of understanding and reconciling different forces in the human struggle for existence. When rector of the church in Lawrence, Mass., Bishop Moulton did more than perhaps any other man to persuade "Bolshevist" Workers of the World to act towards one another, whether capitalists or laborers, with more of a sense of brotherhood than they had before he wrought, and spoke as social peacemaker. Maybe a decreased hostility between Gentile and Mormon is his second great work for the kingdom of God.

Some fine young clergymen of the highest Eastern origin and training have undertaken work in Utah. Then there is an interesting though small group of men who went from Utah to be trained in the East, and have never forgotten the rock whence they were hewn. It is a regrettable rule that so many clergy who spring from a certain class where the need is great are lured off into fields not naturally their own. They are more ready to hear the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us," than the angelic command, "Go back into Jerusalem." Here and there are found those who heed the call of their childhood's home. One of these is the rector in Ogden, a city famous amongst other things as the western terminus of the Union Pacific Railway, and, therefore, the real gateway to the Golden West. Gifted with an unusual sense of humor, able to tell a story about as perfectly as his fellow-Scot, Sir Harry Lauder, wise and generous in his judgments of his fellowmen, and not too easily carried off his feet by the externals of churchmanship, the Rev. John W. Hyslop, who spent his boyhood among Mormons, freely rejoices in the fact that Providence has led him to work in familiar pastures, which he "loved long since and lost awhile." It is all a small enough and sometimes lonely work, and the old historic Episcopal Church is as often as not put in the position of a merely fresh intruder. It is well, therefore, to know that it is in the hands of Church workers who come as kindly religious helpers rather than haughty ecclesiastical conquerors.

BOOK REVIEWS

MORNING AND EVENING PRAYER AND THE HOLY COMMUNION TOGETHER WITH SELECTIONS OF THE PSALMS. Translated into the Eskimo language of the Tigara Tribe of Arctic Alaska. By the Rev. Frederick W. Goodman. New York. Fisher and Thul. 1924. Pp. 91.

It is most significant that the first time the language of the Tigaras is put into print should be in a translation of the Liturgy and Daily Offices made by a Priest of the Church and set forth with the authority of the Apostle of Alaska, Bishop Rowe. Although the reviewer does not know the language of the Tigaras—in fact Mr. Goodman is one of the very few outside the Tigara tribe who knows the language—he has definite reasons for believing that the work has been done accurately and well.

With the aid of Mr. Goodman, the reviewer has studied this book philologically in the light of a persistent tradition among the Tigara people that they originated in Asia. By reason of their remoteness from civilization many words in their language have retained their primitive form. It is therefore interesting to find that in many cases roots, suffixes, and prefixes of Tigara bear a remarkable resemblance to the ancient Sumerian language of Lower Mesopotamia. Thus the root kin or gin or ki means "to come" or "go," the root lu or loo indicates the negative, the suffix me-en, min or nin is the first person plural, pronominal suffix, and the suffix k, ak, indicates the genitive. There is also noticeable the use of infixes so characteristic of Sumerian.

These are only a few of the many similarities between these two languages which a casual examination reveals. Likewise the legends of the Tigara people contain striking parallels to those of Sumeria, especially those which have to do with burial customs and with the idea of divorce.

This translation, revealing as it does so strongly Sumerian characteristics, will go far towards determining the origin and migration of these Eskimo people who have lived for unknown generations on the shores of the Polar Sea.

The points so far made are of a special character. What is of more general importance is that now that the Tigara people are practically one hundred per cent Christian they should no longer be denied the Bible and Prayer Book in their own language. Or, at least, further portions of them ought to be translated as soon as possible. The translator of this book has made a splendid beginning. The whole Church is indebted to him. He should, by all means, be encouraged and enabled by the Church to continue his work of translation. The Gospels, or at least one of the Gospels, should as soon as possible be rendered into the Tigara language. That in itself would take two or more years, as the translator is faced with the difficult problem of pioneer work—of rendering into a strange language not only the words, but also the ideas underlying the text of the Prayer Book and Bible. His splendid work deserves the very best backing of the Church in her Missionary work.

CHRISTIAN WAYS OF SALVATION. By George W. Richards, D. D., LL. D. Macmillan Co., New York. Pp. 327.

The material in this volume was originally delivered in the form of lectures on the Russell Foundation at Auburn Seminary. Dr. Richards, who is Professor of Church History in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in the United States, at Lancaster, Pa., displays his familiarity with that subject in the thirteen chapters of this book, which begin with "Pre-Christian Ways of Salvation," and conclude with "A Credible Creed." He begins with primitive man and his speculations, and yearning for the known, and briefly traces the development of religious thought through Babylonia, Egypt, Persia and Greece. The chapter on "The Way (of Salvation) of Jesus" is rather too vague to be altogether satisfying, but from there on through the subsequent chapters on "The Way of the Apostles" and "The Ancient Catholic Way," "The Orthodox" and "The Roman Catholic Way," the author traces very interestingly the growth of Christian thought. He then treats of the influence of individuals like Luther, Zwingli and Calvin. The great Anglican evangelists are conspicuous by their absence from his pages.

The final chapter, on "A Credible Creed," gives in full, and it takes five pages, the tentative confession of faith submitted to the General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland in May, 1921, and by it commended to the interest and study of members of its Church. It is interesting to note that this document affirms the divinity of Christ and His oneness with God, but omits all reference to the Virgin birth, but Dr. Richards commends very highly, emphasizes however that it has not been formally adopted, but only commended to church members for consideration. The author at all times cites chapter and verse for his Scriptural quotations which are frequent, and the book is well indexed.

HOW THE EARLY HEBREWS LIVED AND LEARNED. By Edna M. Bonser. Macmillan Company, New York. Illustrated. Pp. 267.

The teaching of the Old Testament to children is daily becoming more and more of a problem, as views of its interpretation are changing all the time. The author of this volume has produced a book that will be of great value in presenting the early Bible stories to little children. It is essentially a book for the teachers. The frequent use of maps and sand tables is continually stressed. The stories are presented in a way that makes them easily adaptable for dramatization with small children as the participants. The contents covers the period from the call of Abraham to the division of the kingdom of Israel. Frequent footnotes are used to define the unusual words that would puzzle children and also to give the meaning of Hebrew names. It is, perhaps a pity that none of the Bible language is used, but no doubt it is not the author's intention that the book should be a substitute for the Bible so much as a supplement to it, or for use of very small children. The author's preface contains many excellent suggestions for the use of materials, costumes, maps and illustrations. The book will be found to be a valuable addition to every Sunday-school or church library and of the greatest help to teachers in the kindergarten and primary grades of our Church Schools.

THE BIBLICAL IDEA OF GOD. By M. Bross Thomas, D. D. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, N. Y. Pp. 197.

The material of this book was originally used in lectures at Lake Forest University (Ill.) on the William Bross Foundation. The author's foreword very well describes his work. He says: "In writing these lectures I have had an audience in mind rather than readers. This accounts for somewhat of repetition and also for a certain directness of address. I have also had in view those whom Mr. Lincoln called "the plain people," that large number of Christian men and women who are interested in the great truths of the Bible, but are not familiar with the works of those scholars who deal largely and minutely with its history, structure, composition, authorship, and those details which are found in books of introduction. If the author can be of any help to those who seek for guidance and confirmation of faith in the midst of the controversies of the present day, which too much tend to weaken, if not destroy, belief in the Bible's divine origin and in its teaching concerning the nature, character, and eternal purpose of the God of Revelation, he will consider his work not to have been in vain." In his six chapters he presents the development of the Biblical presentation of God, from the primitive and patriarchal period to the teaching of Christ and His Apostles.

VISIONS OF HOPE AND FEAR. By George W. Thorn. George H. Doran Company, New York. Pp. 175.

This is a short and readable exposition of the Book of the Revelation of St. John. The author's first two chapters are devoted to the setting in which the book was written, first the condition and situation of the author, and then of the world of his day. The author's style is easy to read and makes his book as interesting as it is possible to make any commentary on the Apocalypse, which is universally recognized as the most difficult book of the Bible to understand and to study with intelligent interest.

In an appended note on the authorship of the Revelation, the writer concludes that it was not written by the same person who wrote the Fourth Gospel, and is disinclined to believe that the Apostle John wrote either of these portions of the Bible. He is of the opinion that the book under consideration was written by John, a Christian prophet, who is otherwise unknown to Christian history.

FINDING GOD. By the Rev. Russell Henry Stafford. The Macmillan Company, New York. Pp. 219.

In twelve chapters the author tries to solve in this volume some problems which he knows present themselves to the mind of modern students. His years of experience in university life have convinced him that religion as a transforming experience of God has as great a power today on the life of the youth as it ever had, if it can be properly presented. In the opening paragraph on the chapter on The Modern Approach to the Bible, he says:

"The Bible has for some decades past been the battleground of much controversy as to the nature and extent of its inspiration and authority. In declaring what seems to me to be the correct attitude toward it I propose to be entirely frank rather than evasively sentimental or obstinately dogmatic. Religious questions must be brought out of the mists, and sharply defined and candidly dealt with, if we are ever to have religion master the lives of practical people. And the value of the Bible is a religious question of cardinal importance."

Again in his chapter on "The Centrality of Jesus," he uses these striking words:

"I have sometimes wished that we might meet Jesus for the first time, instead of having known Him always, so to speak, and even that we might meet Him with our minds prejudiced against Him, in preference to the mere thoughtless reverence which is His accustomed portion among us. It must be said, I fear, of many Christians, that they acknowledge Jesus as Lord chiefly because they have always heard Him so described, so that it would seem to them improper to question this conventional acquiescence in His primacy—just as it would entail general reprobation and the odium of folly for any citizen of this country to trump up an indictment against the legitimacy of our President's constitutional authority. And it is likely, alas, that most Christians of this type are actually as little acquainted with Jesus, as He is found in the Gospels, as most Americans are with the President; they believe the correct things which they have been told about Him, without actually knowing him. In consequence, the religion of which Christ Jesus is the center is likewise for them only an eminently proper institutional observance, without warmth, depth or joy."

We heartily commend the book to those who have to deal with students, in answering their queries, and presenting to them the claims of religion.

WAS HOLY COMMUNION INSTITUTED BY JESUS? By Rev. Douglas S. Guy, B. D. The Student Christian Movement, 32 Russell Square, W. C., London.

The very title of this book will come as a shock to most earnest Church people. We are so accustomed to the formula of the consecration prayer at the communion service, in which we hear it recited Sunday after Sunday, that our Lord "did institute, and in His Holy Gospel command us to continue a perpetual memory of that His precious death and sacrifice until His coming again." The author, however, in his first chapter points out that "many earnest scholars not only on the continent, but in England too, have come to regard the matter as an open one. It is contended that Jesus was just celebrating a farewell meal, in which He speaks of His body being broken and His blood being shed, thereby implying His perfect readiness to die for those He loved, but that He said nothing about repeating or continuing it as a rite." He then proceeds to give five arguments on which such scholars base their contention. In succeeding chapters he deals with the discrepancies in the gospel records about the last supper, and the difficulties of harmony then. His chapters on St. Paul's references to the sacrament are particularly interesting, especially the matter about the "mystery cults" of St. Paul's day. Indeed all of the three chapters dealing with the relation of St. Paul to Christ, and the early Church form reading of an instructive and valuable character for any Bible student.

He concludes the epilogue which forms the last chapter with the following words: "We owe that external setting to our Lord Himself. It was He who endowed it with a body as well as a soul. It was He who attached sacramental values to bread and wine. It was He who identified them with His body and His blood. The outward casket was provided by Jesus to carry the inward jewel. That the outward observance of the rite has been wisely cherished, and taught by the Church among all communities of Christians, I believe to be due to the guidance of the Holy Spirit, who led the first disciples to continue steadfastly in the breaking of the bread."

MODERN DISCIPLESHIP AND WHAT IT MEANS. By Edward S. Woods, M. A. Publishers, Macmillan Company, New York. Pp. 189.

Canon Woods in this volume states his purpose in one sentence of his preface, when he says: "If Christianity is to spread as it ought, it seems to me it will have to be spread by Christians who can learn to combine a passionate devotion to Jesus Christ with a sane and sympathetic understanding of the life of their day."

The author proceeds to develop these two things, "a passionate devotion to Jesus Christ," and "a sane and sympathetic understanding of the life of today," in his subsequent chapters, which begin with "The Meaning of Faith," and conclude with "The Single Heart and the Open Mind." He discusses such other topics as "The Value of Bible Study," "Christ and Character" and "The Modern Outlook." He calls attention to the fact that from the beginning of the Christian era it has been a noteworthy fact that strong Christian character has invariably been bound up with an intimate knowledge of the Bible. He offers eight very practical and helpful suggestions for Bible study in this chapter, and closes it with a valuable suggested bibliography.

In his chapter on the "Modern Outlook," this writer addresses himself particularly to these questions and discusses them in an interesting and illuminating manner. These three problems, i. e.: First, Does science contradict the Bible; second, Has the new learning and the new criticism discredited the Bible? third, Has modern psychology explained away a good deal of religious experience?

In answering the questions Canon Woods applies modern learning and scholarship to his subjects, and combines with it a living and vital faith that furnishes satisfactory answers and explanations and throws much light on these important questions.

The book is well indexed and will be found thoroughly readable by the average busy man and also valuable for reference study.

WOODSMOKE. By Francis Brett Young. E. P. Dutton and Company, Publishers. Pp. 334. Price $2.00.

"Woodsmoke" is an intensely interesting, well-written book. The author has a wonderful command of English and expresses vividly and feelingly the dramatic and terrible experiences of a wealthy Englishman and his wife traveling with an acquaintance, in German East Africa.

The vast silences of Africa made all humane endeavor seem futile and pitiful and created a horrible loneliness and fear in the hearts of the travelers.

Along with glimpses of mirage loveliness there were horrible scenes of brutality in the dealing with the natives, who are pictured more as brutes than as human beings.

Lost in a desert—no food nor water to be obtained—tormented by malaria and disease, one gets a very awe-inspiring picture of African travels.

The characters are well-drawn and interesting—the story clean and wholesome—a very unusual and startlingly uncanny incident is woven into the final chapters which gives the book a unique termination and holds the readers' attention to the very end.

MRS. PARAMOR. By Louis Joseph Vance. Publisher, E. P. Dutton & Co., New York. Price $2. Pp. 233.

This book may appeal to the lover of extreme modern life, where the marriage vow means nothing, where divorce is easy to get, where an affinity is easily sought. The story is cheap, the reading light.

The best thing about the book is that it shows how shallow and how miserable people are, who seek only pleasure and who defy moral laws and conventions. That happiness can only come by conferring happiness.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Editor.

AN IMPORTANT PART OF CHRIST'S COMMISSION.

We take pleasure in publishing on this page an account of the quarter century of service rendered by the Emerald-Hodgson Hospital at Sewanee, Tenn., and heartily commending it to the attention and consideration of our readers. A correspondent writes as follows:

On this, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Hospital, we may pause a brief moment to look back over the quarter of a century of continuous service that has passed, with mingled feelings of deep gratitude to God for the many blessings that have come to us and for the privilege that has been ours to serve humanity, as well as with a sense of failure to meet fully the opportunities to render more than relief in physical ailments. This retrospect likewise suggests to us the vision of future usefulness to the community and to all with whom we may be brought into contact.

Founded in 1899 by the Medical Department of the University of the South, added to, renovated and enlarged in 1908 by the Rev. W. S. Claiborne, rector of the Otey Memorial Parish, Sewanee, Tennessee, destroyed by fire in 1911, Mr. Claiborne solicited funds, rebuilding the hospital in 1912 as a memorial to two women "whose birth months were May, and birthstones Emerald" and the contributors and those who were rebuilding the hospital requested that the hospital be named the Emerald Hospital and it was so done by those in authority. This hospital has endeavored to serve all who have come to its doors, not only with the best professional service it could command, but also with a large measure of that indefinable "soul" of Sewanee, which would not only contribute to the healing of the body but would also nourish the soul of man. Built upon Christian foundations, and recognizing both the physical and spiritual needs of man, it has sought always to minister to both body and soul.

To accomplish this there is provided the professional skill of Christian doctors and nurses, and extensive technical equipment in the operating room, X-Ray laboratory, bacteriological laboratory, and obstetrical room, as well as a resident chaplain and a chapel where intercessions for the sick and others are offered daily at noon and the service of the Holy Communion is held on Sunday, Wednesday and Friday, as well as all Holy Days, and the Sacraments administered at all times as may be requested. In this double ministry to body and soul, the doctor and the priest work together in harmonious cooperation.

Not only does the hospital serve the immediate community, both University and Village, but being the only hospital between Chattanooga and Nashville, it draws its patients from an extensive region of mountain country and from many of the neighboring towns and villages. Thus is presented a large field for Christian Service, which is full of possibilities awaiting only the larger means for development. The vision of the Ven. W. S. Claiborne, Archdeacon of Sewanee, who has been so instrumental in bringing the hospital to its present substantial establishment, and the consecrated service of the doctors who have earned for it an enviable reputation, surely bespeak a yet greater usefulness in the future in extending the Kingdom of God in this world, and in making known to humanity the infinite love of the Saviour, the great Physician and Healer of the bodies and souls of mankind.

To all to whom this brief message may come is extended a very cordial invitation to visit the hospital, where may be seen at first-hand just what is being done; and we trust that each and every one may catch a bit of that inspiration which impells us, in spite of many handicaps, to continue the humble service we may render, to the greater Glory of God, and for the benefit of humanity.

Communications may be addressed to the Rev. J. N. Atkins, Superintendent of the Hospital, or the Rev. W. S. Claiborne, Archdeacon of Sewanee.

We should never lose sight of the fact that the healing of the body received an equal share of attention from Our Lord with the restoration of the soul, therefore institutions for the care and cure of the sick are as essentially Christian as all churches and cathedrals.

In these modern days it is gratifying to know that great work can be done in this field when there is no hospital at hand. Many of our State Boards of Health have organized traveling clinics, that give dental and throat service, in rural districts to patients who are brought to them at points where they make temporary headquarters.

We can best illustrate the operations of such a clinic by quoting the following news item written about one:

"For two months the party sent out by the State Board of health, Richmond, has been traversing the State. They have visited the counties of Botetourt, Pulaski, Carroll, Smyth, Rockingham and Page. Traveling in a Ford car and carrying their implements and baggage with them, Drs. C. O. Heller and E. Gardner, together with nurse, Miss N. Vance, have visited many places. At every place they have held clinics for pre-school children under the Shepherd-Towner act. This is the fourth year that the clinic has been held in this State.

"Owing to mistake in plans the clinic was unable to visit Ingham on Saturday, but it held a very successful two days clinic at Pine Grove on Monday and Tuesday. The doctor, dentist and nurse were hard at work for two days, and though the hours were from 10 A. M. to 5 P. M., on Tuesday, the dentist, Dr. Heller, was still at work at 7 P. M. Last year, according to figures given by Nurse Vance, more than two thousand young children below school age were examined by them. This year the number has been considerably larger. It is the fourth year that Miss Vance has been engaged in the work.

"Forty-eight pre-school children were examined at Pine Grove as well as ten older children and ten adults. The report of Dr. Gardner goes to testify to the large number of babies that appeared in good health. More than eighty per cent were up to the average weight. Defective teeth and enlarged tonsils, however, claimed a number of the children. Dr. Heller, who was so popular with the children last year, made thirty-three extractions in one day. Besides this work during the two days he filled twenty teeth and made six cleanings. Mrs. Bessie Jenkins who had several teeth extracted last year was back again this year and had five more removed. She is waiting for Dr. Heller's visit next year to have the rest removed. The children went through the ordeal bravely and special credit is due the young son of Will Nease for the way in which he sat up in the dentist's chair and had his teeth cared for.

"Dr. Gardner reports that more work was done in Pine Grove in two days than was done in all of last week elsewhere. A few from Tanner's Ridge were present and next year they are planning to have a clinic on the ridge.

"So successful and so warm has been the welcome of the people that the clinic next year will probably plan for a week's stay in Page County holding clinics, at Ingham, Tanner's Ridge and Pine Grove. While in Pine Grove the party stopped in the Rock House with Miss G. McCreavy and were warm in praise of the new home in the hollow, which will add very materially to the life of the community."

This information may sound a trifle local to the casual reader, but mention of the Shepherd-Towner act will be noticed, and that in itself makes it a matter of material interest.

The Shepherd-Towner bill which was passed some two years ago provided an appropriation from the federal treasury to be distributed to such states as would make a corresponding appropriation from their state treasuries for the purposes described in this news item.

Most of our States have availed themselves of this opportunity and have provided for some form of free state medical treatment. A request to your State Health Commissioner for information will bring an answer telling just what is being done along these lines.

When this department is functioning properly, as it is in many states, the authorities are always eager to have the cooperation of the clergy, for one of their chief needs is intelligent publicity, and an interested local person to take care of the details and find the patients needing treatment.

A Successful Experiment

For many years we have gone to Sewanee for the Summer Training School, young and old sharing alike in the course of the school and the wonderful hospitality of Sewanee, each year bringing others to join the ranks of those already won over to the idea of the Training School for Church Workers, until at last the school has outgrown the possibilities of Sewanee to take care of them. What can be done?—this was being asked on every side. At a meeting with the Vice Chancellor of the University of the South and the Dean and Board of the Training School it was decided to try an experiment—that of dividing the two conferences. A conference for the Young People—there were doubts and fears as to what effect this might have on the young people, but it was agreed upon as a trial, and the Rt. Rev. Clinton S. Quin, Bishop-Coadjutor of Texas, lovingly called the Young People's Bishop, was asked to take over the work of this conference. Bishop Quin undertook the working out of the conference and it went over the top with the result that never in the history of Sewanee has there been such a helpful and splendid conference for the young people.

They seemed to feel from the beginning that this was something their very own, their responsibility, and earnestly and faithfully they went to work to make it a success.

This conference was to make history for the Church, and the Church can look with pride on her first Conference for the Young People.

There was work, play and rest—and all so well balanced and planned that one dropped right into the every-day life of the Conference easily and naturally—Young People, Faculty and Counsellors alike.

There were credit courses on the Prayer Book, under the Rev. E. C. Seaman; Teacher Training, Miss Annie Morton Stout; Kindergarten and Primary Methods, Mrs. F. H. G. Fry, Junior Department Work, Miss Helen Hargrove; Church School Service League and Our Bible, Miss Nettie Barnwell, all of which were entered into earnestly and seriously by the boys and girls, a great number of them standing examinations for Teacher Training Certificates.

There were special courses given in Public Speaking and Parliamentary Law, by Mrs. C. S. Quin. These classes were not all theory and principles, but were given over largely to the practical working out, by the boys and girls, of the ideas Mrs. Quin had given them.

A course in Social Service as applied to the Church's work, by Miss Mabel Eleanor Stone, was most interesting and well attended.

Practical work was again brought into use at the noon-day period when Bishop Quin conducted a class on model programs for Young People's work. The various groups into which the conference was divided, were asked to put on programs, many of these being entirely original and brought out wonderfully and forcibly the ideas and thoughts of the young people of today.

The Rev. Gordon Reese was in charge of the recreational part of the conference and did most creditable work, with camp fires, stories, hikes and every possible attraction for the development of the finer senses of our boys and girls along the line of sport and good fellowship.

A course in Organization of Y. P. S. L. was given by the Rev. J. S. Ditchburn, of New Orleans, and proved most helpful and instructive in outlining the principles of organization and definite work for the various committees throughout the five fields of service.

At the close of the afternoon, an inspirational talk was given by the Rt. Rev. William G. McDowell, Bishop-Coadjutor of Alabama, who gave some stirring and helpful thoughts for the Christian people are responsible, and clergymen especially so, if children become deaf from adenoids in their communities, because the means for curing them is now in reach of all, and a little intelligent investigation is all that is necessary to find the remedy for many ills that were beyond the reach of sufferers a few years ago.

Remember the words recorded in the first verses of the ninth chapter of St. Luke's Gospel about the Apostles, "And He sent them to preach the Kingdom of God and to heal the sick. * * * And they departed, and went through the towns, preaching the gospel and healing everywhere."

young minds of the Church to think upon.

The most beautiful and impressive service of the day was the early Celebration of the Holy Communion, when these young people gathered in the grove of the S. M. A., where they had made, in the ground, an outline of the cross on which to hold this service. Then at night, after a day filled with work and wholesome fun and sport and good fellowship came the Compline Service, at which they sung "taps," and I believe there was not a boy or girl in that conference who could not feel with Bishop Quin as he prayed "Dear Heavenly Father, we have loved Thee, but not enough; we have sought Thee, but not diligently; we have heard, but not understood, we have seen, but not perceived; we have longed for things heavenly, but have clung to the things of this earth and our hearts have been far from Thee, the Holy One. Draw us now in mercy unto Thyself, O God, that the time to come be not as the past, but that finding, perceiving, understanding and loving Thee, we may find Joy in Thy Service and follow Thee, through Jesus Christ Our Lord." Amen.

Church Intelligence

Robert H. Gardiner.

At a meeting of the Business Committee of the Continuation Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order held in New York City on September 3, 1924, the following action was unanimously taken:

Resolved, That the Committee bear testimony to their irreparable loss sustained in the removal from visible presence of Robert Hallowell Gardiner, General Secretary of the Continuation Committee. It was Mr. Gardiner who took the first step toward putting into practical effect the proposal made during the Triennial Convention of the Episcopal Church in 1910 for a World Conference on Faith and Order. From the beginning he regarded the movement seriously and stooped his shoulders to a major share of the responsibility involved. From then until the morning of June 15, when he closed his eyes in his last rest, his labor was wise, continuous and self-effacing. This faithful champion of Christ has left a trail of blessing behind him. We, his associates and friends register our thanksgiving to God for our privilege of fellowship with him and renew our allegiance to the cause for which He gave His life.

Resolved, That a copy of this minute be sent to his family and to the Church Press.

Frank Dean Gifford, rector, receives $25,000. The same parish recently secured by gifts $75,000 with which to erect a parish building. John's Parish, Aldie, Va., receives $25,000, and Sheldon Parish, Leesburg, Va., the same. The Leesburg (Va.) Hospital is given $50,000. The Blue Ridge Industrial School at Dyke, Va., gets $25,000. New Rector of Porter Military Academy.

Canon Gordon M. Reese, of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, has accepted a call to become rector of the Porter Military Academy, of Charleston, S. C., and will assume his new work on November 1. He will remain with the Cathedral until that time in order to assist in the Children's Campaign for the Bishop Tuttle Memorial, which will be from October 12 to 30. Canon Reese was ordained Deacon in 1920, while in charge of the Junior Department of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew Convention, and ordained Priest in 1921 in Texas. While assistant rector of Trinity Church, Houston, Texas, he organized the Young People's Service League, which now has branches in many dioceses. He has been interested in many phases of boys' work, and through his enthusiastic efforts has done much to interest boys in the Church.

Local Assembly of the Daughters of the King.

The Spring meeting of the Local Assembly of the Daughters of the King of the Diocese, was held in the Church of the Ascension, Norfolk. The meditation was conducted by the Rev. C. H. Holmead, of Trinity Church, Portsmouth.

Immediately following the meditation was the service of Holy Communion, conducted by Bishop Tucker and the Rev. J. S. Meredith.

The business meeting was called to order by Miss Schwarzkoff, the President, after which Dr. Steinmetz made an address in which he stressed the fact that the Daughters of the King are not different from other women only that as an organization they represent what all women should be.

Bishop Thomson then spoke most interestingly for a few minutes.

Reports of chapters were read and filed, after which Mrs. Boykin, Extension Secretary, read a most interesting report of the Synod.

An invitation to hold the next meeting at St. Peter's Church was accepted.

The election of officers resulted as follows:

Miss Blanche Mills, St. Paul's, President.

Mrs. E. P. White, St. Peter's, Vice-President.

Miss Maud Fulford, St. Peter's, Secretary.

Miss Sadie Douglas, Christ Church, Treasurer.

Mrs. Boykin, of Ascension Chapter, was reelected Extension Secretary.

The evening service was held at eight o'clock in the church, at which time Bishop Tucker was the speaker.

Opening of the Margaret Paxton Home for Convalescent Children.

The Margaret Paxton Home for Convalescent Children at Leesburg, Virginia, was formally opened about the first of July, 1924, by the admission of twelve convalescent children.

This marks the fulfillment of a bequest made by the late Mrs. Rachel Paxton, of Leesburg, who bequeathed her home, a beautiful residence on the Potomac River, just outside of Leesburg, and fifty acres surrounding it, and a generous amount of money for endowment, to establish a Home for Convalescent Children in memory of her daughter, who died a number of years ago. Under the provisions of the will, convalescent children are to be admitted from Loudoun County, the City of Washington, and the State of Virginia. The ownership and management of the Home is committed to a Board composed of members of St. James' Church, Leesburg, including the rector of the Church, and the Bishop of the Diocese is Chairman of the Board of Advisors.

Interesting Service in Historic Old Chapel.

Annual services were held Sunday, September 14, in "Old Chapel," which is midway between Berryville and Millwood, in Clarke County. The Rev. B. D. Chambers, rector of Christ Church, Millwood, conducted the services, and many Virginians attended.

Colonel Nathaniel Burwell gave the two acres for a church and a burying-ground, with the stipulation in the deed that in case it is used for any other purpose than a place for divine worship, the land should revert to him and his heirs. The present stone chapel was built in 1790, upon the site of the former log chapel, which was built in 1732. Great interest is always shown in these annual services at the Old Chapel, the oldest church in the county, and one of the oldest in the state, on account of its quaintness, its straight-back pews, with doors; its high pulpit, with its sounding board, but chiefly because here in its graveyard are many illustrious dead, among whom are John Esten Cooke, beloved author, and Edmund Randolph, who was aide-de-camp to General Washington, also the first secretary of state in Washington's cabinet.

Records show that the first vestry was dissolved on a charge of mismanagement of funds and the following "respectable body of gentlemen, in whose hands the public funds are safe," were chosen in 1752: Thomas, Lord Fairfax, Isaac Perkins, Gabriel Jones, John Hite, Thomas Swearingen, Charles Buck, Robert Lemmon, John Linsey, John Ashby, James Cromley and Lewis Neill.

The Valley Convocation.

The fall meeting of the Valley Convocation will be held in Calvary Church, Front Royal, Virginia, October 7-9. The opening service will be held on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock, in the church. Wednesday, October 8, will be Convocation Day, and Tuesday, October 9, Woman's Auxiliary Day.

Mission Conference.

The Mission Conference of the Society of the Nazarene brought many visiting clergy to the Diocese during the week of September 14, when sessions of the conference were held in Trinity Diocesan Church. Dr. Gayner Banks, National Director of the Society, was the preacher at St. Mark's Church on Sunday morning, September 14, and other visiting clergy at Washington Churches on that day were: the Rev. H. L. Rockwell, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Buffalo, N. Y., at St. Stephen's Church; the Rev. William Johnson, rector of St. Thaddeus Church, Aiken, S. C., at Grace Church, Georgetown; the Rev. Elbert B. Holmes, rector of St. Paul's Church, Natuck, Mass., at the Chapel of the Nativity, and the Rev. R. F. McDowell, of St. James' Church, Marie, Mich., at St. Margaret's Church. Conferences were held every evening during the week of the mission and every evening at Trinity Church, mission services were held, to which the sick were especially invited.

Work in Southern Maryland.

Bishop Freeman visited St. Philip's Chapel, Aquasco, Prince George County, Maryland, on Saturday, September 13, and held a conference with the rector and others interested in work among the colored people in Southern Maryland. On Sunday, September 14, he administered confirmation at St. Mary's Chapel, Aquasco, and in the afternoon of the same day confirmed a class at St. Paul's Church, Baden.

The Lord's Day Alliance of the District of Columbia will hold a meeting at St. Stephen's Church on Friday, September 19, at eight o'clock. The Rev. George F. Dudley, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, is Secretary of the District Branch of the Lord's Day Alliance.

The Rev. John S. Moses, rector of St. John's Church, Georgetown, was the preacher at the Lincoln Park Open-Air Service on Sunday afternoon, September 14. This was the closing service of the season.

Clergy Conference.

The Fourth Annual Autumn Conference of the Clergy and Laymen of the Diocese of Southern Ohio will be held at the Old Barn Club, South of Dayton, from September 24 to 28. The clergy meet from the twenty-fourth to the twenty-sixth, and the laymen from the twenty-sixth to the twenty-eighth. The results in Southern Ohio demonstrate that this method of reaching the laymen has done more to win their interest and support of the Church's Program than any other method so far tried.

The interest of the clergy in the plan is expressed in the fact that not more than three of the active clergy have absented themselves from the meeting in any one year and then only because of an emergency over which they had no control.

Many interesting speakers have been secured and an attractive program has been arranged.

Pleasant Ridge, Cincinnati, is one of the most rapidly growing home sections of that city. All Saints' Mission is well located to take advantage of that growth. The Rev. Canon Otte, who resides there and was recently honored by being made rector-emeritus of St. John's Church, Bedford, Indiana, has done splendid work in building up the congregation; and no wto his aid comes the Rev. Winfield Shiers from Franklin, Va., who will have charge of this Mission and the Mission of St. Mark's, Oakley, another adjoining suburb.

Mr. Shiers was born in Lawrence, Mass., and educated at William and Mary College, Va., taking his theological training at the Virginia Seminary. He has had the fine experience of assisting Dr. Covington in Norfolk and did extensive missionary work in rural Virginia with Franklin as his headquarters. In the World War he served the Church at Camp Lee.

St. Stephen's Congregation, Winton Place, Cincinnati, resumed the regular schedule of services in September, in what to all intents and purposes was a new interior. All the frescoes and interior painting had been renewed and the wood-work revarnished, while the altar brasses had been relacquered. The parish is fortunate in having a Lady Bountiful who presented the church with its renovated place of worship.

The Cincinnati City Mission maintained all its usual services during the summer, with the help of the Theological students home for vacations. The General Hospital, the Tuberculosis Sanatorium, the City and Country Homes for the Friendless, the Home for Incurables, the Home for the Blind, the Hamilton County Home, the County Jail, and many other institutions were regularly visited and services held at least weekly.

Choir Training: Some years ago choirs of men and boys were the rule, rather than the exception, in this diocese, but many causes led to their discontinuance in all but a few parishes. Lately there has been quite a revival in the training of children's voices and the children's choruses have been a very popular feature in the May Festival Programs in Cincinnati. Now a department for the training of the boy voice has been added to the College of Music. There are still five choirs of men and boys in Cincinnati in the Church, namely, the Cathedral, Our Saviour, Advent, Grace Avondale and St. Luke's. It is surprising how many men got their first idea of serving the Church through the choir in their boyhood.

The Fall Program.

Announcement of the Fall program for the Diocese has been made from the office of the Executive Secretary, the Rev. W. R. Noe. The program contemplates a thorough parochial and diocesan preparation for the Every Member Canvass on St. Andrew's Day. From October 16 to 31 there is to be group discussion of the Church's Program, using the text books suggested by the National Council. From October 21 to November 17 district conferences will be held in twelve central places, with addresses and conferences by diocesan leaders. Intensive Week will be November 23 to 29.

Fall Convocations: Dates have been set for the Fall meetings of the two East Carolina Convocations. The Convocation of Edenton is to meet with St. George's Church, Hyde County, on October 21 and 22; and the Convocation of Wilmington is to have its session at Holy Innocents, Seven Springs on the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth. It is interesting to note that both Convocations are to meet in two of the rural parishes of the Diocese. This will be the first meeting of the Convocation of Wilmington in several years.

The Rev. E. S. Willett, whose selection as Field Secretary for Colored Work in East Carolina was noted several weeks ago, has been actively at work, getting in touch with all of the congregations and making a survey of the field with a view to extension work. He recently conducted a preaching mission in St. Mary's, Belhaven, with good results.

A Number of Preaching Missions are to be held in East Carolina this Fall. The Rev. W. R. Noe has just closed a very successful one at Holy Innocents, Seven Springs. He is to preach Missions at Sanbury, Beaufort and St. John's, Pitt County, in October.

Group Picnics have come to be very popular in East Carolina in the summer; there being a very effective combination of recreation, inspiration and instruction. Such picnics were held at Seven Springs, Windsor and Hillcrest, near Kinston. They have been all-day affairs, with several neighboring churches coming together. Speakers have been imported for the occasion.

"Virginia Dare Day," which has come to be quite an event in East Carolina, was celebrated this year on August 19. Virginia Dare, the first white child born and baptized in North America, was born on the eighteenth, but as it fell on Monday this year and the place of the celebration is inaccessible, the celebration was on Tuesday. It is at old Fort Raleigh, Roanoke Island. The Hon. J. W. Bailey was the chief speaker. Bishop J. B. Cheshire, of the Diocese of North Carolina, is president of the Association. The Rev. R. B. Drane, of Edenton, who has been the moving spirit of the celebration for many years, resigned as president this year.

The Rev. George F. Hill, rector of Christ Church, Elizabeth City, stayed at home and worked this summer instead of taking a vacation. He helped to organize and equip an institution for the care of homeless and underprivileged children, and is chairman of the board of directors.

The Ven. F. B. Drane, Archdeacon of the Yukon, and Miss Rebecca Wood, of Edenton, were married at Seattle, Washington, this month. Miss Wood went out to Seattle to meet Mr. Drane, accompanied by several members of her family. Archdeacon Drane is a son of the Rev. R. B. Drane, D. D., of Edenton.

Two New Clergymen have come to the Diocese this month: the Rev. C. O. Parbo, who was recently ordained in the Diocese of North Carolina, has taken up his residence at Williamston, where he has accepted a call to become rector of the Church of the Advent. The Rev. H. D. Cone, of Vermont, is to supply St. Paul's, Clinton, for several months.

Vacation Bible School Proves Successful.

The Daily Vacation Bible School, that was conducted in Charleston this summer for the second time, has proved quite a success. The attendance was about the same as last year. On the closing day, a pageant entitled, "The Missionary Hall of Fame," was presented by the members of the school. Miss Emily C. Meacher, a professional teacher, was the principal of the school, and Miss Lillian Heins acted as director of the music. The manual training work was under the direction of the Rev. Randolph Blackford.

Most of the Clergy have now returned from their vacations, and the autumn campaign will soon be on in full; the infallible sign thereof being that the Bishop called a meeting of the Executive Council at Headquarters in Charleston on Wednesday, September 17.

St. Mary's, Blowing Rock.

During the summer months St. Mary's, Blowing Rock, has been ministered to by the following clergymen: The Rev. R. E. Gribben of Winston-Salem, in June; the Rev. Robert Owens of Charlotte, in July; the Rev. Steven Gardner of Washington, N. C., in August; the Rev. Henry Phillips of Columbia, S. C., and the Rev. Mr. Gould of Raleigh, have also been heard at St. Mary's. The congregations were so large that many persons had to be turned away and the committee in charge has decided to enlarge the church in order to accommodate the summer visitors. It is expected that this improvement will be completed by next season. The Rev. J. W. Burke, of Valle Crucis, is priest-in-charge, and holds services there once a month throughout the year.

Plans are on foot looking to a combined diocesan missionary organ for the Dioceses of North Carolina and Western North Carolina in the near future. This will be accomplished through the Carolina Church, published at Greensboro. The Rev. I. Harding Hughes will continue as managing editor and will devote a department to Western North Carolina.

Death of the Rev. T. M. Sharpe.

After an illness of four weeks, the Rev. Thomas Manley Sharpe, assistant at the Church of the Saviour, West Philadelphia, died September 11, in the Episcopal Hospital. He was a native of England, studied at Oxford and Dublin University, and later took his degree at Illinois State University. He filled several charges in Maryland, and was rector of St. Titus' Church, West Philadelphia, remaining there until transferred to the Church of the Saviour. His widow survives him with one daughter and three sons.

The burial service was held at the Church of the Saviour on Monday at two P. M. The interment was in Arlington Cemetery.

Celebrate Anniversary of Old St. David's, Radnor.

The founding of Old St. David's Church at Radnor two hundred and nine years ago was celebrated with special services in the church September 7. The Rev. Crosswell McBee, rector, conducted the services. The ground and church were open to the public and the anniversary always is celebrated on the first Sunday in September.

This historic edifice stands secluded in a small wooded valley south of the main line, a relic of colonial times. In the church yard are rows of grave-stones, irregular in size and bearing the names of persons who played important parts in making the history of the country.

Various changes were made in the church in the early days, but it has remained practically unchanged since 1830, when the pulpit was enlarged and the twenty-three pews rearranged.

Service of Institution.

The Rev. Carl I. Shoemaker, former rector of St. Paul's Church, Sydney, N. Y., was instituted as rector of the Church of the Annunciation, Philadelphia, Sunday morning, September 7. The Rev. James M. Niblo, acting for Bishop Garland, conducted the service of institution. The new rector held his first service Sunday evening. After the installation, there was a parish communion, followed by a parish breakfast.

Mr. Shoemaker was born in Muncy, Pa., and was graduated from St. Stephen's College, and the General Seminary in New York. In 1917 he became assistant at St. Michael's Church, Philadelphia, and acted as chaplain at the University Hospital.

The Rev. William Clendenin Robertson has resigned the rectorship of Christ Church, Chattanooga, to accept an appointment as the first curate of the Church of the Advent, Boston, Mass. Mr. Clendenin has been rector for twenty-three and a half years, during which time Christ Church has grown from a handful of communicants worshipping in a hired hall, to a strong self-supporting parish with a property conservatively valued at over $100,000, consisting of church and parish house in one of the most desirable corner locations in the city.

The Rev. Tom J. Haldeman, who has been a member of the Associate Mission in charge of St. Andrew's Church, Denver, Colo., has been called by the vestry, and has accepted the rectorship of Christ Church. It is expected that Mr. Haldeman will be in residence about the middle of September.

Who Will Help This Growing Mission?

St. John's Church, Fort Worth, would greatly appreciate the donation of a Communion Service for their little mission. Probably some one would like to give this as a memorial to some one, or some event. This little mission started at the beginning of this year with only about twelve members and now has (during the hot summer months) a monthly communicant list of thirty members, and there are enrolled at least one hundred.

Donations may be sent to Mrs. J. R. Maceo, 501 W. T. Waggoner Building, Fort Worth, Texas.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., Coadjutor.

Clerical Notes.

Bishop and Mrs. R. E. L. Strider and son, Robert, spent August at Mackinaw City, Mich., and have returned to Wheeling, after an enjoyable vacation on the Great Lakes.

The Rev. O. C. Fox and wife spent August at Youngstown, Ohio.

The Rev. J. L. Oldham, of Martinsburg, held services during August at Ronceverte and Lewisburg, W. Va.

The Rev. Dr. Paca Kennedy, of the Virginia Theological Seminary, and family were at Union during August, Dr. Kennedy holding services in the Church there.

The Rev. A. N. B. Boyd has taken charge of the colored work at St. Philip's, Charles Town.

The Rev. W. G. Gehri has taken charge of St. Matthew's, Charleston.

The Rev. H. D. Pullan, of St. Stephen's, Beckley, was at Camp Knox for three weeks.

Archdeacon William Meade during August held services at such widely scattered points as Hinton, Ronceverte, Lewisburg, Fairmont, Pt. Pleasant, Sistersville, New Martinsburg, Minden and Anstead.

Other Notes of Interest.

Bishop Gravatt has called the semi-annual meeting of the diocesan boards for nine A. M., October 15, at Clarksburg.

A home for the Rev. Jacob Brittingham, D. D., rector-emeritus of St. Luke's, Wheeling, has been purchased by Wheeling Churchmen not members of St. Luke's. Dr. Brittingham's new home will be on Walnut Avenue, near Woodlawn, Wheeling.

In celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Bishop Gravatt's consecration to the episcopate, there will be a special meeting of convocations and Churchmen at Clarksburg, October 15 and 16.

The Synod of the Third Province will meet in Charleston, November 18, 19 and 20.

There was a unique service held in St. Stephen's, Beckley, by the Syrian Branch of the Greek Church. It was read in Syrian, Greek and English. The Rev. Father Basil M. Kerbawry, Archpriest of the Syrian Church, preached on Unity to a large congregation.

On July 27 a baptismal and confirmation service was held at Logan Court-house. It was the first service of this description in that place. It was in the dining-room of the Aricoma Hotel. The Rev. W. H. Cumpston baptized two adults and two children. Bishop-Coadjutor R. E. L. Strider confirmed four adults and preached.

Meeting of Church School Workers.

On Wednesday evening, September 10, at the parish house of the Church of the Redeemer, Pittsburgh, a dinner was given by the Diocesan Department of Religious Education to the superintendents, clerical and lay, of the various Church Schools of the Diocese, and the members of the Department. About twenty schools were represented by fifty delegates. Dinner was served at 6:30 by ladies of the parish. The Rev. Dr. Meade, Chairman of the Department, presided. For convenience and efficiency of work, the Department is subdivided into three committees: one on the Church Schools, one on Young People's Societies, and the third on work among adults. Among the speakers were the Rev. Dr. Meade, who gave a talk on the general subject of Religious Education, and its progress in the Diocese of Pittsburgh; Mrs. Thomas J. Bigham, who spoke in behalf of the Church Schools; the Rev. F. C. Lauderburn, who made report for the Young People's Societies, and Miss Charlotte F. Forsyth, Diocesan Superintendent of Religious Education, who spoke concerning work among adults. The Rev. Mr. Ockenden told of work being done among students in the diocese, at present confined to those at the University of Pittsburgh, Carnegie Technical School, and the Pennsylvania College for Woman—known under the name of "The Whitehead Club," to whom it is hoped during the present year to add the Church students in Washington and Jefferson College, and at the three State Normal Schools at Indiana, California, and Slippery Rock. Mrs. L. L. Riley spoke on Pageantry in Church Schools. Other persons made brief addresses on various sub-topics, and the whole scope of the department was pretty well covered during the evening.

The Church Normal School.

The fourth annual Church Normal School of the Diocese of Pittsburgh, under the auspices of the Department of Religious Education, will be held the season of 1924-1925, in ten sessions, on the Wednesday evenings from September 24 to November 26, inclusive, at Trinity House, Pittsburgh. It will be preceded by a meeting of all the teachers of the Diocesan Church Schools, to be held on the seventeenth, in the same place.

The program is as follows:

8:00 to 8:50 P. M.—Church Doctrine (instructor to be announced later); The Bible in the Making, the Rev. L. Norman Tucker, Ph. D.; The Prayer Book, the Rev. Frederic C. Lauderburn.

9:00 to 9:50 P. M.—The Teacher, the Rev. Rodney Brace; How to Tell Stories, Mrs. T. J. Bigham; A Brief Survey of the C. N. S., Miss Charlotte E. Forsyth.

An endeavor will be made to hold Normal School Extension classes in several centers outside of Pittsburgh during the year.

The date for the Annual Church School Dinner will be December 3. Information concerning the school will be furnished by Miss Charlotte E. Forsyth, Superintendent of Religious Education, 325 Oliver Avenue, Pittsburgh, Penna.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

The summer months have not been wholly inactive, or even slothful, in Kentucky. Very few parish churches have been closed, even temporarily, and in the majority, the regular rule of Sunday services has been maintained, with the exception, perhaps, of Evening Prayer. In Louisville, an open-air community service was held each Sunday evening, in one of the central parks, affording opportunity for all Christians desiring thus to close the day, and many have availed themselves of it. In three parishes, Vacation Bible School work has been pursued with very fruitful results. For several years the Cathedral has done notable service in this line, with ever growing returns, and the present has been one of the most satisfactory sessions. St. Mark's Parish, the Rev. J. H. Brown, rector, united its forces with those of other schools, making the work one of truly community value, and ministering to so large a number that two centres were required, St. Mark's sheltering the larger division. St. Andrew's Parish, the Rev. John S. Douglas, rector, added this work, for the first time to its many activities, with an enrollment of eighty-six, and results most encouraging. An exhibit of industries, toward the close of the term, bore full evidence of creditable achievement, in neat needle work, scrap books, and drawings, by the girls, and excellent specimens of woodcraft, by the boys. A contest, in various lines of proficiency, open to all the schools of the city, closed the season, and St. Andrew's is the happy possessor of the silver cup awarded for efficiency in music and ready recognition of words and tunes familiarized during the term of instruction. The rector's vacation covered but two weeks of absence, and both Sundays were well provided for, both in pulpit and chancel, including the usual early celebration of the Holy Communion. With the return of fall and many absentees, renewed interest is awakening throughout the Church, both within the city and out in the diocese.

Bishop Woodcock, after an enjoyable sojourn of six weeks abroad, following a more than usually strenuous term of service, is returning anew to the harness, and the faithful stewardship involved in "the care of all the churches."

Roadside Service for Sunday Motorists.

Acting on the theory that if you cannot get automobile owners to go to church on Sundays you can at least take the church to them, the Rev. William C. Heilman, rector of St. Andrew's Parish, Harrisburg, Pa., conducted a service on Sunday afternoon, August 24, in a grove which surrounds the "Mary Jane Tea Room," on the concrete Gettysburg Pike, an improved highway that is used by thousands of motorists each fair Sunday. The grove is about one mile south of York Springs.

The success of the experiment, as measured by the number of machines that stopped in the grove for the service, is shown by the fact that about ninety cars were there. It is estimated that there was an average of five persons in each car, which made the attendance run to about four hundred and fifty persons, which was regarded as a very fair attendance considering it was the first Sunday such a service was held there. Many churches in the city of Harrisburg average less than that attendance at summer-time services.

The Rev. Mr. Heilman chose as his text the words, "And the wise took oil." His subject was "Gas and Oil."

The sermon lasted exactly twenty minutes, the preacher expounding the theory that "gas and oil are to a motorist what religion is to life."

The clergyman had prepared his service for motorists, and every word was directed at the crowd of motorists and their friends who had gathered in the grove.

It could not be learned whether the Rev. Mr. Heilman will hold similar services in the future.

Practical Christianity in Mansfield.

When the authorities decided to lay an eighteen foot road in front of St. James' Church, Mansfield, which leads to the Mansfield Normal School, the people of St. James', together with those of two other churches on the same street, agreed to stand the expense of a full width road, from curb to curb, and thus make an attractive approach to the school.

Then the men of St. James' set to work to raise the sidewalk to curb level. They met one Wednesday afternoon, moved all the concrete blocks out of the way, never breaking one, and then wheeled ashes to fill in. At six that night it was a tired and hungry bunch that sat down to pancakes and sausages which the women served and cooked in the parish house.

With this start, a concrete worker was employed to make the grade and lay the walk. It is expected, with borrowed money, to pay for all this work, paint the church, and make other improvements. As this parish reports only thirty-three families and individuals, the doing of this work represents rare devotion and self-sacrifice.

This is not a spasmodic activity on the part of these people, but simply another instance of a sustained interest in discharging their responsibilities as far as lies within their power. Probably no other congregation in the Diocese of Harrisburg has given such unflinching attention to those who come into the parish as students at the Mansfield State Normal School.

St. James', Mansfield, has a noble record for such work in the past. While there are no record of results achieved, numbers of students have affiliated themselves with the Church, while in Mansfield Normal, through the efforts of our people there. These students in later life have become active workers in the Church, as vestrymen, and in the ranks.

Yeates School Reopens With Full Enrollment.

Yeates School, Lancaster, Pa., one of the oldest Church boarding schools in America, reopened on Wednesday, September 10, with a full enrollment.

This year, Yeates will admit girls as well as boys. During the summer the School was reorganized, with Mrs. Sumner Brown, of Lancaster, in charge.

There will be special visitors to the school each month, among whom will be Bishop Darlington, Presiding Bishop Talbot, Governor Pinchot, all of whom are members of the Board of Trustees; Major Lynn Adams, of the Pennsylvania State Constabulary; Miss Katherine Mayo, and Mrs. Gardiner, widow of the late Dr. Frederick Gardiner, a former Headmaster.

The Children's Home, Jonestown.

At the last meeting of the Executive Committee, September 10, 1924, it was decided to get bids on the plans prepared for a bathing house to be built adjoining the play rooms of the boys and girls. At present there are only two bath tubs for forty children. These additional bath tubs and showers will be a great delight to the children. A separate heating plant will be installed to heat the bath house, the water and the play rooms.

It was announced that one of the girls was graduated from one of the State Normal Schools last June and is now teaching in a graded school at a good salary.

Also one of the boys took a course in a night school, won a medal for his commencement oration and has secured remunerative employment with a large corporation.

The Executive Committee will aim to get more of our own children into the Home in the future. Many of them are in other institutions.

They feel that the fine home influences, the religious training, the good schools of Jonestown, and the beautiful location of the school are advantages that our children seldom get in other institutions. The clergy will be asked to send to their own school, children who need a good home.

Returned Clergy: The Rev. Messrs. Harry C. Adams of St. George's Church, Olyphant, and Percy C. Adams of St. John's Church, Ashland, have just returned from England, their native land. The Rev. and Mrs. F. A. MacMillan, rector of Christ Church, Reading, have returned from their European trip very much pleased with their visit.

Unique Celebration of Fiftieth Anniversary.

A Visitation of all the churches in the Diocese by the Bishops with a company of clergy and laymen is planned for October as a part of the observance of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Diocese. The purpose is to gather in every parish or mission church as many of the people as can be brought together, to plead with them for a remembrance of the diocese and of the work of their own parishes. An hour will be given in each church to the service and instruction, and a program has been prepared and distributed assigning an hour to every church, beginning with Sep-

Almighty and everlasting God, give unto us the increase of faith, hope and charity; and, that we may obtain that which Thou dost promise, make us to love that which Thou dost command; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

St. Matthew, the Apostle.

O Almighty God, Who by Thy blessed Son didst call Matthew from the receipt of custom to be an Apostle and Evangelist: Grant us grace to forsake all covetous desires and inordinate love of riches, and to follow the same Thy Son Jesus Christ, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

Songs of Sunrise.

By Hayashi San, a Japanese Leper.
I.

The soul who knows his God though of earth's smallest things
Up to the great wide heavens may mount on wings!

On that day when Thou comest to meet me,
Whenever that day may be,
May Thou find me joyfully ready,
Ready to go with Thee!

Bearing reproach and shame,
Suffering, pain and loss,
My soul undaunted still shall march,
Holding aloft the Cross!

Like the glorious red of the sunrise,
Like the shout at the battle's end,
The opening gates into Heaven
That was your death O friend!*

Hast fallen my soul and fallen again?
Arise and stand
For glorious victory is in thy hand!

Flowers dead; friends gone; an autumn night apart
But not alone while prayer wells joyful in my heart.

Heartily row, children of God Put forth your strength; face storm without fear;
Heed not wind nor night. Row on
The harbor of Heaven is near.

The red flame of Christ's blood
Turns all my frozen heart to fire.

Only Thy power canst make my sin-sick spirit whole
O Divine Saviour precious to my soul!

STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

The Last Discourse.

I.

The Rev. Louis Tucker, D. D.

St. John, by tradition, wrote after the other Gospels were finished. An ordinary man, by merely human powers, cannot remember every word of a long discourse for many years. A long speech, heard once and repeated after years, is certainly altered as to its wording unless the one who repeats has memory supernatural. The especial kind of inspiration promised in the New Testament is: "The Holy Spirit shall bring to your remembrance." If the last discourse be verbally correct we have here a miracle as great as the greatest recorded in the Gospels. If it be not verbally correct, yet derived from St. John, we have here a beautiful psychological diagnosis of St. John. If it be by unknown writers of the post-apostolic age we have a drastic test of the moral character, spiritual holiness and literary ability of those writers. If we find discourse and prayer morally perfect, spiritually holy, and touched with those lambent flashes of genius which characterized Our Lord, they could not be produced by post-apostolic forgers or collectors of traditions. The source must be Our Lord through St. John. But if these two discourses be genuine the rest of the Gospel is. The speech is three chapters long, the prayer is another chapter. No uninspired man who heard them could remember word for word. They are inherently incapable of transmission by tradition. They are recorded correctly by an inspired apostle or else they are deliberately forged around a few transmitted ideas by some second-century writer. Should they show the Christ-nature, then they are authentic and inspired—and so is the rest of John's Gospel.

There are few things more pathetic than the picture of one about to suffer comforting his friends. The eleven were not Christ's oldest friends nor those most needing comfort. Much older friends of his, Gabriel, perhaps, Michael or Israfel—many of the Great Ones, greatly needed comfort. The least was able to slay Judas, Annas and Caiaphas, Pilate and the Romans, and save the Lord. The greatest, shaking this solid globe could dissolve it into star-dust; and all must stand, swords sheathed, hearts breaking, gigantic wills which might upheave the universe withheld, while Judas crawled to Caiaphas and Caiaphas and Annas to Pilate and Our Lord suffered. Theirs was not the hardest task of the passion, but it was enough. It occupied their powers.

"Mansions" would be better rendered by "Places at table." Still, spacious amplitude of implication is part of Our Lord's meaning. It is a glimpse into a great well-ordered social life. The place for the twelve and all the chosen was not yet prepared; differing, therefore, from the kingdom prepared from before the foundation of the world for the redeemed in the last judgment.

There is promise to return for the eleven, and, by implication, for each of the elect. St. Paul's longing to depart and be with the Lord would imply that the coming again to receive His own refers not to the Last Day, but to the moment of death. This has not been the general impression of the Church; we think, because of genuine humility. But it seems inevitable. Joshua, Captain of the Lord's Host, stood in Jordan, typical of death, while the chosen of the Lord passed over. Perhaps that grace is not granted to ordinary Christians. It was to Stephen. But the eleven and, by inference, all the redeemed, are "with the Lord" before judgment, in the place prepared for them.

Jesus said: "I am the Way the Truth and the Life; no man cometh unto the Father but by Me."

As Logos, the maker of creation, Our Lord is the only way to the Father. It is heretically phrased, but the underlying thought is true and orthodox, to say that Christ and the Father are one as you yourself planning a thing and executing the thing are one. But we plan and execute consecutively, under terms of time, while He Who is both Father and Son is free from time and space. He created them. By styling Himself "Truth" Pilate's question is here answered before it is asked.

Theological language, since the Greeks left it, starts with presupposition that Father and Son and Holy Spirit are three persons, or modes, through which the One God simultaneously manifests Himself. For nineteen centuries half the Christian world has been carefully explaining these things to the other half and they are not explained yet. But the ambiguity is one of words, not of thought.

Our Lord is Way, Truth and Life. There is nothing mystical about it. He states facts. The deduction—that no man comes to the Father but by Him—is accurate as any Q. E. D. in mathematics. We have dared to hold that His Theory of the Universe can be known. We tread on holy ground, but it is firm ground. We go by deep water, but it is clear water; and it is such sayings as this concerning Way, Truth and Life that make the rock firm and the water clear.

"Lord," said Philip, "show us the Father and it sufficeth us."

"Have I been so long time with you and yet thou hast not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

Either this passage is Oriental exaggeration, or He Who spoke is both Son and Father. The Father is the One God unconditional. The Son is the Same God, as creator, ruler, Saviour of the universe. The Holy Spirit is the Same God as Lord and Giver of Life. An analogy, though incomplete, is that of an actor. "Persona" is the Latin technical equivalent of the English theatrical term "Part." Yet an actor may be Hamlet, Horatio or Polonius, but not all three. He cannot play two or more parts on the same stage at the same time. But God is unconditional Cause and Father of all, Maker and Saviour of all, and Giver of Life to all. Our Lord's sayings, "I and the Father are One" and "My Father is greater than I" are plain in the light of this interpretation. The three Persons of the Holy Trinity are persons—Persona—of One God.

But those three Persona love one another. Shall an actor as Hamlet love himself as Mercutio or as Macbeth? Christ loved the Father and abode in His love, and in that great love is no unworthy shadow. The One God is Father, Son and Holy Spirit and each loves each unselfishly. Here—and not in the shallower verbiage of triunity—lies the mystery unfathomable. God IS Love; and Love, unloved and unloving, cannot exist. It is because Father, Son and Holy Spirit love one another that God exists and we with Him.

Many trained on the lines of the modern applied psychology find help in believing that the Father is the Subconscious mind of God, the Son the conscious mind, and the Holy Spirit the super-conscious mind of God. The conscious sub-conscious and superconscious minds of man are one, yet three; and they loved one another. As an analogy the comparison is, perhaps, the most helpful known. As a statement of fact it is probably quite wrong, because, like all the other comparisons, it is not big enough. The current transcends the wire.

We turn from this, not because we cannot sound it further, but because any who understand can do so and those who cannot are caught in the mist of words and so would misinterpret and misread. God is a Spirit, free from time and space, and words have space-implications and time ones. Yet the mist is a word-mist only. It is true that further along, much further than words can carry, there is a glory around the Throne no eyes of the intellect can pierce; it is no mist, but a great glory of clear light too bright for seeing.

And so this loving reproach to Philip is best understood by loving silence. It is a glimpse, little, and yet as great as human hearts can hold, of that glory which, if seen in full, would fuse the world in one great flash of love. Man, as yet, cannot see God, and live. God must be hidden as a carpenter of Galilee or we perish.

For the Southern Churchman. Echoes from the Past.

W. B. Lydenberg.

Sweet strains of music echo from the past;

How sweeter now than once as years
Have mellowed them with time and tears;
Far sweeter now than when I heard them last!

They tell me of the treasures buried in
The lap of time, the gracious hopes brought,

The joys that once were mine, but now are not—

A taste, not of what is, but might have been;

They tell me, life is now as it was then,
That I have changed, I only, nothing more.

And days are lovely as they were before,

If I but love and hope and pray again.

O sing again that song of hope to me;
Sing not the things that are, but are to be.

"Something to Say."

Jesus was seated at meat in the house of a Pharisee, when a woman with a question mark after her name crept in from the street and broke a box of ointment over his head. The room was instantly filled with delicious odors and contentious murmurs. Stabbing eyes probed the sobbing woman.

With delicate tact Jesus turned the chambering guests' attention from the woman by saying, "Simon, I have something to say unto thee."

Our Lord always had something to say. His speech of grace surprised all who heard him. His words laid bare the secrets of hearts.

They were never cloying sweet or hard and gritty. They were the perfect expression of his inner life. He could be stern without being harsh, austere without being cold, brief without being indefinite. In two words, "that fox," he drew the picture of a man. His words came down like spring rain on a parched soil. Faith, hope, courage and joy rose again in the hearts of his hearers.

Men who have something to say are the pivots on which human destinies turn. Always at every hour of need God has His Paul, Athanasius, Calvin, Wesley, hidden somewhere. The hearts of men respond to their words, for leadership is voicing the unformed thoughts and wishes in the minds of men.

Jesus had something to say that nobody else ever said. "Come and see a man who told me all that ever I did," the astonished woman of Samaria told her neighbors. His penetrating words had stirred her muddy past.

Religious speech, when truest and at its best, is only the breaking through of the voice of the Son of God.

Whoever had a commanding word about sin until Jesus spoke? It was the pervasive tragedy and nightmare of the world until He came. Has any one else in our day spoken decisively on sin? Who save Him has its remedy.

Novelists can write stories about sin, a few of the lesser ones with gusto. I imagine Jesus always spoke of it with a catch in His voice. Essayists analyze and write dissertations on it. Some poets gild it with verses. Lawyers have suits and artists make pictures about sin and sinners.

But no one save Him has a redeeming word for the haunting malady of the world.

Jesus only is able to say, "I bore your sins. My shoulders carried their weight. I was wounded for them. Their guilt broke My heart on the cross." "Go in peace and sin no more."

Dickens, in the death of Little Dombey, speaks of the old, old-fashion death. Jesus had something to say on the last enemy. Sable death made luminous, robbed it of its terrors by act and word.

"Why fear death?" Charles Frohman said as the Lusitania sank. "It is a beautiful adventure."

There is nothing beautiful or adventurous about death! It's a horrid intruder in the world, the culmination of sin.

Jesus only has something worth listening to in face of death. "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

Jesus, moreover, always had something personal to say.

"I only know men in the mass," a practical social leader declared in New York City. He had traveled ahead of the Lord, who made his science of sociology possible. For what would a poor sinner do if Jesus had no personal word of pardon for him?

The speech of Jesus was personal, direct and gracious. His words are bread to hungry men. Cowards take courage, the shy get bold, and the young, when they obey him, deny themselves and find their fullest, largest freedom in Him.

The doctrine of election, whatever else it does, preserves a man's individuality. It singles him out in the mob, redeems him from commonality. God leavens crowds, but He has something personal to say to men. His ears are open.

"Who clears the grounding berg,
And guides the grinding floe,
He hears the cry of the little kit fox
And the lemming on the snow."

That Jesus had something to say to the humblest is our protection from being caught and strangled in the meshes of organized religion.

God counts the stars in the heavens, numbers the sheep on the hills, notes the drops of dew on every blade of grass, knows the flocks of birds and remembers the falling sparrow. But He has something to say to men.

"Humanity is on the march," General Smuts says. Well, it will not march straight nor long without the words of Jesus commanding it. He has something to say to a marching humanity.

Our Lord's words were always united in a wondrous wedlock with glorious deeds.

Jesus always has something more to say! Say on, O Master! "To whom shall we go? For thou hast the words of eternal life."—Ex.

Making the Best Use of Sunday.

Sunday has the very greatest value for religious education. It should be regarded in the family as the best day of all the week. It is the day when the family can be together as is perhaps impossible on the other days of the week, and when the family life reaches high tide. If the spirit of the family is genuinely Christian it will find its truest, finest and happiest expression on this day.

"The children who are old enough will, of course, go to Sunday school. If fathers and mothers think so little of Sunday school that they interrupt attendance for any light reason, they not only deprive the children of the religious education they would receive at the Sunday school, but they create an impression in the minds of the children that Sunday school does not amount to much, and naturally that religion does not amount to any more.

"It is most important, too, that the children who are old enough should attend the Sunday morning service for worship. The family should go together to the church to worship God as a family. If the children go only to Sunday school and to special children's societies, they do not have the opportunity to grow up in the corporate life of the Church itself.

"In general, the best things ought to be saved for Sunday use. The best picture book carefully kept to be enjoyed only on the best day; the stories which the children enjoy most told that day; and so on. A walk with father or mother, or the whole family together if possible, will not only provide a fine opportunity for getting acquainted, but more directly for religious education. The younger children may have the Sunday school lesson papers read over to them. The older children may be encouraged to do any handwork or note-book work which has been assigned to them in connection with the Sunday school lessons. Many interesting Bible games are available, and may be secured from any religious publishing house. It has already been suggested that the best stories may be saved for Sunday. Very often when it is not possible to have a regular story hour during the week, it will be possible to have it on Sunday. Children will keenly enjoy an hour of singing if father or mother join the group and lead them in singing the hymns which they all know. If, in connection with the singing, Bible stories are told, the children will look forward to the hour with the happiest anticipations."—Selected.

For the Young Folks

A Grace Before Meat.

For every joy of earth and hope of heaven,
For each good gift bestowed on us and ours,
For inspirations sent, ambitions given,
Ideals to climb to, wills to train and powers
To harness to our tasks—with one accord,
We offer, now, our thanks, O gracious Lord.

For the transcendent privilege of living,
For all the crowding duties of this day,
For every opportunity of giving
To help another on the upward way,
For mercies infinite—With one accord,
We offer, now, our thanks, O gracious Lord.

For minds to cultivate and souls to prove,
For work to do and comforts to enjoy,
For homes to anchor to and worlds to rove,
For all the helpful aids we may employ
The Golden Rule to keep—with one accord,
We offer, now, our thanks, O gracious Lord.

For all the bounty on our table spread,
For each one gathered round our friendly board,
For being, each one, called, through heart and head,
To sanctify his life, and keep it stored
With true Rotarian grace—with one accord,
We offer, now, our thanks, O gracious Lord.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Sometimes gardens do not look very pretty except to the robins. And when people are planting sweet peas the robins are very conceited; they think the earth is freshly turned for their especial benefit. The ground must be combed and combed until the tangles are all out. There are little brown threads of roots that will make trouble for the sweet peas just as soon as they can if they are not taken out of the garden. It is easier to stop an evil when it is little than when it is big. So all the small root-fibers must be pulled out. The sweet peas must be planted down deep. So the gardener makes a trench. Sweet peas like lots of air; they have little wings, you know. Sweet peas are so dainty and delicate. They eat all the food they get. And they drink lots of water and liquid fertilizer. The seeds like to be in deep, where it is cool and moist.

Sweet peas never make a mistake. The roots are wonderful things. They are like little mouths, like fine little sponges. And yet they know how to take just what they need from the soil. If the seed is put in upside down so that the roots come out of the little cases on top as soon as they are out of the shell, they know how to turn and go down. And if the leaves came out below, they would know they must turn and go up to find the light. When God shuts up all the flower in the tiny seed, He shuts up with it also a great deal of wisdom.

Did you know that plants think, like you and me. Sometimes, it seems, they think better. If you were alone and very hungry, would you know that some one had left a basket with lunch away off at the corner of the street, behind the fence, where you could not see it? Would you be able to go straight to it with your eyes shut? If you were thirsty would you know that a brook at the foot of the hill was dry, but that there was water in the well yonder? No, you would not. But a tree would know. A bee would know. When the trees or flowers or insects do something we cannot do and cannot understand, we call it instinct. Children, the more we live with the plant people the more we have not only love for them, but a great respect for their understanding, or instinct.

We must not look for the sweet peas till the leaves peep out. The little ladies like it better if we do not disturb them until they are dressed and ready to come out.

A good gardener waits, but he is beforehand, too. He rushes, but he goes slowly, too. If you make a garden because you love pretty colors and pretty things, or because the place would be bare if you did not plant something, that is a good reason for planting. But if you make a garden because you love the plants and want them to come and live with you, that is a better reason. Some people think of plants as if they were only lawn furnishings. And the plants all know it. It is as sad for flowers as it is for children to live with people that do not love them. Such people ought not have the dear flowers that are alive from their wise little roots to the tips of their leaves and the edges of their pretty petals.

Under the Snowball Bush.

"When are you going to see the little girl round the corner?" Letty's family asked her.

Letty looked bashful. "I want her to come to see me first," she said.

"Strangers don't pay the first call, you know," her big brother, Roger, reminded her. "That's not the way to do."

But Letty shook her yellow head. "I've been as far as the gate twice," she said. "And I just can't get any farther. Don't ask me to."

"Tut!" said her grandfather. "And all this time the little girl may be very lonely."

"Then, why doesn't she come to see me?" asked Letty quickly.

"Maybe she has come—as far as the front gate," said Roger.

Letty laughed outright; she could not help it. But still she did not go to see the new little girl.

That afternoon on her way to the post-office she kept craning her neck to look into the new people's yard, on Prescott Street, which was just around the corner from her own home. She wondered what the little girl's first name was, and whether she liked to play.

"Now, where can she be?" she asked herself crossly. "If she'd only come out she could walk with me under my big umbrella."

But there was no little girl to be seen; perhaps the threatening clouds had driven her into the house. Letty sighed.

By the time she started home a few drops of rain were falling. The wind was blowing hard, and, though she grasped her umbrella with both hands, it was all she could do to keep her hold on it.

"O dear, I'll just let it down and not mind the rain!" she said; but the umbrella would not come down, though she tugged and pulled hard at it. There was nothing to do but go on with it as it was. "For never, never in the world," puffed Letty, "will I love my mother's best umbrella!"

Presently the wind began to blow so hard that she could not keep her balance at all; but she held the umbrella against her head and struggled bravely on.

Then all at once the wind jumped under the umbrella and picked her right up off the ground. She felt herself being blown rapidly along; but where she was being blown to she had not the slightest idea. Suddenly she came to a stop against something soft. She peered out from under the umbrella. It was a bush that had stopped her—a snowball bush in full bloom. Letty gave a gasp.

At that moment a little girl's head was thrust out between the branches.

"How do you do?" the owner of the head said politely. "Come in."

"I can't, because of my umbrella," Letty explained.

The other little girl helped her, and together they lowered the obstinate umbrella. Then Letty crawled under the snowball bush.

She felt as if she must be dreaming. The branches hung low, so that they made a cosy little room that was dry as toast. Two dolls were seated at a tiny tea table set with blue china. A plate of small sandwiches was in the center of the table and a blue chocolate pot was steaming at the head.

"Where am I?" Letty asked. "And who are you?"

"I am Dulcie Ray," the little girl answered. "This is my playhouse. I thought you never were coming to see me."

Letty still looked puzzled. She parted the branches and peered out. There at the end of the yard was Prescott Street, and round the corner stood her own familiar house.

"You must be the new little girl," she said. "But how did I get here?"

"You blew here," Dulcie said. "I saw you. Right around the corner from Fisher Street, and across our lawn."

Letty looked again at the steaming chocolate pot, the delicious sandwiches and the waiting dolls. How delightful everything was!

"But I didn't come on purpose," she said.

Dulcie was seating herself at the table. "Well, you came, anyway," she answered. "Won't you take a seat and let me pour you a cup of hot chocolate? The sandwiches are fine."—The Youth's Companion.

Peggy and Ruthie Give a Party.

Peggy and Ruthie were blowing bubbles on Peggy's back piazza. Peggy watched a particularly lovely one float up in the crisp air—float, float, float—burst!

"Oh dear," she sighed, dipping her bubbler into the glass of water, "bubbles are just like vacations—perfectly lovely, but they don't last long enough."

"I was going to have a party last vacation," sighed Ruthie, "but it went so quick—before I knew it almost—that I didn't have the party after all."

"I wish we could have one now," said Peggy.

"Have one what?" asked mother, coming out to shake her duster.

"A party," explained Peggy. "Ruthie was going to have one, but she didn't, and I was wishing—"

"Well, why don't you?" asked mother, her eyes twinkling. "Why don't you have a bubble party? That would be easy to get ready for, and you could have it some time this month."

"Oh, mother!" squealed Peggy. "May I, really? And may Ruthie give half of it?"

"That's just what I meant," said mother. "And this minute isn't a bit too soon to make your plans. You may have it here, and I think six guests will about fill our little house. Now, first of all you will want to make—"

"The invitations!" cried Ruthie. "And let's make them out of water-color paper, round like bubbles, you know, and—and—"

"Oh, mother, will you paint them for us?" interrupted Peggy. "You paint so beautifully."

"No," replied mother, "I won't paint them for you." Then as she saw the hurt look in Peggy's eyes, she added with a smile, "But I'll show you how to paint them for yourselves—first with a light wash, and then with the daintiest of rainbow colors, as if the sun was shining on them."

"And will there be a verse?" asked Ruthie anxiously.

"There surely ought to be," answered mother, "and while I am dusting the parlor you and Peggy might put your heads together and think of one."

So Peggy and Ruthie got the paper and the pencils and soon it was very still on the back piazza.

"I've thought of a line," said Ruthie at last. "Come to our party on Saturday next."

"Fine!" said Peggy. "Here's another, 'Forget that you ever were troubled or vexed.'"

"Forget all you cares, lay aside every trouble," sang Ruthie.

"You can do it so easy by blowing a bubble," finished Peggy, seizing her bubbler and blowing a perfectly 'normous one.

"We'll need more bubblers," said Ruthie. "Now for the guests."

At last they decided on the six playmates they thought would most enjoy a bubble party—Edith, Jean, Paul, Robert, Belle and Albert.

"Now what shall we play?" asked Peggy. "Let's not give prizes for every game. Let's have score cards, with each game counting so many points, and give the prizes to whoever gets the highest score and the lowest when the scores are added up. We can make score cards like the invitations."

"Let's play repeaters. That is, blow a small bubble, float it, then catch it again on the end of the bubbler. A point to whoever can repeat the most times with the same bubble before it breaks. That's one game," said Ruthie.

"And we can have roller bubbles," added Peggy. "We'll get some strips of woolen cloth or carpet. We'll need woolen or felt, because bubbles break easily on cotton. We'll choose partners. One blows the bubble, and the other catches it on the middle of the strip of cloth, and then moves the cloth up and down so that the bubble will roll on it. The score would be for whoever bubble would roll the longest. Of course, everybody would have to start at the same time."

"I have another. We'll call it surprise bubbles. It is really more of a trick than a game. It is to stick a hat-pin through a bubble or cut it with a knife, and still not break it. You can, you know, if your pin or knife is perfectly clean, and you cover it with a soapy substance first."

"Monster bubbles would be fun. It needs partners. Two children stand so that the bubblers are but a few inches apart, then start to blow. You have to blow very carefully and steadily to get a big bubble."

"Why, we could have a triangular bubble by letting three persons blow at the same time," said Ruthie, thoughtfully.

"I wonder, if four blew, if we'd get a square bubble?" giggled Peggy.

"We can have a lung tester," continued Ruthie, laughing at the idea of a square bubble, "just to see who could blow the largest bubble with one breath."

"Boxers you play in pairs," Peggy went on. "As soon as your bubble is blown, you put the end of your finger over the end of the bubbler to keep the air in. You don't toss your bubble off the bubbler, but try to hit your opponent's bubble with your own, and either knock it off his bubbler or break it, while yours is left whole. If you can do that you score a point."

"That's fine, Peggy! And why not choose sides, and have a point for every winner, and an extra point for every one on the winning side?"

"Splendid, Ruthie! Aren't we going to have a good time, though? And wasn't it just like mother to think of something like this?"

"Yes, indeed, it was. And oh, Peggy, have you ever seen smoke bubbles? They're so pretty—the smaller ones look just like pearls."

"We'll coax grandpa to make us some. He can blow the smoke in after the bubbles are well started, just by taking his pipe out of his mouth and smoking the stem of the bubbler instead."

"Let's have some circus bubbles. We blow them through hoops, you know."

"Bouncing bubbles are fun. You float your bubble, and then use a bat covered with flannel, or a woolen mitten on your hand, or even a felt hat to toss the bubble up again and again."

"Then there are supported bubbles. You put several tumblers side by side, upside down, and put a bubble on the bottom of each glass. You moisten the bottom of each tumbler with the soapy substance to keep the bubbles from breaking. A point to everybody who can put the last one on the tumblers before any of the others break."

"And we could have some toboggan bubbles. Cover an ironing board with a woolen strip, and let the bubble roll down. A point to whoever could roll the most in five minutes, and not have any break before they reach the end of the board. If you think that is too hard, give a point to whoever can roll the most down in a given length of time and have the fewest break."

"My, what a lot of games we are going to have. I never dreamed there were so many things you could do with bubbles," said Peggy. "And there are still more. We can make our bubbles dance on a tight-rope, and we can blow a chain of bubbles, and blow one bubble inside of another, and—"

"Come, girls," called mother. "Time for luncheon, and then we'll make the invitations."

"What fun it's going to be!" laughed Peggy, giving Ruthie a big hug.

You can have a bubble party, too. Ask your mother to help you.—Christian Observer.

Animal Trades.

A student of the habits of insects, birds and animals once stated that many of them had "trades." He ingeniously made out quite a list of the things that they did. He declared that:

Bees are geometricians. The cells are constructed so that with the least quantity of material they have the largest spaces and least possible loss of gaps.

The mole is a meteorologist. Eels are electricians. The nautilus is a navigator; he raises and lowers his sails, casts and weighs anchor, and performs other nautical acts.

Whole tribes of birds are musicians. The beaver is an architect, builder and wood-cutter; he cuts down trees and erects houses and dams.

The marmot is a civil engineer; he not only builds houses, but constructs aqueducts and drains to keep them dry.

Wasps and hornets manufacture paper, and it is said that the invention of paper, as we have it, is due to the fact that a Mongolian got the idea from watching hornets make their nests out of a pulp which they got from weeds and straw and other vegetation.

Caterpillars make silk threads, and here again the inventors of silk got their first ideas of manufacturing silk fabrics. Ants are architects and military geniuses. They conduct their affairs on the cooperative or socialistic plan, and may be also regarded as statesmen.

The squirrel is a ferryman; with a chip or a piece of bark for a boat and his tail for a sail he crosses the stream. Squirrels are very good providers. During the summer they put up a large store of nuts for food to be used during the winter when they are housed up by the cold weather.

Mice and gophers and other animals also do that, and it is said that, if the winter proves to be a long, severe one, their store of food is larger than if it is short and mild. Who can tell how the animals know in advance what the winter will be? Man does not have such foreknowledge.

Dogs, wolves, lions, tigers, panthers are great hunters, and often when they have more meat than they can eat at a meal they will dig a hole in the ground, put the meat in it, then cover it with dirt and leaves.

Much has been written by men trying to explain the difference between animal instinct and human reason. There is a difference in degree certainly, but it is hard to determine at what point instinct stops and reason begins.—Our Dumb Animals.

A Boy's Best Rule.

Be honest, lad, in word and deed,
In all you say and do;
Treat others in your walk of life
As you'd have them treat you!
Don't steal another's precious time,
Or blot a spotless name—
You may not think that stealing, 'tis Fisheston just the same.

Be true—there's nothing half so grand
As character of truth;
Let never trace of falsehood stain
The glory of your youth.
Let every thought you harbor be
As clear and pure as day,
Sincerity of purpose gleam
In every word you say.

Be brave—don't be afraid to stand
Up boldly for the right,
And evil firmly to oppose
With all your fearless might;
For real courage only fears
What it is wrong to do—
To live a hero's life, my lad,
Be honest, brave and true!

Eternal Youth.

Alice B. Joynes.

In this beautiful, glorious world,
On these days of blue and gold,
God's banner of love above us unfurled,
Why should we ever grow old?

Let our hearts be merry and gay,
And our souls be filled with light,
Contented and happy by day,
Peaceful and quiet by night.

So shall we always keep young,
Till we reach the heavenly shore,
In that land of eternal youth
We can never grow old any more.

The Bond of Love.

L. C. Cummings.

What a source of comfort it is, to believe that the bond of love which binds us here is never broken even by death! The ministry of souls beloved, gone hence, is yet forever ours.

"Blessed are they who mourn, for they shall be comforted." Those in sorrow know by the spiritual sense that those whom we call dead continue near in spirit, though human eyes are blind and though how we do not comprehend.

Where Love ever lives are the spirits we love, here or there; we may safely believe this and thus be blessed and comforted, with inward peace and quiet minds, careless of the limitations of the material sense.

We forget that death means only larger life, the victory won and freedom from earth's bondage: we selfishly count our grief more than their relief.

QUALITY—SERVICE.

lief: and we forget that love never dies—that all the unfathomable universe is life; there are no dead; and they are not lost who find the light beyond the sun and stars—the light of God's presence, where they shall live forevermore.

Let us give thanks that we may indeed believe that the bond of love which binds us here cannot be broken e'en by death; and that those that have lived to cast such radiance upon our lives, the memory of which illumines our lonelier years—still live, in that serene sphere, where no dying is. Thus let us find hope from what is yet to come. "There are gladder things than living—and sadder things than death."

Her Thought—And His.

He was a midshipmite, a sturdy one at that, arrayed in long white ducks that must have measured all of eighteen inches from the hem upward. His cap, set in rakish independence on a mop of reddish curls, bore the name of a mighty ocean liner, and on the tip of his inquiring small nose were three enticing freckles. He stood with his feet well apart, surveying the avenue with interest, while the young woman beside him, evidently new to the profession of "gentleman's lady," fussed at the endless lines of automobiles passing, and at the lack of a traffic officer at that particular crossing, at that especial moment. The one who stood watching them, waiting for a bus, felt silent sympathy going out to wee Jack Tar.

All at once, from the curved pathway of the park, and across the sidewalk to where the two were standing, came a huge and dignified St. Bernard, with soft brown eyes full of patient kindness and questioning. He tucked his nose into the small brown hands, and looked up in most friendly fashion to meet a pair of dancing, delighted blue eyes.

"Oo! He likes me, Ma'y! Look! We're fwends!"

"Don't touch him! Don't! He'll bite! He'll bite you!" fussed and fumed "Ma'y," tugging frantically at her resisting charge, to the disgust of the one who stood watching.

Small Boy looked up at her, knitting his brows in most open bewilderment. "Bite?" he repeated. "Bite?" He couldn't seem to associate the ordinary meaning of the word with this big, gentle creature. Suddenly his face lighted up. "Hullo, Bite!" he cried, in joyous greeting!—Aldis Dunbar.

"No obstacle can remain such in the way of continuous prayer. No distance, no interruption, no delay, no unbelief of others, nor any depth of need, however undoubted, or beyond hope in the ages of man! Much is meant by every word in that counsel of the apostle 'continuing instant in prayer.'"

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

tember 30, and ending November 10. Neighborhood dinners are appointed for twelve central places where representatives of the parishes of the districts may be brought together. One of the Bishops is expected to be at each service, with the Canons, Missioners, the Archdeacons, lay officers, members of the Diocesan Commissions, and others making up groups for different places, about one hundred and fifty appointments.

In the plan of visitation distributed, the dates of the formation of the churches are given with other information. It is purposed to have a service of thanksgiving with a sermon by the Presiding Bishop in Grace Church, Newark, where the Diocese was organized, on November 13, and it is planned also to broadcast the service to all the parishes on Sunday evening, November 16. Thought will be had for the preparation for the campaign for the work of the General Church.

With remembrance of the fifty years of the life of the Diocese, the purpose will be to stir up the life of all the parishes, for the building up of the congregations, the increasing of the number of communicants, and the bringing back of the negligent, the extension of the ministry of the Church by services in new forms and in new places. All the churches in debt have been urged to mark the anniversary of the diocese by diminishing or removing their debts, and parishes not in debt are urged to give a helping hand to mission churches, or diocesan undertakings. A history of the establishment and a record of each church is to be written, to be read to the congregation with a copy of each to be preserved in the diocesan house. So it is hoped to make the Fiftieth Anniversary a commemoration of the work done under Bishop Odenheimer, Bishop Starkey and the present Bishops, and also to stir up the diocese to new life and activity.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

A Unique Experiment.

What is considered one of the most unique experiments ever undertaken in Church work with older boys is being inaugurated by the Church School of St. Joseph's Episcopal Church, Detroit.

An expert in vocational counselling, Mr. A. C. Crockett of the Detroit Board of Education staff, has been secured to act as advisor and every boy of high school age enrolled in the school will be given assistance in working out his vocational problem. This will be done through means of mental and psychological tests and conferences and close observation of the boy throughout the school year. During these conferences, the idea of making service to the community one of the chief factors in picking a life work will be stressed.

The work done by Mr. Crockett will be supplemented by a mid-week program of activities which will be in charge of a specially selected group of young business men who have been secured as leaders of the groups into which the boys will be divided.

In addition to the supplementary program, the regular course in religious education will be followed on Sunday mornings, each boys' group making up one of the classes of the regular Church School.

It is also hoped that the mental testing and the work in vocational counselling will be further supplemented by a thorough physical examination which will be given by experts in the field of adolescence some time during the school year.

A plan of parent cooperation has also been worked out whereby the parents of all boys enrolled in the school will receive periodic reports, not only of the boys' progress in the religious work of the school, but also reports as to the findings and conclusions reached in the vocational counselling department of the school.

Fathers of the boys will also be called together at some time in the early fall when they will listen to an expert discussion of the field of adolescent psychology and an effort will be made to acquaint them with some of the problems of the adolescent boy and help them understand their boys better.

The men who will be in charge of the boys' groups will take a special course in the field of adolescent psychology at the Detroit Church Normal School to help them to better understand the age with which they will deal.

When the success of the plan is assured with the boys it will be applied to the older girls in the school, and, later, certain changes, at least so far as parent cooperation is concerned, will be inaugurated in the entire school.

According to the Rev. S. S. Marquis, D. D., rector of St. Joseph's Church, who is giving the plan his best cooperation, an effort will be made to make the Church School of the parish so genuinely helpful to the boys and girls enrolled in it in working out their most acute life problems that when they will have finished their religious education and passed on into the adult church, they may look back with real feelings of thankfulness for what the Church did for them in their former years.

"Casting All Your Care Upon Him."

Didst Thou say "all," my Lord?
I cannot think I read aright,
Perchance the tears have dimmed my sight,
So I mistook Thy word.
I said "all," my child.

But one care is so large,
I have tried to lift it from the path,
And no success my effort hath,
Wilt Thou take that in charge?
I said "all," my child.

And some are very small,
Too petty, yet they vex my life,
They keep me harassed with their strife,
Dare I on Thee to call
I said "all," my child.

O fearing, worried heart,
Cast every anxious care of thine
On that providing care of Mine,
Which surely takes thy part:
I said "all," my child.

First Feed Your Cat.

Years ago I lived in the same apartment house with a professional idealist.

He was such a superior person that I used to feel quite ill at ease in his presence. He talked about social revolution, economic readjustment and other matters I do not understand, and was frankly contemptuous of our middle class habits and philosophies.

But I noticed a slight rip in the fine garment of his perfection. His soul was so much absorbed with nobler thoughts that he neglected the little detail of supporting his wife and child. He did not pay his bills. And when he went away for the summer he left his cat in the hallway.

We had to feed the cat.

Now, I am content to have you label yourself an "Idealist," a "Liberal," or even a "Reformer," provided you don't assume that this gives you the right to ride free on the world and criticize the paying passengers. . . .

I am an ineffectual being in an imperfect world. But if you are going to appoint yourself to act as my preceptor and guide, I insist that you first feed your cat.—Bruce Barton in the Red Book Magazine.

splendid inspiration and spiritual growth that are bound to come from and through the Convention, and you have surely sufficient reason for coming to this Convenelse.

Before Communion

Whatever sorrows be thine
 One stands with brimming chalice at thy side
 Offering the ruddy wine
 Of grace, of strength, of comforts multiplied.

Sayest thou, "Depart from me,
 For I am sinful"? Nay, He bore thy sin
 When to the lost came He
 To lead them home, and fold them safe therein.

Unfaithful proves thy friend?
 He felt the Judas-kiss; He was betrayed,
 Scourged, mocked; yet at the end
 He moved Heaven's Throne to pardon, when He prayed.

Or standest thou at that Gate
 Where roll the imponderable clouds no light
 Of mind can penetrate?
 Behold! His Easter Dawn breaks on that night!

Not present things, nor things
 To come, not the dark Powers, nor Life, nor Death,
 Can halt His steps, Who brings
 To the faint, succor; to the dying, breath.

Then, by whate'er distress
 Or hunger thou be straitened, Come and dine!
 For here He waits to bless
 With Bread of Life, and Blood poured out like wine.

Education and Religion

"Education and religion are absolutely essential to true democracy," states a Bishop of the Church; and he adds: "It has been the province of Hobart College to blend the two to a remarkable degree."

That fact is the basis of Hobart's strong appeal to students who come from homes in which a definite religious atmosphere has been maintained. Hobart, ever since its founding, has recognized the value of religion to its students and has always given them ample facilities for the exercise of their religious instincts.

It is not surprising that many students, after entering Hobart, seek affiliation with the Church; nor is it surprising that nearly four hundred Hobart graduates have been ordained to the Protestant Episcopal Ministry.

Applications for admission to the 103rd class are now being received. For information address the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President.
